I have often, often heard the remark made by persons, after hearing Bro. Richardson, that he did not preach like a Methodist—he was more like an Episcopalian, or Presbyterian. I can not but think there was some ground for that opinion, which will be esteemed an encomium, or otherwise, according to the different tastes of individuals. He preached Methodist doctrines, his sermons were practical, he appealed directly to the heart. It was in his style of delivery that he differed from the mass of his brethren. He sometimes, though rarely, read his sermons; he generally preached memoriter; and he sometimes extemporized; but when he did, he arranged his thoughts so carefully—his periods were so well rounded—his sentences formed so nicely, that the hearer felt that the speaker was not giving himself up to the full impulse of feeling excited by the subject. Others may differ with me, but it is my deliberate opinion that Bro. R.'s pulpit labors would have been more effective and useful had he adopted a more extemporaneous style of preaching.

His manners in the pulpit were grave and dignified, at the widest remove from everything trifling, every thing theatrical. He was about the ordinary height, spare made, his figure erect. His high forehead, displaying well developed intellectual faculties, his penetrating eye, his countenance beaming with intelligence, was such as to command universal respect; and if he appeared for the first time before an audience, his whole appearance was a guarantee that they would be both instructed and edified. [Bro Richardson's friends were heartily ashamed of a wood cut likeness, published in one of our periodicals some two years since. It was deemed a caricature.]

His voice, though distinct, would not generally be considered musical. He commenced the services in tones sufficiently loud to be heard by the entire assembly. He read the lessons and hymns in a distinct and impressive manner; and from the commencement to the close of the services he kept the congregation interested. I never on any occasion saw an audience become listless while he conducted public worship.

Those who heard him frequently observed a sameness in his prayers. A favorite expression with him in prayer was, "Command the blessing, even life, for ever more, to rest upon each one of us." In reference to the extension of the Redeemer's kingdom, he prayed that the time might soon be ushered in when from the rising to the setting sun man should offer incense and a pure offering; and he frequently concluded with the collect, "Defend us, oh Lord, with thy most gracious favor, further us with thy continual help," etc.

Let not the reader suppose that Bro. R.'s prayers lacked fervor or appropriateness. There were times when he was specially powerful in prayer. I recollect on one occasion, several years since, at a camp meeting, he offered a prayer which I have seldom heard excelled. There had been a good deal of excitement and several conversions. Brethren of warm temperament and stentorian lungs had been praying, and the feelings all had been wrought up to a high degree of interest. In this state of things it was with a slight feeling of regret and fear lest the interest might abate, that I heard Bro. R. begin to lead in the devotions. But my feelings soon changed. He began by representing the state of the mourners as condemned and guilty criminals. He then alluded to the mercy of God as the ground of human confidence, plead redemption's price in the great atonement; and when he came to speak of our High Priest, touched with the feeling of our infirmities, who ever liveth to make intercessions for us, he seemed to grasp the promise and bear us aloft on the wings of his faith; and while he thus wrestled for an effusion of the Holy Ghost, verily it fell upon us and sent his thrilling influences through the congregation, and one universal shout of praise spontaneously broke forth from every believing heart.

In his prayers at the sick bed side, and in the house of bereavement, he was peculiarly at home. It seemed as though his voice was unusually pathetic, and every tender expression and appropriate promise was at his command. Whatever opinion those may have formed of our dear brother who had but a superficial acquaintance with him, I know that he possessed a warm, a sympathetic heart. He entered my humble dwelling when to me it had an unwonted silence, an indescribable gloom. Death had been there, and had done his worst. He had smitten the partner of my bosom, the companion of my itinerant toils. I had laid the mortal remains of the mother beside those of our beloved child, and returned in solitude to weep. I did not despair. I was not destitute of the consolations of religion. I fully believed that the spirits of the departed were mingling their songs before the Throne. But this did not bestow cheerfulness to my dwelling, did not give me back the society and presence of her who had been my guardian angel, who so richly merited all the affections of my heart. How opportunely was the visit of such a friend. His delicate allusions to the deceased, his kind manner, his fervent prayers and sympathizing tears did all that mortal could do to soothe an anguished spirit.

And, now, oh my God! another domestic altar has been invaded, and a family group dearer to our brother than life itself, is now clad in mourning! I would fain make a tender of the usual expressions of condolence, but oh! how vain and unsatisfactory are these formalities. May He who tempers the winds to the shorn lamb, the husband of the widow, the father of the fatherless, mercifully shield, sustain and bless them. Amen.

The Bible on Slavery.

We have been gratified in perusing a Report on Slavery, drawn up by Dr. Thornwell, Chairman of a Committee appointed by the Presbyterian Synod of South Carolina, to draft a circular on the subject, presenting its religious and ecclesiastical aspects. It outweighs volumes of the sentimental appeals and refined theories of philanthropic wranglers. We clip into it here and there. As to the power of the Church to legislate on slavery:

"The Church is a very peculiar society—voluntary in the sense that all its members become so, not by constraint, but willingly; but not in the sense that its doctrines, discipline and order are the creatures of human will, deriving their authority and obligation from the consent of its members. On the contrary, it has a fixed and unalterable constitution, and that constitution is the Word of God. It is the kingdom of the Lord Jesus Christ. He is enthroned in it as a sovereign. It can hear no voice but his; obey no command but His; pursue no ends but His. Its officers are his officers, bound to execute only his will. His teachings, which [illegible] given from God; its discipline is [illegible] he as [illegible] has ordained. The power [illegible] Church [illegible] simply is only minister [illegible] declare it. The Bible, and the Bible [illegible] is her rule [illegible] with and practice. [illegible] announce [illegible] doctrines, enjoin [illegible] commands, prohibit [illegible] what it condemns, enforce her testimonies by spiritual sanctions. Beyond the Bible she can never go. [illegible] from the Bible she can never speak. To [illegible] law and to the testimony, and to [illegible] she must always appeal; and where [illegible] silent, it [illegible] to put [illegible] her lips.

"These principles, thus absurd they are not likely to provoke opposition, which flows from them, the sake of which we have here stated has unfortunately been too much indulged, and that is, that the Church liberty to speculate. She has no opinions. When she speaks, it must be in the name of the Lord, and her only ment is, thus it is written.

"In conformity with this principle, [illegible] Church any authority to declare [illegible] be sinful? Or in other words, has the [illegible] any where, either directly or indirectly, [illegible] demned the relation of master and servant incompatible with the will of God?

"We think there can be little doubt that the Church had been content to [illegible] naked testimony of God, we [illegible] been spared many of the most effective [illegible] certations against slavery. [illegible] sition to it which has arisen [illegible] with imaginary sufferings, from its nature and misapplication of [illegible] ets of philosophers—deduct [illegible] which is due to sentiment, [illegible] ulation, and how much will be found originated from the humble [illegible] of the Scriptures? Will any [illegible] he who applies to them with an unprejudiced mind, and discusses [illegible] ings upon the subject, simply [illegible] language and interpretation, will [illegible] the pages with the sentiments of [illegible] modern abolitionist? Certain is it [illegible] direct condemnation of it can any [illegible] found in the sacred volume. A [illegible] ment in all States, from the dawn [illegible] until the present period, if it be [illegible] and damning sin which its enemies [illegible] it to be, it is truly amazing that [illegible] which professes to be a lamp to [illegible] n light to our path, to make the [illegible] an perfect, thoroughly furnished [illegible] work, no where gives the slightest [illegible] against this tremendous evil. The [illegible] no where rebuked as a monster of [illegible] and tyranny—the slave no where exhorted as the object of peculiar compassion [illegible] pathy. The manner in which [illegible] itself is spoken of, and its duties [illegible] the whole tone and air of the sacred [illegible] convey the impression that they [illegible] had not the least suspicion that [illegible] were dealing with a subject full of [illegible] and outrages. We read their language cool, dispassioned, didactic. We find [illegible] exhorted in the same connection with [illegible] bands, parents, magistrates; exhorted [illegible] same connection with wives, children [illegible] subjects. The prophet or apostle gives [illegible] note or [illegible] on signal of danger [illegible] when he comes to the slave and his duties, [illegible] and the unwary reader is in serious danger [illegible] of concluding that according to the Bible [illegible] is not much more harm to be a master [illegible] a father—a slave than a child. But this is not all. The Scriptures not only fail to condemn—they as distinctly sanction slavery as [illegible] any other social condition of man. [illegible] Church was organized in the family of [illegible] slaveholder; it was divinely regulated [illegible] the chosen people of God; and the [illegible] duties of the parties are inculcated under [illegible] Christian economy. These are facts [illegible] can not be denied. Our argument [illegible] this: If the Church is bound to [illegible] the authority of the Bible, and that [illegible] she discharges her whole office in regard [illegible] slavery, when she declares what the Bible teaches, and enforces its laws by her peculiar sanctions. Where the Scriptures are silent she must be silent too. What the Scriptures have not made essential to a Christian profession, she does not undertake to make so. What the Scriptures have sanctioned she does not condemn. To this sound she is shut up by the nature of her constitution. If she had universally complied with the provisions of her charter, the angry discussions which have disgraced [illegible] and produced bitterness and alienation [illegible] own children, in different countries [illegible] different sections of the same land [illegible] have been prevented."

The following views have [illegible] knowledge, been better [illegible] irrelevant, absurd [illegible] the Church do the [illegible] them for their qui[illegible] science of [illegible] tators:

"According to the rule of faith [illegible] gives to the Church its being, [illegible] master and slave stands on the [illegible] with the other relations of life. In [illegible] considered, it is not inconsistent with the law of God—it is not sinful. The [illegible] doctrine of Christianity as a [illegible] obedience to law. The Church [illegible] can not undertake to dissolve [illegible] The Bible further teaches [illegible] is growing out of [illegible] the master and [illegible] Church must [illegible] own members. [illegible] As a Church [illegible] Kingdom of Christ [illegible] Lord, [illegible] she must [illegible] yet [illegible] no further, unless it be [illegible] to [illegible] who assume [illegible] God pure [illegible] Thus who corrupt [illegible] fame [illegible] to [illegible] are [illegible]

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

[A Delayed Letter.]

My Dear K.: The mail boat, after a short and half sea-sickening voyage from Wilmington, N. C., landed me, with a good company of South-going passengers, at the Charleston wharf, about 4 o'clock one morning. I have read of London at midnight; Charleston at daybreak does not furnish so profound a chapter. It was light enough for me to stroll about; so I left the boat as soon as it was moored.

The Charlestonians are the pink of chivalry, but they are not a fast people: they do not rise before day. I saw nobody stirring—but the buzzards. Now, you may be surprized to learn that these birds are almost somebody in Charleston. They are clean and diligent scavengers, and take that job. They are protected by law, and I am told that to strike, cripple, or any wise maim one, lays the offender liable to prosecution and penalty just as certainly as if he were to commit assault and battery upon an alderman. From the value and abundance of hogs in that State, I have heard them spoken of as "citizens of Ohio:" Upon the same principle these bipeds may be called citizens of Charleston. Well, I have known worse citizens. The filth that breeds sickness is cleared out by them, and they do this business con amore. I admire the economy and judgment of the Charlestonians more than their taste in thus constituting their Board of Health.

As I was saying—these citizens and I, at that early hour, had the whole town to ourselves. They hopped about in the most gleeful jollification. Fully appreciating corporation privileges, they were in no hurry to get out of the way. I was shocked at this tameness. One fellow was picking the marrow out of a bone; I raised my cane for a fling, whereupon he turned his head quizzically and looked at me out of one eye, as much as to say, "Hit me if you dare." But I durst not, for the law was on his side.

The market stalls, after awhile, began to be filled up by the arrival of vegetable carts from the farms near, but the sun was well up before there was any thing like a stir among the population, white or black. If Mr. Wesley, on his visit here a hundred years ago, got out a congregation to his 5-o'clock-in-the-morning preaching, he did then what he could not do now. This early rising for health's sake, has its limits. Unquestionably in some climates it is better to let the sun dissipate unhealthy vapors before going out to inhale them. They say (how should I know any thing about it?) that no sleep is so sweet as that taken when the first rays are peeping in, and rising day chides the sluggard. This is on the principle that "stolen waters are sweet." Depraved natures crave unlawful pleasures.

The houses of Charleston are objects of common remark. They seldom front the street, breathing an open hospitality on every passer by, but set cadwise. A door opening into a long and cool piazza admits the visitor to halls and hospitalities within, free, full and generous. A day spent in this unique and interesting city, can hardly leave other than a pleasant impression. It boasts a population of elegant refinement.

The Railroad leading through South Carolina, from Charleston to Augusta, while it has helped the commerce has hurt the character of the good old State. The scene of tame sterility that lies along it, on both sides for the first half of the way, has gotten it the character of—a good State to emigrate from. Ridges of black-jack oaks and cypress swamps, producing fine snakes and indifferent terrapins, make up the alternating variety. The engineers who laid off the route must have had a grudge against the State, in exhibiting so poor a section of it. Were they not Yankees? I felt the truth of what Sallust has written of Germany—that no one could love it, nisi sit sua patria. But it is my native country, and therefore I love South Carolina. I like it none the less because it is spirited in its politics. In 1832-3, among the smallest of chaps, I wore a cap with a button on it, and rejoiced in the name of "nullifier." I did n't do much damage, only at militia musters and barbecue occasions, when valorous onslaughts were made upon States' right beef and water-melons. Those may shrug their shoulders who please, and lament the fiery and decisive tone of the Palmetto State. It may yet transpire that the South will have to fall back upon the extreme platform of this single State. It is well for the Southern portion of the Confederacy to show their teeth and bristles at some point. A combative element is necessary to every sound constitution. In every family a quick, sensitive, chivalrous member fills a useful place. His impetuosity may have to be soothed and apologized for by the more peaceable members of the family, but he enables them to make advantageous compromises.

In Barnwell District I tarried a few days among scenes pleasing and mournful—the scenes of a happy childhood. It is not surprising that a good deal of poetry has been attempted on these revisiting occasions. A feeling is inspired not deficient in poetic character, and painfully lacking expression in poor prose. A kind stranger lived in the house where this pilgrimage began. I made a pretense for "calling in," and manifested an acquaintance with every locality, every tree and weed-grown path about the premises that quite puzzled my host. Fifteen years before my father had emigrated Westward, with a large family of small children. It had been my first home, and I felt, on leaving it, that I never should find a sweeter home. The play-grounds were there, and not far distant the grave-yard, with its clumps of trees, where the forefathers slept. I made respects to a certain mulberry, which was wonderfully prolific in former times of twigs, and had furnished the parental hand, for my especial benefit, with many of those "rods" Solomon extols so highly. I felt no spite against the tree for all that, and congratulated the young ones of the present "lord of the manor" that time had lifted its nether branches too high for any more such uses.

But the pleasantest part of all was to worship on the Sabbath at the Church; not a village church, but a country church hid away in the woods. A dozen roads and paths led to it from all directions, and the circuit rider regularly found it, bringing glad tidings. Now it was week-day, and now Sunday preaching, but always some sort of meeting on Sunday. The class-meeting, that excellent spiritual economy of Methodism, was a standing means of grace, and the impression is with me yet of some of the recitals of experience then and there given. Salem has enlarged her borders. The young have been converted and taken places as leaders and stewards. Of course I was but too happy in accepting an appointment to preach. In the congregation the preacher, among others, anxiously looked for two persons—they were humble, pious negroes. They belonged on different plantations, and perhaps had no great encouragement to piety at home, but when I was last there they were there. They were church-goers, and had been as far back as my memory ran. Rain or shine, big or little preacher, class or quarterly meeting, they were there. The man, Isaac, if meeting happened in a week-day worked hard, gained time, and went to church. If it was a class-meeting, the leader getting through with his white members, walked back to their seats and gave them a talk. Though the love of many might wax cold, and their practice negligent—those were at the Church. I looked for them; they were there. Services over I hastened to grasp their hard, and honest hands, and repeated a passage of Scripture that came to mind, and with a better understanding of it than ever before—"Those that be planted in the house of the Lord, shall flourish in the courts of our God."

I write this en route for New Orleans, and you shall not hear from me again till you see me.

East Alabama—Montgomery.

We had the pleasure of spending a few days lately within the bounds of the Montgomery District, Alabama Conference. The presiding Elder, Rev. G. Garrett, moves round in a diocese that a Bishop might be proud of, and gives the Church to understand what is expected of them—still to bear aloft the missionary banner. If they do not, it will not be his fault. On the 12th and 13th inst., the Quarterly Meeting for Cowikee Circuit was held at Glenn Chapel. The preacher in charge, Rev. W. B. Neal announced his summer campaign meetings with the hearty emphasis of one who expects success. The junior preacher, Rev. D. McCoy, has failed in health, and to the regret of all desists from the circuit work.

Several brethren of the local ministry came up to this feast and contributed to it. In the Sabbath morning love feast we were happy to find some of their consciences troubled about entering more fully into the work. Oh! that the Church's liberality would remove all impediments, and command them away from their nets to be "fishers of men." Or can't they have the venturing faith of Peter to step out upon the water?

Our stay in Montgomery was long enough for a call on the pastor, Rev. C. D. Oliver, and a survey, under his direction, of the new Bible-house and Methodist Church, now building. This latter house bids fair to be the Metropolitan Church of Alabama. The length of the main building is 100 feet; of the audience room, 82 feet; width, 65 feet; ceiling, 30 feet high. The basement divisions signify that the Montgomery people consider class-meetings a fixed fact. Four light and airy rooms are set apart to them. The lecture room has a ceiling 10 feet high, and is 62 by 54 feet. The present contractor is to be paid $15,000; after his contract is fulfilled, about $2000 will be required to finish the house. Provision for the pastor's study is made in a neat office in the rear of the pulpit, and communicating with it by a door. The style of architecture is Doric. A tower goes up 112 feet. The money is raised by subscription; one member, Rev. F. F., giving $2000, and several giving $500. The location is that of the old building, and the most eligible in the city. The model adopted, as far as developed, comports well with taste and comfort. We recommend those about to build to examine this before adopting any. The building will be far enough advanced for use by October.

Much credit is due to the Methodists of Montgomery for this substantial and elegant offering to a free worship of God. May they be blessed in their deed. These imposing and solid fixtures of religion have a good meaning as well as a good use. "Walk about Zion, and go round about her; tell the towers thereof."

These temples of His grace,
How beautiful they stand:
The towers of our native place,
And bulwarks of our land.

NORTHERN CORRESPONDENCE.

Lynn, Mass., June 11, 1852.

Mr. Editor: The almost explosion in the General Conference, of which I spoke in my last, did not pass entirely without effect. The speech of Mr. Porter, in which he alleged that slaveholders were in the Church rather by sufferance than right, soon reached Baltimore, where it produced no little sensation. Telegraphic dispatches were soon received by members of the Baltimore delegation, insisting that members of the Church in that Conference were in the Church by right and according to the Discipline, as much as the members in New England, and demanding that the offensive language of Mr. P. be disavowed by the General Conference. Mr. Collins presented and enforced that demand; but the Conference merely indefinitely postponed the matter. Thus the way was left open for further deception to be practiced upon the already misled members upon the borders. So it will go until the abolition sentiment of the North and East finds itself sufficiently strong to carry out its views, when Baltimore Methodism, the parent of the New England Church, will be quietly told upon what terms it can remain in the Church!

The sentiments of the Church in New England, on the slavery question, have been not a little effected by the influence of the Garrison clique, fanatical and infidel as it is. This set have a fine opportunity to appeal to and play upon the prejudices and sympathies of the populace; and by denouncing the churches as "pro-slavery," and endeavoring to array popular prejudice against them: they make many of them—and among the rest the Methodists—exceedingly sensitive. And in order to repel the allegation, they feel obliged to make a strong showing of abolitionism, and thus are naturally led to advance step by step, almost imperceptibly. Having leisure on my hands a few days since, I dropped into one of the meetings of the N. England Anti-Slavery Convention, then in session. I found the audience, which was continually fluctuating by persons coming and going, composed mostly of a very ordinary class of persons, with a very small sprinkling of negroes. Two or three fourth or fifth rate ministers, of different churches, made speeches defining their positions—defending Christianity against the charge of being pro-slavery, and thundering anathemas against slaveholders, etc. I received the impression distinctly, that so far as that body was concerned, neither the church nor the country had much to fear. It did not seem to command much sympathy or respect from the public. The recent nomination for the Presidency and Vice Presidency, by the Democratic National Convention, and the adoption of a platform so distinctly Southern, have given this clique and their sympathizers great distress, and a State Convention has been called to take measures to "rescue liberty" from a threatened doom!

A work of fiction, recently issued, entitled "Uncle Tom's Cabin," is having a great run. The work is sought up and read with remarkable avidity and gusto by the public; and many a benevolent heart is made to forget the wants of a next door neighbor, while it sighs over the sorrows and woes of poor "Uncle Tom." The work is by Mrs. Stowe, and is characterized by the dogmatism and impudence peculiar to some members of that family. Rumor says that some one in the South intends an answer. I hope this is not so. It would dignify it too much; besides, the parties who might be benefitted by such a work will never see it.

Rev. A. Stevens, the newly appointed editor of the "National Magazine," provided for by the late General Conference, has entered upon his duties "con spirito," and is determined to do his best to make the Magazine worthy of patronage, and give it a wide circulation. He assures me that no sectional questions—no matter offensive to readers in any part of the country, will be introduced to its pages. If this purpose is adhered to—and I think it will and must be—the work, I trust, will find patrons in the South. It is to be religious, but not sectarian—and thus by its freedom from all that is pernicious, and its literary character, adapted to all classes of readers.

I learn from private sources that the Church suit will not be appealed, unless something favorable to the North should occur in connection with the Cincinnati suit. It is not principle, and a desire to deal justly with their brethren, that is to govern this matter, but expediency, and a prospect of success! There is a noble article on the subject in the Daily Zion's Herald, of May 3, which I hope you will republish. O, for the voice and influence of an Olin in the councils of this Church at the present time.

I have been sorry to learn that the spirit of speculation has taken possession of many ministers in this region, at that some of them are even found operating in stocks! This is a bad symptom.

Yours, etc., J. H.

Sunday Schools.—"The Sunday School system is the only system that can be made immediately available for the education of the youth of Texas. By such schools the way is prepared for common schools."

The above is from the correspondence of an intelligent traveler, who has recently made the tour of Texas, and is furnishing the result of his observations for one of the papers of the North. There is much truth in the sentence quoted, in its application to other States, as well as Texas.

Correspondents—Several communications on hand and will be attended to. An interesting letter from Rev. D. B. Leyne will appear next week.

Peaches—Abundance of Them: Gen. Huston has our thanks for a basket-full of peaches, received from his fruit depot at Scott & Robinson's, on Canal street. He is really a benefactor of the whole city, in furnishing so large and cheap a supply of this healthful and delicious fruit.

A Prima Donna Settled Down.—Mlle Rosa Jacques, the prima donna, is about to settle in Chicago, her services having been secured by one of the churches in that city.

Complimentary.—The Royal Society of Arts and Sciences, of Sweden, has just struck a medal in honor of Emanuel Swedenborg.

North Carolina Twins.—Two colored children, connected by the vertebræ, and said to be quite a match for the Siamese Twins, are about to be exhibited in the Northern cities, commencing at Petersburg, Va.

California Mission: Miss. Conf.

Bro. McTyeire: It is due to the Mississippi Conference, as well as myself, that I should make known my whereabouts, and give some account of myself in reference to the California Mission.

At our late session I responded to the call of Bishop Paine, with others, and offered myself for that distant field. Humble and unworthy as I feel myself to be, then comparatively a stranger in this Conference, I was, nevertheless, recommended to the Bishop, and received the appointment. The preliminaries, (all except "the material aid,") were fully arranged for my departure, at any rate, by the 10th February last. The sum of one thousand dollars was to have been furnished by the Conference as an outfit, which amount was to be raised (if possible) by the time above specified.

In order to facilitate this matter the Conference, by resolution, instructed me to repair immediately to the most important points within our bounds, and solicit contributions. The preachers likewise were instructed to co-operate with me, and collections were to be taken generally, the amounts forwarded to you and acknowledged in the New Orleans Christian Advocate.

It cannot but be apparent to any thinking Brother, that the interim between the date of the Conference action and the time fixed for my departure, was too short to afford the preachers an opportunity to make collections generally. (Nay, they had barely reached their field of labor ere the time expired.)

This was anticipated by the Conference, and it was resolved, "That in case the whole amount of one thousand dollars was not obtained in time for the missionary, with others, sent to California, the amount raised on Saturday night for the California mission shall be appropriated to make up deficiency."

In obedience to the order of the Conference I went to as many places as practicable, (reaching most, in advance of the preacher appointed by the Conference,) and took collections. Some brethren also, in other places, obeyed the resolution. With all possible speed I made ready, not without much pecuniary sacrifice, as also of all those tender feelings that bind families and friends together, and through the mercy of God, I reached New Orleans in time to have left as requested by the Bishop. On my arrival I called at the Advocate office, where I expected to find the amount raised at the Conference Missionary Anniversary, with an additional sum sent in by other brethren, that would enable me to proceed on to San Francisco in time to be at the organization of the first Conference of the Church South on the Pacific. But to my utter astonishment I found only thirty dollars!! Here I waited about three weeks, at the expiration of which I received two hundred and fifty dollars from Dr. Drake (Treasurer of the Conference Missionary Society) of the amount raised at the anniversary "for the California Mission." This remittance came through Bro. W. H. Watkins, and was accompanied by a communication, (which I have not now before me,) but I think he said, "after a very liberal construction of the Conference resolution, Bro. Drake has concluded to send you two hundred and fifty dollars." At this I confess I was no little surprised, as the Doctor had been apprised of the deficiency that had occurred in the $1000 pledged by the Conference for the outfit, and requested to send the anniversary collection in time for me to take the steamer of the 10th February. Now I know there is a difference of opinion upon the resolution, upon which the "liberal construction" had been placed; yet it seems to be far more generally construed as appropriating the entire "amount raised on Saturday night for the California mission to make up deficiency" that might, and probably would be, right upon the heels of our last year's collections. The phraseology of the resolution to my own mind justifies the construction, and is what I believe to be the original meaning and intention of the resolution. If not, it seems to me that it had neither meaning nor intention in it, and could be only calculated to disappoint the one appointed to this foreign mission. How much was paid for this special, or any other mission at the anniversary meeting, is not my good fortune to know, and therefore I will not presume to guess. One thing will be recollected by all present, that Bishop Paine, in his missionary address, made this the great point, "the California Mission." He told the congregation that a man must, and would be sent from our Conference, if possible, and called on the people then and there to raise the whole amount, $1000. But if they did not raise all, he proposed variously the sums four, five or six hundred dollars; and perhaps another speaker did the same, I will not say positively. If the whole amount of that collection had fallen in my hands, I would have gone to California. Why it did not, is not my duty to explain. The Treasurer, however, did not feel authorized to send me more than $250, believing this fully as much as was given for the California mission. So much for the first part of the narrative.

After waiting, as above stated, three weeks, and finding I had in hand for this mission, less than half the amount necessary to get me to it, I left New Orleans finally, and went to Aberdeen to see Bishop Paine, to counsel with him and determine my future course. Here my wife was taken sick, and for three or four weeks I had but little hope of her recovery. I spent sleepless nights watching by her side, meanwhile sharing the kindness and hospitality of our beloved Bishop and his family, together with another sweet family, whose attention and solicitude and sympathy I never can forget. May God bless the dear friends of Aberdeen in this world a hundred fold, and in that which is to come with life everlasting. Through mercy my wife was spared, but ere this time it was ascertained that the way to California was so completely blocked up, that to get off before fall would be impracticable. The Bishop still insisted upon having a man from our Conference, if one could be had that would go, but as I had complied with my obligations, and to the utmost instructions, he held me no longer in duty bound to go. I saw that the same reasons that first prompted me to go, still existed, and notwithstanding the thus far signal defeat and mortifying disappointment we had had to endure, I told him that "none of these things moved us." We felt that we belonged to God, and that wherever he appointed we would go, with his assistance, and serve according to the best of our ability. As I was without any other appointment, and as there was no other to offer me then, he concluded, that I might act as a special agent for the California mission until fall, at least, and raise if possible an amount to send a man from our Conference. As soon as the health of my family would justify it, I set out; have made a tour through part of the Conference but owing to a want of previous notice the congregations were small, and not prepared to give. They did, however, subscribe, and will hand it over to the preachers in charge, who will remit to me before the 1st of October next. Will the brethren of the Conference aid in this matter? They have pledged themselves to this.

I ask not contributions in reference to sending me to California. Let the Lord send by whom he will, he shall have my money, my influence, my prayers. Some one ought to go. The Conference ought to be represented in California. We have undertaken to aid in this glorious enterprize. We responded loudly in words and resolutions. Let us correspond in concert of action in the whole matter. "The harvest truly is great, but laborers are few." Shall we not heed the cry of our Western Macedonia? I confess, after sacrificing so much to this end, I did wish to be at the first Conference there, and to be one of the number. I am still willing to go, if desired by my brethren; unless Providentially hindered. I will, if "material aid" is furnished by the Conference in time. I am unwilling, however, to take a dollar from the general fund that might tend to embarrass the treasury or cripple an already existing mission. The whole matter is now before the Church, and it is understood that I am perfectly passive in the hands of brethren, and ready to do such work as may be assigned me by the appointing power. May God guide us in the consideration of this very important matter, and send forth the light and truth of his Gospel, and by the agency of the Holy Ghost, and instrumentality of His word save us all through Jesus Christ, is my prayer.

J. M. Jones.

Columbus, Miss., June 18, 1852.

P. S. Since writing the above it occurs to me that it might not be improper to state a few facts that go to relieve at least some portions of the Conference from the charge of indifference upon the subject of this mission. About the time we commenced soliciting contributions to send our missionary to California, Dr. Schon (the worthy Secretary of the parent society) visited several of our "most important points," making collections for the mission cause, and in his addresses he introduced and dwelt at length upon the California mission so much that many gave in in reference to this very object. To such an extent was this done, that where he had preceded me I made no collection. At Natchez he took (I think the preacher in charge told me) $200, at Yazoo City $104.

Bread vs. Preaching.

A Presiding Elder of one of the Louisiana Districts writes us as below. The state of things on his district is, we fear, too general. There is a radical defect in the present working of our economy, as to the support of the ministry. The evil seems to be growing. Already it is a question with us—How rich a man must be before he can afford to become an itinerant preacher? To use the language of Wesley, in a matter of far less importance, "When rich men become necessary to us, [in the ministry] then farewell to Methodism." But our correspondent speaks in this wise:

"I will say of the district that things move on smoothly—have had no jarring as yet. Our itinerancy, though, is much crippled in this region; most of the preachers are farming, while one at least merchandises, to make something upon which to subsist. As a matter of course their time and attention is much divided, say fully half is given to one and half to the other. I have but small hope that any considerable success will attend Methodism in this country, until our preachers can go fully into the work—their one work—of preaching and saving souls. God send that such a time may speedily arrive. Amen."

Bro. McTyeire: I am now closing my second round; I long to travel once more in Methodist preacher-like style; I am tired of steamboats. My district is near three hundred and fifty miles by water. Sometimes I keep watch-night on some old wharf boat at other times, I hail, but in vain. Fine place this to cultivate patience; but to be put out in the dead hour of the night, away from any house, and not able to see very sure, was most perplexing, but it happened but once. A good chance this to try the extent and volume of my voice. I will not complain; goodness and mercy have followed me all the days of my life.

This whole coast country should be a missionary field, the black population is very dense; much could be done if we had the men. I do think that our Conference, that the Church South, should make more vigorous efforts for the moral elevation of this people. A number of persons have died within the bounds of the district with cholera. How necessary that we be at all times ready! We have had some good meetings—some necessions—but lament that we are not more prosperous. May the Lord revive his work.

Texas Items.

One of the Texas newspapers states that a church in that State, composed of eight communicants, pays its pastor a salary of eight hundred dollars? Where can another instance of equal liberality be found?

A gentleman in Texas has agreed to give one hundred dollars towards supplying every family in that State, for one year, with the American Messenger.

Texas, with a population of about three hundred thousand souls, has forty-three newspapers, nearly all of which are ably conducted. Two are devoted to the cause of religion.

The culture of the sugar cane is being quite successfully prosecuted in Texas. Maj. James P. Caldwell, of Brazoria county, realized as much money from the proceeds of one crop as would purchase the hands engaged in its culture. Major C. never permits any work to be done on his plantation on the Sabbath.

The Maine liquor law has many warm advocates in the Star State who will persevere in agitating public sentiment on this subject.

All the evangelical denominations are flourishing in Texas. An excellent [illegible] spirit exists among the various denominations.

The first Evangelical Lutheran Synod for Texas convened at Victoria May 20. Nine ministers were present.

A fine evangelical tone of spirit prevailed in their proceedings. It was determined to observe the missionary concert prayer meeting on the first Monday evening of every month, and to take up regular collections in behalf of the missionary cause. The Agent of the American Sunday School Union presented to the Synod specimens of the publications, in German, of that Society, which were approved of, and it was resolved to organize Sunday Schools wherever practicable, and supply them with the publications of the A. S. S. Union.

A Presbyterial School has been determined upon by the Presbytery of Eastern Texas to be located in the vicinity of Fredonia, Rusk county.

The Western Texas Presbytery has fixed upon Goliad for their institution of learning.

The Episcopalians of Texas have located an institution of learning at Anderson, Grimes county, to be called St. Paul's College.

The emigration to Texas, during the past season, is estimated at about one hundred and fifty thousand. A much larger emigration is expected next season. The editor of one of the Texas papers says that he is constantly receiving letters from intending emigrants, and that among the most prominent of their inquiries is for lands in the vicinity of churches, schools, and good society. Will landholders notice this fact, and govern themselves accordingly?

Every person intending to emigrate to Texas, or any other new country, should pay for the newspapers of their choice at least one year in advance, and have it directed to their new abode. One gentleman, on arriving in Texas, remarked to a friend that he had paid for his family newspaper for seven years in advance—a good example to other emigrants! Reader, if you have never taken a religious newspaper, and intend emigrating to Texas, make choice of a good one, and pay for it in advance. You may find yourself where you can not hear the Gospel every Sabbath, and in that case your newspaper and Bible will greatly aid you in passing the Sabbath pleasantly and profitably. At all events try it—my word for it you will not repent it. If a parent, subscribe also for Youth's Penny Gazette, Sunday School Visitor, or some other juvenile periodical for your children. Bring also a good supply of religious books.

Bro. McTyeire: The Lord has been with us in Camden, even in Camden, in convicting and converting power. There have been 9 conversions and 24 accessions to our church of late. Most of the converts were adults. The work was a gracious one. To God be all the glory.

Camden is a flourishing place. There are three schools here, of high character—two female and one male; the whole number of students in these schools is about 400. We hope and believe that what the Lord has done for us here is only an omen of what he intends doing. Pray for us, brethren; pray for the Church in Camden.

Paris Circuit, E. Texas Conf.

Dear Bro. McTyeire: I have some cheering news to communicate to you. The Great Head of the Church is still reviving and carrying on his work of converting and sanctifying sinners, in the bounds of Paris Circuit, as well as elsewhere. We had a season of refreshing from the presence of the Lord at our second Quarterly Meeting, which was held at Paradise, twelve miles south, on the 17th and 18th of April. There were 11 accessions to the church, and a goodly number professed conversion and were happy in the Saviour's love. We closed a two days meeting at Wesleyan Chapel, on the 25th April; ten joined the Church; several conversions. At Allen Chapel, May 16, were 3 conversions and 8 accessions. A protracted meeting at Fair Prospect closed May 25, 11 joined the Church, conversions. God be praised for the good this part of his vineyard. "The Lord is good—his mercy endureth for ever."

Obituary Notices.

Died—On the 5th inst., near Raymond, Hinds county, Miss., Mrs. Elizabeth Jane, wife of John L. W. Bullock, and daughter of William H. Catchings, of Simpson county.

Sister B. was born on the 6th of March, 1803; joined the Methodist Church in 1843; married on the 2d October, 1845. She has left a deeply bereaved husband and three small children to mourn her loss. As a wife, she was kind and confiding; as a mother, fond and affectionate; as a friend, amiable and obliging; as a christian, her walk and conversation was unexceptionable; but it was only in her last moments, that the fullness of the love of God was displayed to her soul. Her affliction was severe and long, and she bore it with patient resignation; not a murmur escaped her lips. Her last moments were spent in prayer for her husband, her children, her brothers and sister, and her servants. All who surrounded the couch of the dying received a parting exhortation. Her body we laid in the grave—her soul has gone to the Paradise of God.

Raymond, June 17th, 1852.

Died—12th May, Rosalie, in the 7th year of her age, daughter of James W. and Elizabeth A. Hopkins, of this city. From her infancy she was a child of suffering, and her life has been a most striking illustration of parental solicitude and endurance. Night after night her mother kept watch beside her till the last pale star had set; and still she was there to greet her child's first waking, and quiet her cries of pain. These have been her mother's tasks. She now exclaims, "O, my Rose! my Rose! Has vain affection borne with all for this? Why were you given me?" Ah! yes; truly, 'God gives us love; things to love he lends.' "

"Yet again we hope to meet thee,
When the day of life hath fled,
There in Heaven, with joy to greet thee,
Where no parting tear is shed."

W. H. A.

Died—In Macon county, Ala., May 5, infant son of S. H. D. and Elizabeth Bell, nged two weeks and two days.

So fades the lovely, blooming flower;
Frail, smiling solace of an hour—
So soon our transient comforts fly,
And pleasure only blooms to die.

One of those devotees to mammon once received a lesson from an humble follower, who did not seem to pay him the possessor of the purse, sufficient homage, and said: "Do you know, sir, that I am worth a hundred thousand pounds?" "Yes," said the irritated, but not broken-spirited respondent, "I do; and I know that it is all you are worth."

It may be a fanciful notion, but I think the ordinary salutations of a people indicate, in a measure, their philosophy of living. The French greeting is literally—How do you carry yourself?"—a query suggestive of egotism; that of the Italians—"How do you stand?"—a high breathes of an existence in the immediate—so characteristic of the South; while our favorite phrase is—"How do you get along?"—at once calling up an external and distant goal—success.

A good story is related of Ex-Governor Briggs, of Massachusetts, that many years ago, when approaching with a young man about drinking and urging him to abandon the practice, the young man agreed to leave off if the Governor would leave off wearing a shirt collar. The latter agreed to the novel requisition, and, in consequence of the bargain, has never worn a collar since.

The Industrial Fair.—The Permanent Executive Committee of the great Industrial Fair, to be held here in February, 1854, has elected its officers as follows: C. Rosatlus, President; G. Allan, Vice-President; M. M. Cohen, Corresponding Secretary; J. B. Walton, Recording Secretary; and Samuel Jamison, Secretary.

Oration by Senator Soule.—Hon. Pierre Soule, our distinguished Senator, is to deliver a Fourth of July oration in Philadelphia, in compliance with the request of a clergyman of that city. The proceeds are to be applied to a charitable institution.

John Randolph's Body Servant.—The Troy (Ohio) Times states that John, the faithful body servent of the late John Randolph, of Virginia, died near that place recently, and was buried on the grounds of the Randolph Colony, on Stillwater, in Miami county.

Japan.—The area of the Japanese Empire is said to be 260,000 square miles, which makes it larger than France and England put together. The population is reckoned by the American writers, and probably without exaggeration, at thirty millions; less civilized, no doubt, than the Chinese, but a good deal more hardy and warlike.

Bridge Across the Savannah.—An advertisement in the Augusta Constitutionalist invites proposals until the 10th of July next, for building five stone piers and two abutments for a bridge across Savannah river or near the city of Augusta, the contractor furnishing all the materials and of the best quality.

Persians in California.—The San Francisco correspondent of the New York Journal of Commerce, in his letter of the 6th of May, says: "At present there are a few Persians in our city. They attracted considerable attention on the Plaza last week, while engaged in worshipping the Sun."

Mormonism in the Sandwich Islands.—Elder Wm. J. Perkins writes from Lahina, Sandwich Islands, January 19, 1852, that the work was progressing with rapidity; natives and whites inquiring; that Brother Geo. C. Cannon had baptized twenty-one the day previous, and that there was a general call from all quarters for Brother Cannon to come and preach to them, as he understands the language. The natives are surprised that the Mormons have baptized so many whites in so short a time, as the Missionaries had only added one to their congregation since they commenced, which is many years. They tell the Missionaries that they "have not told them the truth." The Missionaries pronounce heavy curses on the heads of the elders.

Ether vs. Lions.—Dr. Charles T. Jackson administered a pound and a half of ether to a lion at Boston, and removed his claws during the twenty minutes that the animal was insensible.

British Ignorance of America.—Mr. Walter, a member of Parliament, and principal proprietor of the London Times, stated recently in the House of Commons, that the United States Senators were elected for life. The Times endorsed the error. The strangest fact of all (says Mr. Walsh) is that no member of the House corrected it.

Dry Weather.—The Woodville (Miss.) Republican says that the continued drouth has nearly ruined the corn crop in that vicinity, and is seriously damaging the cotton. The heat is oppressive.

Illness of a Rothschild.—Letters of the 24th ult. from Frankfort-on-the-Main, report that M. Anselmo del Rothschild, the eldest of the brothers, the famous bankers, is lying extremely ill.

Reaping Machines.—The Prairie Farmer thinks that not less than 3500 new reaping machines will be put in use in the northwest this present season—equal to the labor of 17,500 men.

An Acquisition.—The school fund of St. Louis, the Times says, recently received an acquisition of five cents, the amount of fine imposed on a member of the bar, by a judge, for contempt.

Liberal.—The military companies of St. Louis have contributed $1000 to the relief of L. Speigel, who lost his arms by the premature discharge of a cannon in that city a few days since.

A Pretty Present.—Count Demidoff has arrived in Rome, from Florence, to present the Pope with a cross in malachite, value 30,000 francs, about $6000, extracted from his Siberian mines.

A Monster Petition.—A petition was presented in the New Hampshire Legislature, on the 9th inst., in favor of the Maine Law, signed by 24,598 voters, and 47,776 females and minors.

Large Reward.—The City Council of Charleston has authorized the Mayor to offer a reward of $1000 to any person who may give information leading to conviction of any person engaged in an incendiary attempt.

A Strike.—The foundry-men of Louisville have struck for the ten hour system. It appears that one firm, before the strike, unhesitatingly acceded to the wishes of their employees. The firm is Messrs. Lawson & Frank.

Religious Freedom.—It is stated that Gen. Urquiza, who succeeds Rosas as Governor of Buenos Ayres, has authorized the reading of the Bible in schools, and made liberal appropriations for their support.

Snow Storm in June.—The Pittsburgh Gazette says that a very severe storm was experienced on Seven Mile Island, in the Ohio, below that city, on Wednesday night, the 9th inst. Snow fell quite heavily for some time.

Railroad Subscription.—The people of Wheeling, Va., have voted in favor of the city's subscribing for $250,000 to the capital stock of the Marietta and Cincinnati Railroad Company.

Too Many Horses.—Horses are said to have become so numerous in Brazil as to be a serious trouble. The Emperor has therefore issued a decree authorizing citizens to shoot brood mares wherever found.

Rainwater vs. Cholera.—It has been fully ascertained, says the report of a French medical commission, both at Paris and elsewhere, that rainwater is a prophylactic of cholera, and that this disease has never proved an epidemic in any city where rain water is exclusively used.

A Test Case.—The Steamer Atlantic will be fined $500 at St Louis for taking to that port a greater number of passengers than their laws allow, and the case is to be appealed for the purpose of testing the legality of the city ordinances on the subject.

Determined to Fight it out.—The Directors of the Art Union of New York have determined to appeal from the decision made against the Institution by the Superior Court. They are blest with full pockets, and can stand litigation.

Life of Bolivar.—The New York Courier and Enquirer says, the public have ground to expect in the course of the season the first part of the Life of Bolivar, by Gen. Mosquera, which will probably appear in English and Spanish, several chapters being nearly ready for the press.

Partly Thickly Settled.—There are three hundred and twenty-eight persons to the square mile in Essex county, Massachusetts—a denser population than can be found on any tract of land of the same size in the United States.

For Australia.—At the time the Baltic sailed there were thirty-one vessels up at London for Australia, and seven at Liverpool. The Commissioners of Emigration intend to send off eight ships per month for the next six months.

Death on Cockroaches.—We find in an exchange a very simple and said to be a very efficacious recipe for getting rid of cockroaches. It says that if cucumber peel be placed upon the floors of rooms which they frequent during the night, they will greedily suck the poison from it, and die soon after retreating to their holes.

A Long Plank.—A vessel arrived lately at Portsmouth, England, on board of which was a plank which is stated to exceed in size any piece of wood yet cut. It was intended for the World's Fair, but it was too late for the purpose, no vessel being within reach which could accommodate it. This plank is 248 feet long, 22 inches broad, and 6 inches in thickness.

Foreign News by the Europa.

England.—A reduction of 1s. 4d. per cwt. in the import duties on foreign refined sugar will come into operation on the 5th July, reducing the duty to 10s. 4d.

Ships ran Australia.—There are now forty-four vessels advertised in the Post-office Packet List to take out private ship letter bags to Australia, and all of which are to sail by the middle of July next. Thirteen of these vessels are for Sydney, and twenty-two for Melbourne and Port Phillip.

Steam to Australia.—On Tuesday the Australian steamship, belonging to the Australian Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, left the Thames on her maiden voyage for Australia. She is 1400 tons burthen, worked by the screw, and carries out upwards of £200,000 in specie, besides 180 passengers, of whom 48 are first-class passengers.

The Lobos Islands.—At the monthly meeting of the Council of the Royal Agricultural Society, on Wednesday, the subject of the Lobos Islands was brought forward for discussion, and it was resolved that a deputation from the society wait upon the Earl of Derby, to represent to him the importance of taking every possible means to effect a reduction in the price of guano. It seems to be the opinion of jurists, that the claim of Peru to the Lobos Islands is not based upon any just title, since those islands furnish neither shelter nor sustenance for a single human being.

Completion of the Submarine Telegraph to Ireland. A submarine telegraph between the coasts of England and Ireland is now in accomplished fact, and an event pregnant with interest as regards the future welfare of this country. On Tuesday morning, at 4 o'clock, the Britannia steamer started from Holyhead with the telegraph cable on board, preceded by her Majesty's steamer Prospero, a vessel furnished by the Admiralty, as a pilot to the expedition. The steamers proceeded at a low rate of speed, varying from four to six miles an hour, laying out the wire with the greatest care and precision as they receded from the English coast; and at length, after a passage of a little more than 16 hours, and without the occurrence of any contretemps, arrived at Howth Harbor, amid the cheers of those who had assembled to witness their approach. The moment the Britannia had arrived at her destination, and communicated the fact to Holyhead that the Irish shore was reached, the final grand test was applied to the telegraphic cable by connecting the wire with one of the ship's folded guns, and passing the word "fire!" to Holyhead. The answer was the immediate discharge of the gun on board the Britannia. The hour was then just half-past eight o'clock.

The work had been performed in little more than 18 hours! Messages were now rapidly interchanged, and a salute of the Britannia's guns fired from Holyhead. A letter arrived in Dublin, directed to a gentleman who had left for Holyhead by the mail-day steamer, and whose presence was immediately required in London. A message was sent to seek him out. Within half an hour he was discovered, and he responded, "I am here." "You are wanted in London." "I shall start by the next train." Another hour and the cable was ashore, and the connection completed with the land wires, and indicators at the Dublin terminus of the Dundalk Railway, in Amiens street, were conveying with these at the terminus of the Chester and Holyhead Railway in Holyhead.

A perfect system of electric telegraph communication is now in use between the various offices within the Bank of England.

The Orleans Property.—The advocates of the Council of State, M. P. Fabre and M. Matthieu Bodet, charged to defend the appeal of the Princes of the Orleans family against the decrees relative to their property, have published a memoir, from which it appears that they intend to rely on four points, viz: 1. That the princes possess the property in virtue of the deed of the 7th of August, 1830, and that that property could not return to the State before the death of August; 2. That they are heirs of the King, their father for that part of Neuilly which was purchased subsequent to 1830, and of Madame Adelaide for part of the domain of Monceaux; 3. That they have captained. This metal, instead of having its parts soldered or brazed together, presents a uniform and regular surface, and the tubes are in all respects equal to any ever imported.

Austria.

The Vienna Presse, of the 27th May, contains a long and sarcastic article on the people of the United States generally, and Mr. Webster in particular. It says that in consequence of Mr. Webster's speech at the Kossuth banquet, Mrs. Hulsemann was directed to break off diplomatic relations with our Government. The Presse, in the infinitude of its wisdom, says that the present President, Mr. Polk, disapproved of Mr. Webster's conduct, and would have had him retract if he could. It considers that Austria has acted in a very dignified manner and preserved her honor. Mr. Hulsemann was expected in Vienna on the 28th ult.

Miscellaneous.

Fergus O'Connor, the crazy M. P., has been playing all sorts of pranks in London since his return from the United States. He one day visited all the lawcourts in Westminster Hall, and interrupted the business of each for a time by his strange conduct. At the mere mention of an officer he would at once leave.

An accountant named Goodson was killed at Manchester on Wednesday, by falling from his balloon.

The notorious Madame Lafarge, who has been for some years confined in a maison de santé at Remy, has just received a free pardon.

Seyd Pascha, hereditary Prince of Egypt, and eldest surviving son of Mehemit Ali, had arrived at Marseilles on board a French ship of war. The ostensible cause of his visit is to recruit his health at the mineral springs at Mont d'Or.

Cartigny, the well-known comic actor, is dead.

The President will take up his residence at St. Cloud immediately, and will come into Paris to attend Cabinet Councils and Receptions, which will be held at the Tuileries.

Hurrah for Yankee Enterprise!—The following are two statements which must be grateful to every American proud of his country. The following is part of a letter from Australia to a merchant in Liverpool, dated January 27:

"The Yankees will soon get masters of this market if we do not get a better line of ships or steam communication between here and England. The first clipper ship from the United States arrived here last week. She left Boston five days after the news of our discovery was known; and made the passage here in ninety-five days, bringing news from England up to the 4th of October, while by the direct way we have no later dates than the 18th of September. A portion of her cargo consisted of wooden buckets for the miners. I think we shall soon be sufficiently supplied with this article direct from America. Please, therefore, not to send us any buckets of this description."

But we take another statement from the Boston Journal:

"A large establishment for the manufacture of linen fabrics from imported flax is now erecting at Fall River, Mass., under the direction of N. B. Borden, Esq. This is the only factory of the kind in the United States. Another carpet factory is to be put up forthwith at Lawrence, and at Hadley Falls an extensive cotton mill will soon be commenced. Besides these, we have some enterprises nearer home which are worthy of notice, as illustrative of Yankee perseverance and energy in the introduction of industrial works. At Somerville, in the immediate vicinity of Boston, a factory has been started for the manufacture of locomotive boiler tubes. This is called the American Tube Company, and the property is owned by four or five capitalists. The tubes made at this establishment are of copper or brass, and of a very beautiful description, differing from those here to here made in this country, not only in the complete formation of the tube, but in the external and internal finish of the article. This metal, instead of having its parts soldered or brazed together, presents a uniform and regular surface, and the tubes are in all respects equal to any ever imported.

St. Tammany.—St. Tammany is, we believe, our only American saint. He was the chief of an Indian tribe which inhabited Pennsylvania while that State was still a colony, and excited so much respect by his virtues and his exploits, both in saving the white and Indian, that after his death he was canonized, and the day of his birth, the first of May, regarded as a holiday. "All Christian countries," says the Savannah Republican, "have their particular saint. England has her St. George; Scotland her St. Andrew; Ireland her St. Patrick; France her St. Crispan, and Spain her Santa Jago. In this country, we have St. Tammany. Throughout the Revolutionary war, the natal day of this saint was observed with great respect by the army, as well as by the people. It was not till Mr. Jefferson's administration, when General Dearborn was Secretary of War, that the observance of it by the army was dispensed with, and the change was made then only with the view of carrying out the system of retrenchment which the President sought to introduce in the administration of the Government. The first fort built at St. Mary's, Camden county, and perhaps the first in the State, was called Fort St. Tammany. A gentleman now residing in this city was present while a boy at a celebration by the officers and soldiers stationed at the fort, of St. Tammany's Day. The May-pole, used on the occasion, was a tree, with its branches and bark removed; and around that the soldiers danced and celebrated the day."

The Upas Tree of the Isthmus.—The Panama Herald gives the following description of the Isthmus Upas tree: "Some time since we saw some comments in the United States papers upon a so-called Upas tree in Panama, which we do not recollect) stating that a man named James Linn had been found dead under a tree on the Chorgona road, and that upon examining the tree the native pronounced it highly poisonous, producing death to any one who should sleep under it.

Riding out upon the Plains, a few miles from the city, the other day, with a friend, we had the fortune to have several of these trees pointed out to us. As far around each as its branches extended the grass was dead—the ground almost bare, while all beyond it was fresh and green. Each tree seemed to form a circle around it by the appearance presented by the dead and live grass. They were all alike in this respect, and the trees all of the same appearance and character.

Occasionally the skull of a dead mule or other animal were to be found lying either directly under the trees or near by, indicating the effects of its deadly poison. Anxious as we felt to procure a branch and bring it to this city, that its fluids might be subjected to a chemical analysis, we were deferred by the threatening appearance they presented.

We have no doubt at all that Linn came to his death in the manner described. Nor do we entertain a doubt as to the nature of the tree being as poisonous as the deadly Upas of the Nile.

It is wholesome and bracing, for the mind to have its faculties kept on the stretch. It is like the effect of a walk in Switzerland, upon the body. Reading an essay of Bacon's, for instance, or a chapter of Aristotle, or of Butler, if it be well and thoughtfully read, is much like climbing up a hill, and may do one the same sort of good. But the tortoise to run against the hare; and, even if he does not overtake it, he will do more than he ever did previously—more than he would ever have thought himself capable of doing. Set the hare to run with the tortoise, he falls asleep. [Gazette at Truth.

New York, Wednesday, June 23.

The Canard steamer Niagara has arrived at Halifax, bringing dates from Liverpool to the 12th instant, four days later than the intelligence brought by the Franklin. The following is a summary of her commercial accounts.

The demand in the Cotton market has continued good during the week, and the sales since the departure of the Europa embrace 60,000 bales, of which exporters have taken 12,000, and speculators 22,000 bales.

Prices have been full for all qualities, and for some descriptions an advance of ⅛d. has been realized. The authorized quotations now are: For Fair Orleans 6⅛; Middling Orleans 5⅜; Fair Uplands 5⅞; and Middling Uplands 5¼d. ℔ lb.

The sales of yesterday and to-day reach 22,000 bales.

Flour has been rather heavy, and the closing rates are, for Western Canal 20s. and for Ohio 20s. 6d. ℔ bbl.

Corn has declined, and is now quoted at 30s 6d. for Yellow, and 29s. 6d. ℔ quarter for White. Lard has advanced to 52s. ℔ cwt.

Money continues abundant, and the closing rate for Consols is 101¼.

Congressional Proceedings.

Washington, June 23.

The House yesterday engaged itself in debating the bill granting lands to various States for Railroad and Educational purposes; after which it took up the California Mint bill, which, after being amended, was passed.

Washington, June 24.

The House to-day has been engaged in the contested election case of Mr. Fuller, a member from Pennsylvania, whose seat is claimed by Mr. Wright. After which it took up and discussed the Senate's amendments to the Deficiency bill. The bill granting land to eleven States for Railroad and Educational purposes was previously engrossed.

In the Senate, the joint resolution accepting the portrait of Henry Clay was passed, and also a bill prohibiting Clerks of the United States Courts from practising as Attorneys at Law.

Congressional Proceedings.—Washington, June 23.—In the House to-day a message was received from the President relative to an indemnity to Spanish subjects, for injuries suffered in their property by the riots in New Orleans and Key West, in 1851.

Whig Convention.—Baltimore, June 22.—The whig Convention, previous to adjournment, fixed upon Louisville, Ky., as the place for holding the next National Convention of the whig party. [Pic Delta.

An Anaconda Loose.—A letter writer in Paris, writing to a New York paper, tells the following tough one:

"The Hippodrome is preparing a spectacle entitled the 'Christian Martyr.' The wild beasts that are to figure in the performance have just arrived from Africa, and number, some twenty in all. They came by railroad from Havre, and in the same train was a box containing an enormous boa constrictor. By some unexplained mystery, the box managed to get out on the way up, and sliding from one car to another twined himself two or three times round the locomotive. The engineer had the presence of mind to shut off the steam, and then he and the stoker, more dead than alive, clambered back on to the train. In due time they came to a stop, and M. Fleert, the keeper of the animals, sallied forth with two Moors, his assistants, to recapture the horrible reptile. It seems the animal was tolerably tamed, and knew his master. So, after a two hour's chase, he allowed himself to be caught and caged. Why could not this boa have had a special train? The biggest of all boas—Monsequent —, had a private conveyance last month, when he went to Sologne. The constrictor has not been treated with the respect due to his rank."

Sale of a Steamship.—The steamship Reindeer was sold at auction in Philadelphia on the 12th inst., and was bid in by the builder at her full at $40,000. Previous to the sale, notice was given that the purchaser would be held liable for the passage money on tickets sold in New York, and damages.

A Gay Pair.—The Fort Wayne (Ind.) Sentinel announces the marriage of Mr. Peter Gibson, aged 104 years, with Miss Smith Suitz, aged 34 years.

The following sublime couplet by the distinguished poet, Peter Pindar, Esq., applies most beautifully to this case:

That winds its tendrils round a rotton stick."

Death from the Bite of a Snake.—The St. Louis Times of the 18th says: "We learn that while a man and his little son were walking in the graveyard on Franklin Avenue, day before yesterday in the forenoon, a rattlesnake got on the arm of the little boy. The man, in attempting to brush it off, was bitten and died yesterday afternoon.

Low Rivers.—The Mobile Advertiser of Tuesday says: The Azile, Captain McCartney, arrived yesterday from Demopolis. She reports the river as having fallen very rapidly since her last trip. The Azile left last Tuesday (the 15th) for Gainesville, but only succeeded in reaching Demopolis, and was even then much delayed by the great scarcity of water upon the bars.

The Mormons.—The New York Herald publishes a long communication signed "Iowa," relative to the Mormons of Deseret, and also publishes the remonstrance of William Smith, (brother to Joe Smith) and others, against the admission of Deseret into the Union. The latter document is exceedingly bitter, and seeks into tioverour Brigham Young hugely.

Literary.—The Countess D'Orsay, who lived unhappily with her dandy husband, has published a novel in French entitled L'Ombre du Bonheur, The Shadow of Happiness. She, worse fated than Peter Schlemihl, who lost only his own shadow, has now lost even that of happiness. The work appears to be genuinely French in conception and treatment, and of no remarkable brilliancy or power.

The New-York Crystal Palace.—It is now said that only $184,200 has been subscribed toward the fund of $200,000 required for the erecting of the Crystal Palace. The directors calculate on "140 per cent. as the profits of the concern, and the building on hand, at the close of the first season, with power to keep open the exhibition during the continuance of the lease." These are somewhat sanguine expectations.

A Predicament.—Some days since, a white man sold two free negroes in St. Louis, divided the money with the negroes, and then they all decamped. One of the negroes was arrested soon after, with his share of the proceeds in his possession. He was brought before the Recorder, when his purchaser appeared and claimed him as lawful property, bought and paid for. On the other hand, if the negro established his freedom, an action would lie against him for obtaining money under false pretences, his pseudo owner becoming prosecutor. He did not make the attempt, and the Recorder having nothing to do with the question of ownership, he was taken possession of by the gentleman who had fairly purchased him.

Horace Walpole says: "In my youth I thought of writing a satire on mankind, but in my age I think I should write an apology for them."

Zealous men are ever displaying to you the strength of their belief, while judicious men are showing you the grounds of it.

The Stride of Pestilence.

We publish below an account of the raging and ravaging pestilence or plague, which visited all Europe and Asia, six centuries ago, and which spread death and desolation in its train. It is a tearful record, but will be read with singular interest by all.

In contemplating the subject, we are reminded of the theory of Dr. James Abernethy, of Glasgow, who, two hundred years ago, wrote an ingenious and most valuable work, the object of which was to prove, that in every case, where the prevalence of the plague has been known, it could be distinctly traced to fear, and a corresponding panic. Although Dr. Abernethy was ridiculed, laughed at and sneered at for his pains, we long ago adopted his theory; and subsequent experience has taught us that it is to be implicitly relied on.

In this country in the year 1832, we were thrown into a state of unexampled panic, by its appearance on our shores. The utmost excitement not once prevailed; and, it was pretended that the march of the fell monster disease, could be as regularly and distinctly marked, from its outbreak at Montreal, as that of an invading army. It was said that it appeared in New York, at the precise moment prognosticated by the learned doctors. The consequence was, that that good city was thrown into a state of fearful and fitful excitement—thousands fled in a single day—physicians abandoned their patients, and clergymen precipitately quit their flocks to escape to the mountains as places of refuge. Whilst this state of alarm existed, the common thoroughfares of the city were barricaded and blocked up—hospitals were established in almost every ward of the city, into which hundreds and thousands, the victims of fear and panic, were thrust to die. Had they retained their equanimity and placidity of temperament, they had been left strangers to disease.

In the year 1846, somebody predicted, inasmuch as the season opened with unusual heat, that the Asiatic cholera would visit us again. Some other somebody endorsed the prediction. People sickened in the obscure and loathsome sections of the city; and, some wiseacre gave it as his opinion that they died of Asiatic cholera. Seth Greer was called on to report on the subject. He said that the defunct did not die of cholera, but something very like it. "Very like a whale!" After a few days he decided that the "Asiatic cholera asphixoid" was among us. At the instant, although there has not an intelligent man in the city, who could place the least confidence in Seth Greer's opinions, a terrific panic ensued; in less than a month's time, the weekly bills of mortality were swelled to fifteen hundred deaths. In the course of three months, upwards of ten thousand people were hurried to their graves, through Seth Greer's report, and the operations of the gallipots. It is to be hoped that the people of New York will never again be driven into a similar state of folly and infatuation. But, we proceed to our extract:

The Black Death.—This pestilence, which received from the Northern nations of Europe the significant appellation of the Black Death, and which was termed by the Italians the Great Mortality, (La Mortalega Grand,) had, at the period of its invasion of England, devastated the whole of Asia, the greater part of Africa, and South and Central Europe; and subsequently its influence extended over the North of Europe, and probably also Greenland—for it is to the ravages of this plague that the complete destruction of the first Norwegian Colonies in Greenland is to be ascribed. During the prevalence of the plague in Europe, the communications with these colonies became entirely interrupted, and after its subsidence, when the shores of Greenland were again visited, not a trace of the colonists could be found—these spared by the pestilence having doubtless been extirpated by the natives.

The mortality was frightful. In Cairo it is estimated that from 10 to 15,000 died daily, when the plague was raging with its greatest violence. In China more than 13,000,000 are said to have died. The Tartar kingdoms were nearly depopulated. "In Aleppo 500 died daily; 22,000 people and most of the animals were carried off in Gaza within six weeks. Cyprus lost almost all its inhabitants; and ships without crews were seen in the Mediterranean, and afterwards in the North Sea, driving about and spreading the plague wherever they went on shore. It was reported to Pope Clement at Avignon that throughout the East, probably with the exception of China, 23,840,000 people had fallen victims to the plague."

Of all the estimates of the number of lives lost in Europe, the most probable is that altogether one-fourth of the inhabitants were carried off. Now, if Europe at present contains 210,000,000 inhabitants, the population, not to take a higher estimate, which might be easily justified, amounted to at least 150,000,000 in the sixteenth century. It may, therefore, be assumed, without exaggeration, that Europe lost during the Black Death 35,000,000 of inhabitants.

In the most serious cases the invasion of this disease was indicated by spitting of blood, and death in some cases occurred almost immediately, in others in twelve hours, and within two days at the latest. It was evidently contagious. "Every spot which the sick had touched, their breath, their clothes, spread the contagion; and, as in all other places, the attendants and friends who were either blind to their danger, or heroically despised it, fell a sacrifice to their sympathy. Even the eyes of the patient were considered as sources of contagion, which had the power of action at a distance, whether on account of their unwonted lustre, or the distortion which they always suffer in plague, or whether, in conformity with the ancient notion, according to which the sight was considered the bearer of a demonical enchantment."

It first broke out in the county of Dorset in August, whence it advanced through Devon, Somersetshire and Bristol, and from thence to Gloucester, Oxford and London, reaching the latter place in three months from its appearance, and probably few if any places escaped.

Most of the great cities suffered incredible losses; above all, Yarmouth, in which 7052 died; Bristol, Oxford, Norwich, Leicester, York and London, buried upwards of 50,000 corpses, arranged in layers in large pits. It is said that in the whole country scarce a tenth part remained alive; but this estimate is evidently too high. Smaller losses were sufficient to cause these convulsions, whose consequences were felt for some centuries, in a false impulse given to civil life, and whose indirect influence, unknown to the English, has perhaps extended to modern times.

Morals were deteriorated everywhere, and the service of God was, in a great measure, laid aside; for, in many places, the churches were deserted, being bereft of their priests. The instruction of the people was impeded; covetousness became general; and when tranquility was restored, the great increase of lawyers was astonishing, to whom the endless disputes regarding inheritance offered a rich harvest. The want of priests, too, throughout the country, operated very detrimentally upon the people, (the lower class being most exposed to the ravages of the plague, whilst the houses of the nobility were, in proportion, more spared,) and it was no compensation that whole bands of ignorant laymen crowded into the monastic orders, that they might participate in the respectability of the priesthood, and in the rich heritages which fell to the church from all quarters. The sittings of parliament, of the King's Bench, and of most of the other courts, were suspended as long as the malady raged.

Ireland was much less heavily visited than England. The disease seems to have scarcely reached the mountainous districts of that kingdom; and Scotland too would, perhaps, have remained free, had not the Scots availed themselves of the discomfiture

The New Orleans Christian Advocate.

...as work. The brig has been told of our strength, and will probably come out and give us a chance to take her in open fight. It is too late to cut her out now, and to engage under the guns of the battery might be called rash by our rulers. After the men have had breakfast, I will take her if she comes outside. Quartermaster, keep the prize on our lee quarter, and shorten sail if you find that we are getting away from her." And so saying he threw off his hat and lay down in a hammock hung for him between two of the quarter-deck guns.

"Quartermaster Hunter," said a quartergunner, "what do you make of the old man? He's gone to sleep, like a trooper's horse, all standing, and means to wake up and fight that heavy craft the sailors of the last prize sold us of. Aint he mad?"

"No, na," said the big-whiskered Scot, who, from being the most athletic and faithful fellow on board, was the Captain's fancy man; "Na, na, if we ha to fight a wee bit it will na hurt us, we ha been playin' and scrimmagin long enaw."

"Scrimmage, is it," said Brown, the first speaker; "do you call it scrimmage to take those two big letter O marks—both twice as big as us. Powder and shot! what do you call a fight then?"

"I ca Trafalgar a fight and Ahoukir a fight, when we had our eighty's matched wi' eighty's, each chooein' a bird and peckin at it—an peckin it by the hour."

"Well, but that's no sign," said Brown; "you fought man agin man, and gun agin gun, and now look at that are fellow sheetin' home his topsails, and say if he aint more nor a match for the likes of us?"

They were now joined by several of the petty officers and men, who, mustering upon the forecastle, watched closely the enemy's movements, and gave their opinions as to the probable result of an engagement. All except Hunter were evidently alarmed at the prospect before them, and tried hard to persuade him to join them in carrying a request to the Commander that he would not engage an enemy of such an overwhelming force.

"What for should I gang wi' ye?" said Hunter; I ha' as many lives as the Captain, and I'll warrant we've as many friends in hell as he has."

This profound reasoning did not suit the intellectual minds of the group, and it was determined that a boatswain's mate, captain of the forecastle and a marine, should compose the deputation. It was delayed until after breakfast, in the hope that it might prove unnecessary.

Meanwhile the Captain slept as soundly as if pillowed on down, receiving the reports of the enemy's manœuvres with a simple "Very well," and sleeping again.

Eight bells were reported to be struck, the sentries were relieved, the hammocks had been stowed, the decks made clean and spotless, the sails sheeted home, and every thing done with as much regularity as if no enemy were in sight. The men were hardly seated round their messkids when the Captain stepped from under the sail which had been spread over his hammock as an awning, and, casting a quick glance aloft and along the decks, touched his hat and hade me "good morning," at the same time thanking me for the first refreshing sleep he had had for several nights, and playfully complimenting me on my skill as a sailor.

"But, Doctor," said he, "how is it you have run away from the prize? See where she is, hull down, astern!"

The fact was, we had been so busy with our thoughts of the "morning's danger" and the enemy's movements, that we had forgotten the prize altogether.

It was now, however, apparent that the brig-of-war had given up the idea of overtaking us, which had at first seemed his object, as we sailed too fast for him, and was making for our prize to console himself with it.

When the men had finished their breakfast, the word was passed "all hands make sail; clear away lower topmast and topgallant studding-sails of both sides."

And away we flew down towards the enemy, who by this time was lying to in company with our prize, about ten miles to leeward. The hands were now ordered to clear ship for action. Yards were slung, and the sides stoppered with chain grapnels carried to the yard-arms; shot passed up, and every thing with a rapidity only gained by constant practice.

As my duty had heretofore confined me to the cockpit when we were in action, I felt a great curiosity to see how things went on deck for once, and accordingly asked leave to remain on deck until my services were required below. Our Commodore reluctantly consented, but recommended me to go into the maintop, where I should be out of the reach of splinters.

We were nearing the enemy fast. The deputation to wait on the Captain stood abreast the mainmast, and were hooked by the greater part of the crew, some grumbling threats, some swearing, some wanting grog, others talking of taking the vessel; all loud, boisterous, in short, in open mutiny. The Captain walked stately and composedly into their midst, struck a blow or two with the flat of his cutlass over the heads and ears of the ringleaders, who were stunned, and fell as if dead. He then ordered the men to their stations to shorten sail, and, beckoning to me, said, "Doctor, take these fellows down and bandage their heads quickly, and send them up to me; I shall want their services in about five minutes."

"Do you hear, you sirs? If you are not at your guns in five minutes, you'll hear from me again."

The wounds were dressed and the men at their posts in due time. I heard, as I bound up their wounds, our commander's battle-speech. It came to my ears in superhuman tones, being shouted through a speaking-trumpet made of very thin silver or bell-metal, never used except in actions.

"Lads! I am going to take that brig. Now, mark! if you skulk; if you hang back when I call for boarders; if you let the rascally Brazilian get a foothold on this deck, I put a watch to the magazine. Remember! I never yet told you a falsehood, and, as I hope for God's mercy, I never will.

This was followed by three hearty cheers from the crew, which had hardly ceased before the command was given to take in sail, and never was the order more promptly obeyed. It seemed less than a minute before I reached the deck, when I found all done; the sails, booms and gear all down, the fore-hatch and the gratings laid on.

As I reached the top, the enemy gave a broadside, which would have annihilated our vessel had it been lower; as it was, it came through the topsails, literally tearing them clear from their bolt-ropes. We continued our course again, having yawed to receive the salute, when he wore, and gave us his larboard battery, which, like the former, went over without material damage except to the leg of the captain of the foretop, which it took away. Of course I left my exalted station, and that with right good will, while the wounded man coolly made a bowline of the topgallant halliards, and lowered himself to the deck. I applied the tourniquet on deck, for he would not consent to go below. The enemy was wearing ship to give us the third broadside, when, as he fell off stern to, we opened, raking with grape and canister, and as he came to the wind, he had fore-reached, so that his shot went ahead, and our bow came abreast his mainmast. Our grapnels secured him. The marines on the forecastle soon drove his men from the after division, while ours gave it, well-told, under his quarter. This was but for a moment. He rallied and prepared to board over our bows; we called and repelled boarders; but his numbers were yet too great to admit of our following him. Again he rallied and boarded—got possession of the bowsprit-rigging and forecastle. Our commander—in a white hat, to distinguish him—was left alone to keep back the enemy, for the men had fled aft. At sight of this, he ran aft, took a gun-match as he passed along, and shouted, "Go forward, for your lives, or this goes to the magazine."

The men cheered, and, with a rush, drove the enemy from the decks—some back to their vessel, some into the sea. Ours followed the former and a brisk rattling of small arms and clashing of cutlasses ensued. The cannon were left unmanned, excepting that of Quartermaster Hunter, which every now and then would heave in a coolly directed shot, which was sure to tell. He sent two shot into her rudder, one striking between the rudder and stern-post, rendered her helm useless.

An officer of the enemy threw a boarding-pike at our captain, which whizzed close to him, and fixed itself into the bowsprit bitts. It was drawn from thence, and returned with awful interest, taking the officer in the back of the neck, and literally pinning him to the deck.

The battle continued in this way from ten to fifteen minutes, when, after a third unsuccessful attempt to board us, the quarter-deck appeared to be thinned, and our Captain, followed only by the carpenter, climbing over her bulwarks leaped down upon her deck. The former looked like anything but a commander; a grape-shot had traveled across his shoulders, taking skin and flesh, with suspenders, shirt and coat; he had put his hand to the bleeding wound, and afterwards, in loading his pistols, had got them covered with powder; wiping the perspiration from his face at intervals, he had covered himself with blood and powder without knowing it. The small arms had taken off his hat, cut his sabre from the becket which had hung it to his wrist, ripped up and torn his pantaloons. But, all unaccoutered as he was, he found himself in the presence of the full-dressed Captain of the enemy, towards whom he rushed for a death-grapple. But the latter had had enough of fighting. One of Hunter's splinters had knocked away his right hand, his officers were all either dead or wounded, and he could not get his marines to come from under cover of the hen-coop deck, whence they were firing as fast as they could load.

With his left hand the Brazilian Captain presented his cutlass, and said, as he surrendered, "Order your men to cease firing."

"Away, there!" shouted our Captain; "away, there! Boarders, away! Gray-beards and idlers, stock and fluke, board from the brig!"

At this summons some fifteen of our men went over the side in double quick time, despite the rattle of musketry. Again I heard our Captain's trumpet: "Cease firing, below there! Your commander has struck!" The only answer I heard was a volley of musketry. Once more, and for the last time, I heard that trumpet; it pealed so as to make my hair stand on end: "Show no quarter there!"

From that moment not a shot was fired, not a sabre-clash sounded; every man seemed spell-bound; even the wounded, who were lying about the deck in every direction, held their breath for fear of disturbing the stillness and wakening the tiger in our crew, who seemed like that animal, crouching ready for a spring, at the least noise. Our men went steadily round, placed sentries at each scuttle, while some went below to secure the prisoners. Our Captain, now all was safe and the excitement abating, fainted from loss of blood, and, wrapped in the flag of our last prize, he was carried into the cabin.

From Texas.

By the arrival of the steamship James L. Day, Captain Talbot, and also by the Yacht, we have Galveston dates as late as the 15th inst. We make up our usual summary.

CHOLERA.—This disease has not entirely disappeared from some parts of Western Texas. Some of the newly arrived German immigrants have been attacked and died, even after reaching their destination in the upper country, and others have suffered a similar fate at Indianola and other points on the coast. The Indianola bulletin, of the 10th instant, says that at that place the disease has nearly disappeared from the American portion of the citizens, there having been no new case for several days, and no death from it for about twelve days. Among the German population there were still cases, some of which had proved fatal. Mr. Marshall, an American traveler, had also died.

TRADE OF INDIANOLA.—The Bulletin sets down the number of vessels (chiefly schooners and brigs) engaged in the trade between Indianola and New York at fifteen. This is further evidence of the great increase of trade between the State and the Northern ports.

THE INDIANS.—A correspondent of the Galveston Journal, writing from San Antonio, learns from Lieut. G. H. Tyler, of the 2d U. S. Dragoons, that on the 1st inst. Lieut. Hawes, of the 2d Dragoons, with a party of fifteen men had a skirmish with a marauding band of Camanches, who had been perpetrating outrages on the road between Fort Inge and Fort Duncan. The Indians were discovered at a distance of about a mile or more, and the pursuit, which lasted an hour, was necessarily conducted at great disadvantages. Lieut. Hawes succeeded, however, in shooting two and recovering thirty-eight animals and four captive children. The children stated that their father and elder brother and sister were murdered by them three days before. Lieut. Denman reports that he crossed several trails between the Nueces and the Rio Grande.

A DISCOVERY.—The same correspondent, writing from the same place, states that while some laborers were digging a ditch for a fence in the Alamo, in San Antonio recently, they came suddenly on several pieces of ordnance, since which time thirteen cannons have already been recovered from their hiding place, four of which are copper pieces and nine iron pieces, from one to twenty-four pounders, all spiked, and the trunnions and knobs of the cascables broken off. An old Mexican woman says they were buried there by the brave men under the command of the noble Travis, Dowle, and Crockett, at the seige of the Alamo, in 1836.

CORPUS CHRISTI.—The Nueces Valley speaks of the brisk business appearance of Corpus Christi since the Fair. It says new buildings, of a neat and substantial character, are being erected, and the town is rapidly increasing in population. The same paper states that the Corpus Christi Navigation Company has been fully organized, and Capt. F. Britton elected President. So soon as the survey of the route has been made, books will be opened for subscription to the Corpus Christi stock.

IMMIGRATION.—The Galveston News has the following:

Large as was the influx of new settlers last fall and winter, the indications are that it will be much greater this year. The abundant crops this season will be one great inducement. We know several farmers who have planted corn altogether this year, by instructions from their friends in the older States who intend coming to Texas this fall, with their negroes and families.

Our State has been visited by many intelligent and enterprising planters, last winter and spring, who have become fully satisfied that their labor and capital will yield them much better returns in Texas than where they now reside, and many of these have purchased lands here, which they purpose occupying this year, while numerous others are only waiting for opportunities to dispose of their present possessions, in order to be able to move to Texas.

More Mexican Outrages — Murders and Robberies.

By the arrival of the steamship Yacht, we have received Brownsville (Texas) papers to the 12th inst. From these we learn that the Mexican and Indian outrages on the Rio Grande continue, and that the most intense excitement existed in Brownsville. The Rio Bravo of the 9th inst. says:

"On Saturday last, our fellow-townsman, Dr. Sutherland, was on a journey to Edinburgh, learned that the Mexicans and Indians had been over again and killed a Mr. Remmington, a settler on the river. Proceeding on to the house of Dr. Rhodes, about fifty miles from Brownsville, he learned that the party, consisting of about seventeen Indians and Mexicans, had passed but a short time before, one of them having on the clothes of Mr. Remmington, and was riding his horse, which Dr. R. recognised by the equipments. The party had stopped and threatened that if they should find out that he had any thing to do with the gringos, they would serve him in the same way. Dr. Sutherland learned also a little further on, that five more persons had been killed, and their bodies thrown into a lake called Agua Negra. No one could tell who they were, but their bodies had been seen that morning. He then concluded to go on to the lake, which was but a little way ahead, and see if he could recognize the bodies. Proceeding on until he came in sight of the lake, he became convinced by certain movements in the bushes, that he had already gone too far, and instantly returned, at a rapid gait, to the house of Dr. Rhodes, from whence he came to Brownsville.

A meeting of the citizens of the latter place was at once called, and addressed by Dr. Sutherland and Judge Grinsted. A committee was appointed, and a series of resolutions drawn up, complaining of the want of protection on the part of the Government and the United State officers on the frontier, and requesting the Governor of the State to adopt immediate measures to secure their safety. It was also resolved to raise a company of twenty-five men to proceed to Agua Negra to ascertain, if possible, the names of the murdered men, and bury their bodies.

A party, consisting, however, of only ten men, left the following day for Agua Negra, but on arriving at the house of Dr. Rhodes, they were informed that a party of Indians were in the chapparal ahead of them, and two of the Indians were seen, by some of the party from the house, who made chase, but could not overtake them. They evidently intended to lead them into an ambuscade. On their arrival at the house of Dr. Rhodes, he immediately requested them to prevent any of the Mexicans leaving the place, several of whom were found there; but two of them succeeded in making their escape and swam the river. It was then decided to return, and Dr. R., thinking it no longer safe to remain, accompanied them, and is now in town, having been compelled to leave all his effects behind. The party had not proceeded far on their return, when, upon coming to an open place on the river, they were fired upon from the other side, by a large party, supposed to be from 60 to 100 in number, who were in the act of crossing, no doubt with the intention to cut them off. The party being in an exposed position, and having no means to return the fire with effect, as those on the other side were in the bushes, immediately retreated. One of the party, who had been residing in the neighborhood, and had joined them with the view of assisting to recover and bury the dead, was shot through the neck, and fell from his horse dangerously wounded. He is now in town in charge of the physician. Mr. Byrne, a merchant of this place, who was riding a gray horse, became an especial mark for the ruffians, who could be distinctly heard to cry out, "Beat the fellow on the gray horse." At the crack of their rifles the horse fell, but the rider was not injured. He succeeded in making his escape on foot. Information of the movements of the party was evidently sent in advance by spies to those miscreants, who were very nearly successful in cutting them off. Had they succeeded in crossing the river below them, which was evidently their intention, not a soul would have escaped, as, in numbers, they were probably ten to one. A large party in ambuscade was stationed near the lake, and the other party were ready to cross the river whenever the Americans should have passed by a sufficient time not to receive information of the fact, when they supposed it would be an easy matter to kill the whole party. The escape of their spies from the house of Dr. Rhodes, gave them such timely notice, that they well nigh succeeded in their murderous designs; fortunately, however, the Americans almost immediately commenced their return.

The body of Mr. Remington was found floating in the river, and was taken out at Rancho Galveston and buried.

EXCITEMENT IN MATAMORAS.—Considerable excitement has been caused in Matamoras, in consequence of the refusal of the present acting Governor, to surrender his office to the new incumbent, who has been chosen by the people. An article published from the Gente office, holding up the present Governor, Jesus Cardenas, in no very enviable position, and the result was, the arrest and imprisonment of the editor of that paper. About forty other arrests were made for the same thing, but the Flag says the number of responsibles to the article soon lowered up to a hundred, and it was deemed advisable to drop the matter, as the Flag says, "just in time to save the whole of Matamoras from being imprisoned."

STILL LATER.—The American Flag of the 12th, after giving an account of the return of the party from Agua Negra, says:

A letter has been received by Mrs. Neale this morning, from her husband on his farm some short distance above this place, stating that a ramp of some seventy men had set themselves down in front of his farm. Mr. Neale was under the greatest alarm, both for himself and his property. There was only himself and a Mexican servant to defend the farm."

We have seen and conversed with Mr. Rhodes, who returned with Mr P. and party. Mr. Rhodes states that the band of Indians which are committing these depredations, is composed of the remnants of two tribes, the Toroncawas and Canipacuas, with a few Mexicans, that they number, counting those that cross the river, some thirty or forty persons. This Chief, Carlos, Mr. Rhodes states, publicly declares that he has instructions from four Mexican citizens, Villereal, to commit these depredations, one of whom, Pedro Villereal, he calls his commandante. Soon after the murder of Mr. Remmington, this band crossed the river at Rosario, they stopped at that place a short time before crossing over, and boasted that they had instructions for it, and would kill every American that traveled the road, as well as every Mexican that was not personally known to them. They also boast that they are prepared to fight any force that may come against them. They have several times driven the cattle of the neighboring ranches into Rosario, and butchered them in presence of Mr. Rhodes, informing him the while that it was thus they lived, on the best the country afforded. They were expecting an addition to their force, and it was doubtless with their combined force that they attacked the party under Mr. Porter.

Execution in Matamoros.

FOUR OF CARVAJAL'S MEN SHOT.

The following account of the execution of four of Carvajal's men in Matamoros, it appears, reached here by the steamer Yacht. We take from Tuesday's Delta the following statement made by Mr. Waddell, U. S. Consul at Matamoros:

MATAMOROS, June 14, 1852.

Finding all attempts to obtain a reprieve for the prisoners unavailing, I accompanied Dr. Prevost to the quarters of Gen. Avalos, about 6 P. M. yesterday evening, to make the following request on the part of the captives: that they should be permitted to dress in their usual clothing, instead of the habits proposed for them—to have their remains carried across the river to Brownsville; and to be accompanied to the place of execution by myself and Dr. Prevost.

The first of these requests was granted; the second was refused—the General answering us that such a request could be obtained only from the President of the Republic. We then asked to be allowed to receive the remains at the place of execution, and bury them decently on this side of the river. This was positively promised, on condition, that in the morning we should inform the Fiscal of the spot selected for that purpose. In regard to the third request, I was refused the desired permission, but the General promised to allow Mr. Southwell and Dr. Prevost to remain with them. As I was not satisfied with this verbal answer, I subsequently addressed a note to Gen. Avalos, repeating the request to be allowed to accompany them to the place of execution, the reply to which was not received till this morning, immediately after the execution. After the above named interview with Gen. Avalos, Dr. Prevost returned to the prison with the intention of remaining with the captives, but was refused admittance; but on application to the Fiscal, Mr. Southwell was, however, allowed to enter. He explained to the prisoners the reason why I and Dr. Prevost did not return, and promised them that we would be with them at six o'clock this morning; we being assured that the execution would not take place before seven; so that this would allow us one hour to afford them such consolation as might be in our power.

The General also promised that we should accompany them to the last moment.

Such was the desire of the prisoners, who said that our presence and sympathy would greatly console and fortify them. At about 5 o'clock this morning, while dressing, I heard the report of musketry, to which, however, I paid little attention. A short time afterwards, a wagon drove by in the direction of the cemetery, with an escort of lancers, in which were the mangled remains of the prisoners. Dr. Prevost immediately hurried to overtake the wagon, which he found was being followed by the Rev. Father Dominick, and, before reaching the cemetery, it was overtaken by myself and Mr. Southwell. On reaching the graveyard, we explained to the officer of the escort that we had been promised by General Avalos the right to bury the bodies, and asked to be allowed to enter the cemetery, to ascertain where they were about to be interred. This was refused us. We then went in once to Gen. Avalos' quarters, when we were met by the officer of his body-guard, and by him rudely refused permission to enter, under the pretext that the General was asleep—the truth of which we then suspected, and have since ascertained that our suspicions were not unfounded.

A short time afterwards, an officer was dispatched by the General to say that being acquainted with our visit, and aware of its object, he would leave the bodies at our disposition, granting us until 12 M. to bury them. While performing the last sad duty, the grave was watched over by a body of cavalry, to prevent—it must be presumed—our taking away the bodies. The reverend Father Dominick states to us that he had been allowed to remain with the prisoners all night, and was informed that the hour of seven was fixed for their execution. At a short time after 6 A. M., seeing some preparations among the soldiers, the prisoners suspected an intention to anticipate the hour fixed upon. The reverend Father D. asked the officer of the guard if such was the case, and was positively assured that such was not the case. He then went out with the view of going to the church, but was recalled by a messenger, who told him that the prisoners had been taken out, and before he could reach, the place of execution, all was over. It was about 8 A. M.

Thus were these poor men denied even the slight consolation which they so earnestly desired—that of being accompanied by some of their fellow-countrymen in their last moments, and the horrors of their fate needlessly augmented. Will not this be regarded as a refinement of cruelty, even by those who might be disposed to defend the justice of their execution?

[Signed.] J. F. WADDELL, U. S. Consul.

Two of the prisoners were Mexicans, and the other two Americans, the names of the latter being Robt. McDonald and George Williams. They were taken in the attack on Matamoras several months since, and have been constantly in prison. The ladies of Matamoras some time ago, to their credit be it said, made a strenuous but unsuccessful effort to obtain their pardon. The American Flag says:

These executions have created a deep feeling among all classes in Brownsville, who took upon their summary death as wholly unnecessary; the more so as the disturbances in which they were engaged have been entirely suppressed, and no necessity could have existed for such an example. A deep feeling of revenge now reigns, where a course of mercy would have planted those of gratitude.

"Gen. Avalos was shot and burnt in effigy on the American bank of the river, in full view of the garita of Matamoros.

From Utah.

The New York Tribune has received the Deseret News to May 1. The new Tabernacle, which was commenced in November last, and completed in March, was formally dedicated on the 6th of April, at which time a General Conference of the Saints commenced. Brigham Young was sustained by the unanimous vote of the Conference, as President, Prophet, Seer, etc., of the church. A resolution was adopted to go out and meet the Mormons, now crossing the Plains, and assist them on their way. Several of the brethren were deputed to go on missions to different parts of Europe. The News is rapturous in its description of the Conference, the good feeling that prevailed, etc. It says that a large number of revelations were poured out during the meeting.

The Seventh General Epistle of the Presidency of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints from Great Salt Lake Valley, to the saints scattered throughout the Earth, was issued April 18. It gives a general view of the condition of the Church since last September.

The News says they will be ready to commence next Spring. It gives a highly favorable account of the manufactures of the country, and enumerates the different establishments in which are produced almost every article they require.

The Great Salt Lake City mail, of April 1, for California, returned April 10. Mr. Cady, the carrier, reported that the snow was too deep to proceed. He found the remains of Captain A. Woodard, about thirty miles beyond Bear River; his pocket book, watch, and three letters were found in his clothes. No signs of the mail, saddle or pistols, etc., were discovered. It is supposed that Mr. Woodard was wounded at Goose Creek, where, the Snake Indians say, that four white men were killed by the Root Diggers, and had got as far as Deep Creek, and tied his horse to a tree, and there died. Part of the lariat was still on the tree, the wolves having gnawed it off, as is believed, let the horse loose.

FURTHER BY THE EUROPA.—We find in the Charleston Courier the following telegraphic summary of the news brought by the steamer Europa:

The British Parliament, which had taken a recess during the Whitsun holydays, had re-assembled, but their proceedings presented no features of especial interest. Nothing further has been heard relative to the fate of Mr. Murray, the Englishman under sentence of death in the fortress of Spoleto. It is generally believed that Queen Victoria will visit the South of Ireland this Summer. The Australian emigration furor continues unabated. Ten pounds reward have been offered for the apprehension of Meagher. Advices received in London state that the Emperor of Russia had left Berlin for Warsaw on the 27th ult., with the Empress, who had been recommended by her physicians to proceed to Schlangenbad and enter on a course of bathing with the least delay. France was quiet, and nothing important had transpired since the departure of the Baltic on the 8th inst. Louis Napoleon was still at St. Cloud. The Frenshefloet, at last accounts, was at Palermo. The alarming rumors that prevailed in Belgium, and the fears which were entertained in December and January, of forcible annexation to France, have been revived. Excitement still prevailed in Fribourg, in Switzerland. The insurrection in Turkey, in the pachalik of Bagdad, had not been suppressed, and the Arabs were still masters of the country from Mosul to the Persian Gulf.

ANTI-SLAVERY MANIFESTO.—The New York Tribune publishes an "address to the anti-slavery Christians of the United States." It is signed by Arthur Tappan, Lewis Tappan, and other leaders in the anti-slavery movements at the North. The object seems to be to form a coalition with one of the two great parties, in the approaching Presidential contest.

COTTON BOLL.—The Vicksburg Sentinel of the 19th inst. says: "We have been shown a cotton boll from the plantation of Mr. W. H. Russell, in the Yazoo valley, the size of a large musket ball. It was plucked on the 15th inst. The cotton crop is generally backward."

Foreign Details by the Baltic.

The mails from Liverpool to the 24 inst. by the Collins steamer Baltic, which reached New York on the 13th inst., have come to hand.

It is observed and commented on in England, that the New York papers, per Europa, contain advices from Sydney, New South Wales, four weeks later than any received in England.

Emanuel & Son, of Hamburg, have failed for £120,000, in consequence of heavy losses in shares.

On Monday the Scotch banks invested £500,000 in English funds, and large orders remain unfulfilled for want of stocks.

ENGLAND.

At a meeting of the shareholders of the British North American Bank, in London, a dividend of 5 per cent. per annum was declared.

Sir J. Gaspard le Marchant, the present Governor of Newfoundland, has been appointed to succeed the late Sir John Harvey as Governor of Nova Scotia.

There are 31 vessels in the port of London up for Australia. The Government Emigration Commissioners propose to charter 8 vessels per month, the next six months, for the same destination. 7 vessels are loading at Liverpool for Australia, and 7 for San Francisco.

The British Government having addressed inquiries to the authorities of Newfoundland respecting the report of two ships having been seen on an iceberg, the Government has replied thus:

"I have caused inquiries to be made through the Commercial Society of St. John's, but can obtain no information whatever relative to the above described vessels."

FRANCE.

The Public, organ of the ultra Elysean party, contains a remarkable article, insisting that the only answer to fusion is the Empire, and that the President would be a poltroon if he witnessed the conspiracy of the two Bourbon branches against him without seizing the occasion at once to assume the Imperial crown.

The Committee of the Budget has adopted an amendment suppressing the salaries of the Inspectors-General of the Ministry of Police, and has expressed the wish that the entire department should be suppressed. The committee has also adopted an amendment proposed by M. de Montalembert, to the effect that no credit should be allowed for the sale of the Orleans estate.

More refusals to take the oath of fidelity to the Constitution are announced. The refusals come generally from members of the Council General, no fewer than twenty-two more of whom have resigned their offices rather than swear allegiance to Louis Napoleon. Some of these gentlemen were formerly Representatives, and bear names well known during the existence of the Republic.

The Moniteur declares that the warlike rumors are unfounded, and that the right of the French nation to fix form of government has never been unsecured or contested by the other powers.

SWITZERLAND.

The Vaud Gazette states that the protocols respecting Switzerland were signed in London by the representatives of the five great powers, and that a collective note will be addressed to the Federal Government, calling upon it to re-establish the former constitution of Neufchatel France, it is added, will undertake to enforce compliance, if the Federal Government should not at once execute the decision come to by the five powers.

INDIA—BY THE OVERLAND MAIL.

The arrival of the mail from India brings full details of the war in Birmah, and the capture of Rangoon, a brief announcement of which has been given.

The assault was a bloody one, and the Birmese suffered severely. A shell was thrown into their powder magazine, producing a fearful explosion. About one hundred guns were captured. The Bombay Times says: "The place is most offensive from the number of dead bodies of men and dogs, and from the stench of the decayed fish which the Birmese are fond of, and which, as we are sorry to say, commenced to a very great extent. Cholera is raging fearfully; one officer, Capt. Hill, paymaster of her Majesty's 80th Foot, has already fallen a victim, and another is scarcely expected to recover. The soldiers of the different regiments are dying in numbers. The heat since the troops landed has been fearful. Two officers, Brevet Major Oakes, of the Madras artillery, and Brigade Major Griffiths, of the Madras brigade, died from a coup de soliel on the 12th, and Brigadier Warren and many others, with numerous soldiers, have suffered severely from the same cause."

FROM THE CAPE COLONY.

The Kaffir war is reported as having been nearly brought to a close by Sir Harry Smith prior to his leaving; the result of the operations detailed by the last mail having had the effect to induce the chiefs to sue for peace. In consequence, Sir Harry had entered into negotiations with them, and these were being continued by his successor, Major-Gen. Cathcart. There had been no collision between the British and Kaffirs since those already reported, although there have been some desultory skirmishings; we have not, however, heard of any loss of life on the part of the British. It was strongly hoped that the negotiations for peace now going forward might be successful, but some fears were entertained as to whether or not, this would be the case.

NEWS BY TELEGRAPH.

FURTHER FROM THE CONVENTION.—Baltimore, June 20—Noon.—A dispatch was last evening forwarded to Mr Webster, by his friends, asking what should he done. His answer was, "I have nothing to say."

A similar dispatch was sent to Mr. Fillmore, who answered, "Go for Webster, by all means, and save the whig party."

Nothing is yet decided upon.

Baltimore, June 20.—The vote on the forty-sixth ballot last evening, stood as follows: Webster, 31; Fillmore, 127; Scott, 134. Those between the 31st and the above varying but very little.

The Convention adjourned at 10 minutes before 8 until 10 o'clock to-morrow (Monday) morning.

Baltimore, June 20, P. M.—The friends of Mr. Fillmore are very sanguine in the anticipation of the accession of the Webster force. All the leading members of the delegation have gone to Washington, where they are to consultation with the candidates.

The friends of Scott are working hard to prevent the coalition of those of Fillmore and Webster. They profess to be sanguine of success, but it is evident they are not sincere. [Eve. Delta.

LATEST FROM THE CONVENTION.—Full Details of the Nomination.—Baltimore, Monday, June 21.—The Convention met this morning pursuant to adjournment, and proceeded with the balloting. From the 47th to the 52d ballots the changes were not important. The 53d ballot stood as follows: Maine, 8 for Scott; New Hampshire, 5 for Scott; Vermont, 5 for Scott; Massachusetts, 11 for Webster, and 6 for Scott; Rhode Island, 1 for Webster, and 3 for Scott; Connecticut, 1 for Webster, 3 for Fillmore, and 2 for Scott; New York, 1 for Webster, 7 for Fillmore, 25 for Scott; New Jersey, 7 for Scott; Pennsylvania, 27 for Scott; Delaware, 3 for Scott; Maryland, 8 for Fillmore; Virginia, 6 for Fillmore, and 8 for Scott; North Carolina, 10 for Fillmore; Alabama, 9 for Fillmore; Mississippi, 7 for Fillmore; Louisiana, 6 for Fillmore; Ohio, 23 for Scott; Kentucky, 11 for Fillmore and 1 for Crittenden; Tennessee, 3 for Scott and 9 for Fillmore; Indiana, 13 for Scott; Illinois, 11 for Scott; Missouri, 9 for Fillmore and 3 for Scott; Arkansas, 4 for Fillmore; Michigan, 6 for Scott; Florida, 3 for Fillmore; Texas, 4 for Fillmore; Iowa, 3 for Fillmore and 1 for Scott; Wisconsin, 1 for Scott and 4 for Webster; California, 3 for Scott and 1 for Webster. Total vote of the fifty-third ballot:

Fillmore	112
Scott	159

The greatest excitement prevailed at the announcement of this vote, with cheering for Fillmore.

A delegate from Alabama then moved to declare the nomination unanimous.

Mr. Dayton, of New Jersey, made an eloquent speech on the character and services of Gen. Scott, the nominee, and in it twenty-five minutes passed one, still speaking. His address comprises a special entreaty on the nominee, and an appeal to the South in his behalf, urging that he is entitled to the earnest support of all, as proved by the course of Alabama and Ohio.

Several delegations from the Southern States stated that the unanimous adoption by Gen. Scott of the platform proposed by them, would remove all objection on their part with regard to his nomination.

Baltimore, June 22.—The Convention re-assembled yesterday morning. Fillmore and Webster communcued losing on the forty-eighth ballot, that being the second ballot taken after assemblag. Scott continued gaining until the fifty-third ballot, which resulted as follows:

Scott 159; Fillmore 112; Webster 21.

REMEDY FOR WORMS

THAT has ever been discovered. This preparation has now stood the test of twenty-two years' trial, and is confidently recommended as a safe and effectual medicine for expelling worms from the system.

The proprietor has made it a point to ascertain the result of its use in such cases as came within his knowledge and observation, and he invariably found it to produce the most salutary effects; not unfrequently, after nearly all the ordinary preparations for worms, had been previously resorted to without any permanent advantage. This fact is attested by the certificates and statements of hundreds of respectable persons in different parts of the country and should induce families always to keep a vial of the preparation in their possession. It is mild in its operation and may be administered with perfect safety to the most delicate infant. ☞ Sold by all Druggists in New Orleans and by nearly all Druggists and country merchants in the United States. may22-1y

The Sanctuary.

Thus saith the Lord,—"Where is the house that ye build unto me? and where is the place of my rest?—for all those things hath my hands made—"

How blest this hallowed temple of our God!
The deep, dark grove, which now my sight surrounds!
Heaven's sanctuary seldom ever trod,
The redolent with life—and sweetest sounds.
The whole creation seems one breath of praise;
Woods, vocal with inspiring notes of spring—
No can resist responsive strains to raise,
Then nature thus, its yearly tribute brings,
Honor of our Maker's power divine,
Who fills the world with His unbounded love,
And bids creation what beauty shine,
To draw our grateful Him above

Is there aught on earth
As Jesus' sacred
How mercy sin
To kindle matters
Tis all the can go beneath
Lord Jesus

who will be this
ing, transitory things, from yonder dazzling throne,
and heavenly in the bosom springs?

Is a world within, of vast designs—
No single itself contains unbounded thought—
Folded in grasp—it ever finds
New scenes of wonder, most divinely wrought.
Worlds are fixed, no fetters can retain
Its rapid flight, on viewless wings to soar,
Soars like the eagle o'er the ocean's main,
Careless of tempest, or the surge's roar.

The universe itself is much too small,
For this winged spirit in its course to rove—
Its light it flies around this earthly ball;
Then soars aloft, to reach the stars above.

Mind intelligence! what gifted powers
Are thus imparted by the Holy One—
Who on the soul His Heavenly Spirit showers,
Directly from his high, Empyreal throne.

The mental eye is opened to behold
The fruits of Paradise, which ne'er decay;
That city, too, whose streets are paved with gold,
Reflecting light, from one eternal day.

Heaven responds when we are worshipping,
And hails the incense of the breath of prayer—
Angels bear off the odor on the wing,
Scattering its fragrance on the balmy air.

Letter from Bishop Soule.

The itinerant superintendency is still alive. The venerable superintendent is instinct with the spirit to the last. A noble example to the Church. The Bishop's announcement of his intention to visit the Pacific Conference, we give in his own words in a letter to the Missionary Board, published in the S. C. Advocate. May he comfort our brethren there in his coming and go and come again in peace.—Ed.

HILL GROVE, May 31, 1852.

DEAR BRETHREN: I recieved, two months ago, the resolutions of the Board, requesting me to visit our missionary work in California; and I assure you that this request was not only cordial to the feelings of my heart, but also in accordance with the convictions of my mind.

The most suitable time for such a visit, under all the circumstances, was the only point which involved difficulty. I am aware that the long delay of an answer to the action of the board is liable to be regarded as an evidence of indifference on my part, both to the kindness and confidence expressed in that action and to the important matter it involves. But I assure you, and all concerned, that the delay has been occasioned by very different, perhaps I might say opposite considerations. It was impracticable for me to make preparation and leave an Atlantic port in time to meet the Conference at San Francisco, by the middle of April, the time appointed for its meeting. And could I have accomplished that, the critical condition of my family at that time would not have justified my absence. Nor has there been any period since, when I should have felt at liberty to be absent only for a few days. Under these circumstances, unable to give any definite idea with regard to the time when I might be able to comply with the request of the board, and considering an indefinite answer very undesirable, I have delayed a reponse till the present date. I now feel at liberty to express my views fully on this interesting subject. I regard California as one of the most important fields of our missionary work; second to none except it be the slave population of these States, which, in the providence of God, to a great extent, and in an extraordinary manner, seems to be committed to our charge. The most extensive calculations of the human mind cannot compass the results of the faithful occupancy of these vast and important fields of missionary enterprize. The greatest interest of millions for time and eternity, are, directly or indirectly, involved in this work. It is not the population of the United States only which is embraced in these departments of our ministerial labor. In one direction, aided by the movements of the colonization enterprize, we look to the civilization, and Christian regeneration of benighted Africa; and in another view we contemplate the influence which is to be extended to the coast of the Pacific, in the empire of China, and the islands of the sea. In both the "signs of the times" are repleto with the most important indications. In such a state of things it is the binding duty of the Church of Christ—of all believers in the truth of the Gospel Revelation, to contribute according to their ability, to the success of an enterprise which has for its ultimate object the conversion of the world. Blessed are those churches, and those ministers, and individual believers in Christ, who in this great matter "know their calling of God."

Encompassed as I now am, with the infirmities of age, I am aware that my effective labors are accomplished, and what I now do is with much weakness. But still I have an ardent desire that what remains of my life and strength may not be entirely useless to the church, and to the world. My colleagues, by the good providence of God, will be able to supply the work at home till the session of our General Conference. But even should they fail to meet all the Conferences, I could afford them but very little aid. In view of all the circumstances it is my deliberate judgment that I can render a more valuable service to the church by a visit to California than in any other work I am able to perform. I greatly desire to see the brethren, and "know their state" in that far off land.—There are several weighty considerations which influence me in this matter. I trust such a visit would be cordial to the feelings, and encouraging to the labors, of our missionaries, separated as they are from their brethren with whom they once associated, met in Conference, and "took sweet counsel together" but that our grand itinerant system may be perpetuated, and the strong tendency to locality in our ministry counteracted, is of far greater importance. And if the last act of my life and labors shall exert an influence in the accomplishment of this design, I shall consider them well closed. That we have as a church, especially in the ministry, lost to a very considerable extent, the spirituality, zeal and power of Wesley and his coadjutors, and of the early Methodist preachers and societies in these States, is a melancholy truth, too obvious to be denied.

That the prevailing tendency to locality in the ministry has been, to a great extent, productive of this unhappy decline, I have no doubt. To remedy this evil will require no ordinary effort. But remedied it must be, or the time is not far distant when "Ichabod" may be written on our churches, and "Tekel" engraved on our altars and pulpits. I thank God for any appearance of a healthy reaction. The increase of interest in the missionary enterprise—the disposition of many of our preachers, and the desire of many of our influential members, especially in the town and city charges, to revive the primitive Wesleyan plan of an itinerant ministry, so as to develve the pastoral charge and administration of discipline on ministers of mature age and experience; employing the younger preachers, especially those on trial, as "helpers" where they may have the advantage of the counsel and example of their elder brethren, and encouraging "signs of the times."—Till this is effected, to a far greater extent than it now is, I despair seeing Methodism and the church organized on its principles in a healthy and prosperous condition. But in these remarks I shall be regarded by many as wandering from the principal object of this communication, my visit to visit California. Be it so, others will form a different opinion. But with direct reference to the proposed visit, if it please God to preserve my life, and no uncontrollable event shall intervene, I have settled in my purpose to visit California the ensuing autumn; probably leave in November. This will afford me time, as I may be able to visit at least the most important appointments in the Conference, previous to the next session. And as a number of the Conferences at home will have held their sessions by that time, I hope to have a number of missionaries to accompany me to encourage the hearts of the faithful laborers already in that distant land, and to aid them in a work which will require a large measure of the zeal of Apostles to accomplish. Although I have not obtained the opinion of my colleagues, the Bishops, with regard to this matter, I entertain no doubt of their cordial approval, without which I should not feel at liberty to prosecute any important measures.

Some of my friends have raised objections to my proposed visit in consideration of my advanced age, the great distance between the Atlantic and Pacific coast, the casualties and dangers frequently attending a long sea voyage, and the liability to death and burial at sea, far from home and friends. I have weighed these objections. They are light in the balance. I have been in perils both on the sea and on the land, but God has been my shield, and effected deliverance under circumstances which seemed to be beyond the efforts of human agency. That great and good man of God, Dr. Coke, sleeps as safely in the bosom of the deep, as his venerable colleague Asbury, in a sepulchre of earth; and both rest in sure and certain hope of an equally glorious resurrection when the "earth and the sea shall give up the dead that are in them." And whether I shall sleep in the elementary habilments of the one, or the other, is a circumstance of no importance. If I may but "sleep in Christ," no matter when, no matter where.

JOY OF A MISSIONARY IN HIS WORK.—It was in no common transport that Paul wrote the third chapter of Ephesians. But those who are engaged in the same work to which he devoted himself are permitted at times to enter into his feelings of rapture. Said Mr. Schneider, in recounting the scenes that were passing at Aintab, "The ministry of the word in such circumstances is most delightful work. It is worth all the sacrifices the missionary is called to make. There is no pleasure comparable to it.—There is a satisfaction, a refreshment to the soul, a heartfelt gratification and happiness in it, to be found in no other service. Though toils, and wearisomeness, and trials fall to the lot of the missionary, yet seasons of such spiritual refreshment, such feats to the soul, far more than counterbalance them; and the meanings of the declaration is fully realized—"Unto me is this GRACE given, that I should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ."—Journal of Missions.

PICTURES OF MEMORY.... By ALICE CARY.

Among the beautiful pictures
That hang on Memory's wall,
Is one of a dim old forest,
That seemeth best of all:
Not for its gnarled oaks olden,
Dark with the mistelo:
Not for the violets golden
That sprinkle the dale below;
Not for the milk-white lilies
That lead from the fragrant hedge,
Coquetting all day with the sunbeams,
And stealing their golden edge:
Not for the vines on the old upland
Where the bright red berries rest,
Nor the pinks, nor the pale, sweet cowslip,
It seemeth to me the best.

I once had a little brother,
With eyes that were dark and deep—
In the lap of that dim old forest
He lieth in peace asleep:
Light as the shapes of the thistle,
Free as the winds that blow,
We roved there the beautiful summers,
The autumers of long ago;
But his feet on the hills grew weary,
And one of the autumn eves,
I made for my little brother
A bed 'neath the yellow leaves.

Sweetly his pale arms folded
My neck in a meek embrace,
As the light of immortal beauty
Silently covered his face:
And when the arrows of sunset
Lodged in the tree-tops bright,
He fell, in his saint-like beauty,
Asleep by the gates of light.
Therefore, of all the pictures
That hang on memory's wall,
The one of the dim old forest
Seemeth the best of all.

The Right of Complaint.

MR. EDITOR: The right of petition is no doubt a great natural right; but, I reckon that of all our rights, the right of complaint is the most natural, the most inalienable, the most valuable, and the most equalizing. I, for one, inherited this right from my forefathers in a direct line, through my dear aunt, who did a mother's part by me. She, indeed, exercised more complaint than any one I ever knew. It was impossible to present any thing to her, which had not two sides, and both wrong. She kept a universal, sharp eye on everybody and every thing, "niggers," neighbors, and church-members. Her own servants, in particular, rather cultivated it; there was always something wrong, which they tried to lay on aunt; but she always would come out right. Washing, ironing, sweeping, the butter, bread, coffee, the roast, or the stew, one or the other was most sure to be wrong. A hundred times, I reckon, I've heard her on this wise: "You, Bess, you're a mighty lazy nigger: here, the week's most gone—what about that wash!" "Why, Mistress, the wash is done, done long ago, done, ironed and all, done yesterday: things hanging up stairs airin'." "I'll be bound for you: now, I suppose you'll be airin', and in idleness all the rest of the week—there's a heap in you, girl, yet, that'll have to be got out." No one could head the old lady. She might spare one part, but she was sure to put it on thick on some other. Her look was a complaint: it had settled in her face.

You always knew where to find her. She always was one thing. Aunt lived to be old. I have noticed that it is a great deal better for body and soul than most suppose. These people that are always complaining live a long time; they hardly ever leave us.

We never lacked company. Whenever anybody fell out with somebody, which was all the time, the person who felt hurt was sure to visit aunt to get the old lady to do justice to their feelings. O, yes, complaint draws company as an old sore draws flies.

And, what would become of society without it; why, bad enough, it could have neither motion or life, interest or improvement, like a ship way-out in the middle of the ocean, in a calm, equally distant from every where, with no chance of change. Why, there would be no conversation; our language would cease; there might be left a few namby, pamby, spiritless sounds, but human reason, in the main, would go back to the dead ages if it didn't die outright; there would soon be no alphabet; no more nasals, no dentals, no linguals, no harsh gutterals—only a few soft ones, no nothing, but just labials affording, in place of speech diving, only the sounds of a papaw loblolly lullaby fit for nobody and of no use. Right dangerous is it to tamper so with the feelings of natural complaint.

The Scriptures say, "He that speaketh flattery to his friends, even the eyes of his children shall fail." Then, in their day mine shall be remarkable for strong eyes.

Sermons, I have noticed, that find fault with professors, and rasp things in general, are much the best listened to. It is a powerful field: some men are very gifted at it. Solomon says, "The words of the wise are as goads," and I believe it. I would sooner see old Parson Crooker just look over his specs once into the corner down amongst the Church-members, than to hear many a whole sermon. He is the same as an owl among mice. That is what I call preaching the word.

For my part I can always find something wrong, and always mend, too. I have been at it now, man and boy, these sixty-five years. The Government—why its the real freedom of it to find fault: President, Vice President, Mr. Webster, Mr. Cass, the Senate, the House, one and all—for its mighty seldom they're all right—I have my notion of the whole of them. What! Stop complaint! Why, we had better have no Government. I should be a poor creature indeed, and miserable enough if I could not grumble and growl, day in and day out, one week after another the rest of my days; I really believe it would turn into regular consumption of the bowels. No; when things get so, I want to do as the Puritans did—leave for a free country.

I never heard any sermon that I just liked exactly. It was, either long overmuch, or rather short, or dry, or loud, or too drowsy, or the doctrine was not to my mind, or something; which, in general, I tell the Parson, for my own satisfaction; not to do him any good, because there's very few willing to learn any thing now-a-days.

There is nothing more refreshing, I may say, than a general growl. Nature craves it, and needs it, and it is doing yourself a natural injustice not to give it. It may be called growling, when there's too much to specify. Things often seem to lay so, both plenty and handy; high and low; friends and foes; religion and politics, homebred and foreign; they seem to get topsy-turvy on purpose to give us a chance. Early in the morning, how satisfying-like, before a body wakes to stumble to the rocking-chair and yawn and growl; the helter-skelter look of the room, children's cloaths every way, negro girl half asleep—better she were asleep; confused notion of a large note due this day; stocking just on, wrong side out—won't change it; and two mosquitoes not willing to leave without one more bite; really, from the very set of things, there's a particular fitness in what I call growling. If there is any slavery it is a state of universal acquiescence. I believe its the very death of religion. Complaint is the beginning of opposition; and "opposition is the life of trade." Chain me, put me in the lock-up, but leave my mouth open.

Your paper "I don't say it to flatter you"—but I have not seen a number yet but had one-third more bad points in it than good ones. Your selections are in general in horrid taste. Do tell me who is it that picks out your poetry! The last number had in it "Yankee Doodle"—mighty old subject, tolerable rhyme, but a religious paper has no call for it—though you have religion enough in the sheet in all conscience—some mighty dry articles. I really would try and get some that would be creditable to yourself as editor, and interesting to the public. Please go away no more. The sheet was at zero before you left; but really, afterward, came near out-doing me. Well, you are back—but please don't publish any more of your own letters. Try the paper awhile without any editorial. I should really like to see a sheet with a few bad points as possible. It would be novel. I get to read your paper on Sunday: its a great relief to me. I always have more of an edge, on that day than during the week: its my raising—Sunday was always a great day with my aunt. I don't know a sheet any where that suits my purpose better than yours. There can be no better paper for me: only if Mr. Abby's plan could be carried out, then I should have a dozen papers in one; but, I never expect such a chance as that.

I mouth nobody, I am no honey, or sugar; with me, you are what you are; I never get any compliments, and I never give any; so you will please discontinue my paper at the end of the volume.

I am always, as ever,

L. GAIDE.

FOURTH PAPER.

Brother Richardson possessed in a very eminent degree the ability of making a complete, yet brief and lucid analysis of his subject. When he read his text and announced his propositions, they were so natural and feasible, and withal so difficult to forget, that should a preacher, who heard him, ever wish to preach from the same text, he would be very apt to use Brother R.'s analysis. He had given this subject a great deal of attention. I have often, after meditating for days or weeks upon a text, without forming a skeleton, asked him how he would divide it. With merely a moment's reflection he would give such a decision as appeared to me incapable of improvement. This happy faculty of explication, combined with his impressive delivery, fixed his sermons indelibly in the minds of his hearers.

His sermons, like all the productions of his pen, indicated clear thought and severe criticism. His great force was argumentation. Perhaps a more ornamental style, interspersed more freely with rhetorical figures, would have been more pleasing. He used a few choice, appropriate illustrations, generally selected from the inexhaustible fund furnished in the Sacred Scriptures.

He sometimes repeated his sermons. I have heard him preach the same one at several successive meetings in his district. He did it because he deemed them appropriate and important. He was not a circuit preacher in the sense of preaching a circuit of sermons, and going through the same routine in every field of labor. There are some such preachers, who may well be compared to certain musical instruments arranged to play a set number of pieces, and when these are performed the only alteration is to wind up and repeat the same strains.

Dr. Olin, in some of his lectures, observes that "the greatest blessing which could befall many preachers, would be a conflagration of their old sermons and manuscripts." This would have been no blessing to Brother R. His active and improving mind did not allow him to preach a sermon threadbare. If he delivered an old sermon, he thoroughly rearranged, revised and re-wrote it. Whenever he appeared in the pulpit he brought forth things new as well as old. His sermons bore the fresh impress of close, prayerful and refreshing thought. They were deeply imbued with the spirit of the Gospel, and the attentive hearer never left his seat in the sanctuary without having clearer views, and a more heartfelt realization of some of the great truths of our holy religion than when he entered it.

I think Brother R. was ambitious to excel as a minister. Further, I believe he was desirous of having such a position assigned him in the Church as would find ample scope for the exercise and development of his talents and a promising field for the employment of his time. Accursed be that unhallowed ambition which its self-gratification for its own sake! But is it wrong for a man whose eyes God has opened, when he looks out upon this wide world of sin and sees its moral desolations, its inhabitants immersed in wickedness, intoxicated with pleasure, enslaved to ruin, thronging the downward road to hell, is it wrong for such a man, whose heart God has touched, who comprehends the adequacy of the Divinely appointed remedy, and realizes the possibility of the salvation of all this throng; is it wrong for such an one to desire even superhuman powers, that he may stem the tide, turn the current, and pluck thousands as brands from the everlasting burnings? No! The minister of Christ, may, must covet earnestly the best gifts. Away with that voluntary humility which is content with mediocre attainments, satisfied with having made a few feeble, unsuccessful efforts for ministerial excellence, and which now seeks retirement in some retreat to await in inglorious ease the issue of the great moral contest. Let such an one hear the voice of God inquiring, "What doest thou here, Elijah!" Arise, press towards thy mark for the prize of thy high calling. Let him go out and shake himself, and in conscious strength let him fix the stern resolve, rouse up the indomitable energies of his will; let him persevere amid difficulties and triumph over obstacles. Thus by the blessing of God he may expect to become an able minister of the Gospel, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed rightly dividing the words of truth. The subject of these sketches was not endowed with extraordinary talents—was not favored with extraordinary advantages. He gained his influence, and acquired the commanding position he occupied, when death arrested his further progress, by his indexible determination to use the fixed habits of industry which characterized his whole life.

Brother Richardson for many years sustained in our Conference the important office of Presiding Elder. In this, as in all his other appointments, he exhibited his usual energy. Nothing but severe indisposition ever prevented him from attending a meeting, and he was always ready to work. He would, at a moment's warning, preach to any kind of a congregation, large or small, black or white.

The office of Presiding Elder is an ecclesiastical anomaly. No other church organization has anything like it; but in our system it is an essential feature. He is a pastor, an administrator of discipline, and a general superintendent of all the spiritual and temporal interests of the Church. Custom has assigned him a responsible position as the confidential adviser of the Bishop in arranging the work and fixing the appointments. In this capacity he is the friend and representative of both preachers and people. In these he ought to be entirely impartial, ought to possess a clear insight into human nature, and be able to form a correct judgment of the adaptation of particular men for different fields of labor. But a Presiding Elder must be more than human if he has not some local preferences for favorite charges, some likes and dislikes among the preachers. It is easy to see that it might so happen that the favored places of a leading Presiding Elder would be always filled by the best talents of the Conference and certain pets among the preachers, passed successively from one good appointment to another. In the last interview I had with Brother R. he remarked to me, that in counselling with the Bishop he had never allowed his personal preferences or prejudices, either for places or preachers to influence him in the slightest degree. The only inducements for recommending particular appointments were the wants of the people, and the qualifications of the man for the post.

I am sorry I am unable to give the circumstances of Brother R.'s conversion. He was so opposed to tedious narratives in the class-room or love-feast that he seldom detailed his early religious experience. I often heard him speak of the present state of his mind, present communion with the Father and His Son Jesus Christ. In spiritual enjoyments he was remarkably uniform, seldom elated, never depressed. He was not ordinarily a feeling love-feast speaker. There were times, however, when he was peculiarly so. I recollect an instance at one of our frontier camp-meetings held in troublous times. A short time before this the Indians had stolen his horse. Several persons along his route had been killed. At this meeting in the preacher's tent, Bibles and pistols lay side by side upon the table; umbrellas and guns were standing together. A regular nightly patrol was kept up to guard the encampment and the horses; but with all this prevention some were stolen, and I think the day the meeting broke up one person was killed near the ground. At this meeting, while talking of his toils and perils, said he enjoyed the love and peace of God; said he thought it likely he might fall a martyr to his work; but, said he, (his utterance becoming choked, his eyes suffused with tears, with his voice thrillingly pathetic,) "none of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto me; so that I may finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus."

The Newspaper Plan.

REV. H. N. McTYEIRE—

DEAR BROTHER:—I regret that your paper of the 24th April did not admit of further extracts from my letter to Dr. Parsons, in the Nashville paper, on the subject of the Methodist Press, than you found room for. Those you have given do not give the reader much of an idea of the outline of the Plan, which is, at best, but very briefly and roughly sketched in that letter. Will you be so good as to allow me to say, as briefly as I can, a few words in addition to what you have already given your readers.

It is, in the first place, assumed that about three fourths of the members of the M. E. Church, South, are without a religious paper of any kind; and that in these places a Methodist paper is much more needed than where it does circulate, for these persons are mostly poor and uninformed. Secondly, our papers are almost all very much embarrassed for want of funds, and are becoming more and more so. Thirdly, the geographical and antagonist character of our entire press is such, that it has engendered, as it must necessarily have done, among our preachers and others, a very considerable amount of strife and sectional feeling, which is any thing but favorable to substantial piety amongst us.

Now, it is believed that all these evils may be entirely remedied by a change in our plan, and that moreover other lasting benefits to the Church will grow out of it, which the brief space of this letter will not allow me to set forth. It is believed that the newspaper circulation of the Church is, under the present system, pushed about to its utmost tension; that for any one paper to extend its list much will be by producing depression and embarrassment among some one or more of its neighbors. Our papers, as they are now situated, are naturally the competitors of, and are antagonistic to each other.

It is proposed to concentrate the printing, and extend the editorial benefits, so as greatly to cheapen the one and enlarge the other. And this, it is believed, will enable the Church to extend the circulation of a larger, and therefore a better paper, than we now have, to the utmost limits of the church—put a paper, weekly, into the hands of every Methodist; and then, to extend it as much farther as circumstances will allow. This, it is supposed, will place our Church upon a vantage-ground which it never yet possessed, and give it immense means of usefulness.

It is presumed that no one will for a moment question that the patronage of the half even, or three fourths of our Church, will put an establishment, publishing a weekly sheet, a size larger than any of our papers, at a dollar a year, upon a perfectly sound and independent pecuniary basis, beyond contingencies. We can secure this patronage easily, for we have the capacity for beyond that which any other church or private company has or can have, namely, our present ubiquitous organization.

It is proposed to have a corresponding editor in each Conference; each Conference having a special department in the paper. This duty will be so small, it will not interfere with his regular work, and will therefore, require no alteration in his salary. The home editor will of course be under pay. This will place all the several Conferences upon equal ground, and will beget and foster a common feeling and common interest in a general enterprize, looking to the good of the whole church. This alone, it is believed will be an advantage to our zeal of no small magnitude.

But if you will look at three-hundred thousand persons, members of our church, who now receive no religious newspaper, and who are almost as destitute of religious reading of all kinds, and imagine them from this time onwards, as their families are growing up, in the receipt and perusal of a good religious periodical, setting forth the doctrines of the bible, with the solid peculiarities of methodism, and notice them from year to year, as their circumstances change, and as they mingle in a thousand ways and directions with the world—in ten—in twenty years, you will see effects, solid, lasting, broadcast effects, which nothing but the bible, the press and the genius of enterprize can produce. You will see Catholicism, and a score of lesser heresies put down, and vital Godliness springing up in their stead, such as I believe can be experienced in no other way: I would like to write more in explanation of the plan, but I must be brief, and only hint at the arguments.

Allow me however to say one or two words in answer to your remarks in opposition to scheme. "You cannot, I suppose, be serious in saying: "The State Rights people, eclesically and politically, will be jealous of such powerful consolidation," &c. Why, my dear brother the plan proposes to diffuse and enlarge the circle of editorial advantages, powers and responsibilities, not to consolidate or to centralise them.

And again, in the caption of your article, you have given a feature to my letter which I never put upon it. You will recollect I said nothing about "Amalgamating all the church papers." Nor does any or all my remarks render such an influence necessary. I spoke of establishing a paper by the General Conference. And surely, if there are no other objections in the way than those you have named, it will be speedily in operation.

Secondly, I hardly can believe that the plan is perfectly and palpably ridiculous. In fact, the day has passed by, when ridicule is considered, in any case, a good answer to the projects of enterprize. I well remember, perhaps you may not, when the project of extending our newspaper circulation beyond our one paper, at New York, with its subscribers, was just as ridiculous in the eyes of many, as the present plan to extend it universally in the church appears to be in your estimation. In truth, I am reminded by everything around me, that ridicule has uniformly spent all its force in opposition to every enterprize, in and out of the church, which is now speeding on the world in temporal and spiritual advantage. I doubt if the church will be satisfied with your view, that the plan is so entirely visionary as to forbid its being in anywise, soberly considered. I assure you there are some men in the church, I, of course, would not be allowed to vouch for their sanity, but there are those who believe this plan capable of being arranged in its details, so as, if adopted, to become one of the most valuable enterprizes in the current annals of our Zion.

Very sincerely, your Brother in the Ministry of Jesus,
R. ABBEY.

FIVE FACTS.—A firm faith is the best divinity; a good life the best philosophy; a clear conscience the best law; honesty the best policy, and temperance the best medicine.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

The Debate—Jackson, Miss.—Rev. J. L. Waller and Rev. Dr. Newton.

This debate came off on the 2d-10th inst. Expectation was high. The friends of each seemed anxious for the conflict. No debate of the kind had ever been in this part of the State. Mr. Waller's fame as a debatant had preceded him. He was known as a valiant Knight of the Dippers—as one that would stand against all the "Pedoes." Dr. Newton had been regarded by the Pedo-Baptists as an able defender of the "faith once delivered to the Saints"—of the great Abrahamic covenant in all its gracious provisions. Occasionally, when respectfully petitioned to lecture on this subject, he would so defend the faith, and present the views of the Pedo-Baptist, that ruin and dismay was the consequence to the proselyters. None being found in the State of Mississippi that could meet Dr. N.'s clear, full, and Scriptural views on the mode and subject of Christian Baptism; our Baptist brethren in this part of the State, concluded to import their famous Knight for the special service of giving Dr. N. a wallowing.

The appointed 2d of June came, and the hosts of the dippers and anti-dippers were on the ground. In due time the field was entered by the debatants; and the moderators, Gov. Foote and Judge Fisher, announced the first proposition:

"That a version of the English Scriptures, in which the word baptize, and its cognates, should be translated by immerse, and its cognates, would, to that extent, be faithful to the original." Mr. Waller affirmed—Dr. Newton denied.

Mr. Waller opened, and spent his hour after hour in telling his auditory that all the old versions, all the lexicons, the usus loquendi of the Greek classics, that a host of Baptists asserted that immerse-meant baptism; ergo, hence it means in the New Testament always to dip, and that it would be faithful to the original, to so render it in the Holy Scriptures in all instances where it occurs. He read from Stewart, from Wesley, Neander, etc., to prove that immerse means to baptise; therefore, it means nothing else. On this point, and in this way, Mr. W. labored from Tuesday, the 2d, until Tuesday, the 8th, (Sabbath excepted,) laboring two hours each day. On that day he spent one hour in trying to prove that John "Baptized" all Judea, all Jerusalem, and the region round about Jordan, by immersing them. That notwithstanding John baptised in the wilderness, in the place beyond Jordan, where Jesus abode, yet the word baptise had force enough in it, even there to get them under the water, water or no water. To prove that John immersed with water: Our friend from Kentucky, as usual, got his steam so high as to make baptizo put the 3000 under water on the day of Pentecost. To make St. Paul go under the water, in a house. The same of Cornelius, and the Jailor. He was very rampant, and could see nothing so high, no distance, no sort of impossibility in the whole Israelitish host being all immersed "in the cloud and in the sea." Immersion was the idea, the thing, the fact with him, nothing else but immersion.

I need not say that he failed—that Dr. Newton threw difficulties in his way, aye, impossibilities in his way at every step: He made various efforts to bring Mr. W. out on questions of criticisms; but in no case could the hero of many philological battles be got out an inch from the moorings of his authorities. On no account would he venture a rigid criticism of the original. On the 8th day Dr. N. gave Mr. W. a chapter on authorities, lexicons, classics, usus loquendi: every thing that Mr. W. had been building up for some six days, was swept away at once, by the resistless torrent of evidence, and at the close of Dr. N.'s hour, Mr. W. proposed to bring the discussion on the first question to a close that evening, alledging that he would have to go over all his classic ground again if the debate continued, but being the affirmant he had the right to close the debate, and did close it that night.

It is sufficiently clear how Mr. W. considered his success in making good his affirmations, from the fact that in his closing speech he read a challenge to discuss with Dr. N., or any Pedo-Baptist sufficiently endorsed for, the very question then under discussion, with several others, some three months hence. In the judgement of all that I heard converse on the subject, this was a clear and unequivocal giving it up for the time being, and an expression of a wish to have another trial with the Doctor on that question.

The second question:

"The movement of the American Bible Union is gotten up with a desire and determination to substitute immerse, and its cognates, for baptise, and its cognates," was affirmed by Dr. N., and denied by Mr. Waller.

If the opinions of the President and Secretary of the American Bible Union—if the principal agent of that Society—if the opinion of Dr. Dowling, Dr. Ide, Dr. Williams, and a host of other distinguished Baptist ministers, as, also some seven-tenth of the Baptist periodicals could prove the affirmative of the second question, then it was proved beyond all doubt. Mr. W. sometimes argued on one side of the question, and then he would be furious on the other. He argued any where and everywhere; said anything and everything. Would now abuse his brethren that differed from him, and charge that their opposition was founded on Abolitionism—in Boston, ex. New York, etc., etc.; and then would run tilt against infant sprinkling, child kidnapping, and ordinarily would wind up with a chapter on the persecutions of the poor Baptists by Pedo-Baptists.

Thus the matter was gotten up—thus it was carried on—thus the debate ended. Our brethren claim a great victory. The Pedo-Baptists are perfectly satisfied that Dr. N. has sustained himself as a christian, a gentleman, and one that is master of the great question.

of this controversy. Dr. N. stated in reference to [illegible] thus boldly given by Mr. W[illegible], that he was the servant of the Church, &c. whenever his Pedo-Baptist brethren [illegible] that the cause of truth, and the interests of religion, demanded his services, that he would be ready at a moments warning to serve his brethren in this regard, with Mr. W. or any other person. The agony is now over, and we do not find it necessary to look after the dead and wounded, as it was only a matter and question of a dip in the water, vs. a baptising with water by another mode. MELANCTHON.

NEW ORLEANS:

Saturday Morning, July 3.

THE CHRISTIAN POLITICIAN.

The Presidential campaign has fairly begun. The candidates are before the country by the nomination of Conventions representing its two great parties. The good and the bad that can be said of them is being brought out. The hosts of freemen are marshalling themselves on each side. Already, the contest warms. And what now? Just at this time we beg leave to address a few words of friendly warning to you, Christian men, members of the Church of both parties. How widely soever you differ on certain political issues, you are agreed in this—You love God, the truth and your country. Standing upon the threshold of an election involving great principles and enlisting strong feelings, and before you go farther—Pray remember!

YOU ARE CHRISTIANS.—We have no sympathy with those (if there be such) who can not reconcile the duties and occupation of the Christian with the active citizen. What law of the Bible, or what dictate of common sense is it a good, a holy man, a church member, may an official church member from holding and expressing political opinions? Christianity is favorable to liberty, and eternal vigilance is the price of liberty. A spirit of carelessness and listlessness to civil rights is not its offspring. Pure religion undefiled does not disfranchise a man by giving him a conscience of duty, and laying him under the fear of God; it fits him for that heavy responsibility of government that falls to every freeman. When religious men stand aloof from politics, for conscience sake, who guides the ship? Is there any thing in irreligion to make sound legislators, honest executives, good judges? No! Then conscience dictates such a course.

It is no small charge against some Christian men that they are too indifferent to politics. From indolence or distaste, or some other cause, they are not willing to pay the penalty of their republican sovereignty. They pray, as in duty bound, that we may lead "quiet and peaceable lives," and for the other benefits of good government, and fail in the use of their influence and votes for this end. Those important primary meetings, where matters of gravest ultimate import take their shape and tendency, are held without them. Pot-house politicians and active demagogues are permitted to manage this business, and have it all their own way. And when finally the pure-hearted and the conscientious come to exercise their rights at the ballot box, they are too late. The ball has been set in motion and taken its direction before their hands have touched it. Their counsels are behind hand. Perhaps alternate evils have been arranged for them while they slept, and now all that remains for them is to choose the less. Vote they may: but in voting they only play as puppets into the hands of intriguing wire-pullers.

Who are better fitted to consider the best interest of the State than Christian men? Have they not as much to gain or loose, as any? Is there not need of truth, honesty, forbearance, unselfishness, humane and generous enlargement in politics; and whence is this infusion of principle to come if Christian men abjure politics? They bear the expenses of government: if there be oppression they feel it: if there is war they fight and die as freely as any for the country. Their hands have built up these institutions, under the blessing of God, and they are not to be left to the sole custody of the reckless and profane, the self-seeking and time-serving. Let them watch narrowly all that transpires, scrutinize officials, judge offenders, check the froward, put up the good, put down the bad, reward the deserving, oppose unsound or corrupt administrations, promote wise ones, and by all lawful means conserve the peace, safety and prosperity of the body politic. And this we maintain to be no less the privilege than the duty of every Christian freeman.

But in doing this, pray remember that you are Christians. When millions of men are astir there is like to be friction. Make a vow that you will take your religion into this campaign, and come out with it, by the help of God, unsullied. Remember that you are a Christian, and do nothing, say nothing, out of that character.

It is a common remark that our great public elections are attended with grievous backslidings in the hearts of many. They set out, half-way resolved to be moderate, to guard their words and keep their temper. The loud and perhaps angry voices are ringing around them, and they begin to speak loudly, angrily. An unkind temper grows up. The man of wonted meekness indulges in bitterness of spirit; becomes a brawler; keeps late hours; and though he may not get drunk, disputes. A few months of election have sadly changed his character. He has laid the foundation for much repentance. The Spirit is grieved. The Church is shamed by his conduct. And of what benefit has this acerbity, this intemperate zeal, been to his cause? Has it convinced any body? A calm, firm, dignified course would have been as effectual for good, and left no cause for bitter upbraidings in the hour of reflection.

The war of opinion may be manly and friendly. Every christian should feel bound, as far as in him lies, to keep it from degenerating into wrangling and scurrilous personalities. Vulgar abuse and detraction are sins at any time. Christians need not be told that their Divine Master holds them to truth, purity and justice always, and that even Presidential elections give no dispensation to their consciences. It was said artlessly by an English traveler in the United States, when Jackson and Adams were candidates for the Presidency, that "The Americans had selected for the highest office in their country the two worst men in it." To one who heard all that was said, and read all that was written, it doubtless seemed so. And so it seems at every election. But what part have Christians in creating this impression? They should rebuke it. The passions of men stand in the way of their judgments. It is the difficulty of popular Governments to appeal to the judgement of the masses and get their decision, without arousing their passions. This chafing and inflaming the public mind with false statements and exaggerations is needless and hurtful, and no good man can lend himself to it. It is this that dishonors and endangers our institutions, and makes their perpetuity a continually recurring problem. There are enough of the evil and designing whose work it is to lash the waves into tempest and tumult. Christian men may not forget themselves and be carried away. It is theirs, in opposition to each, to act as conservative elements; to check excesses, and by an example of moderation to abate and relieve the inevitable friction of popular Government. This is a service truly patriotic—acceptable to God and man.

Be sober. Let your moderation be known to all men. Avoid all bitterness and wrath, and especially the things that gender coldness and mistrust, and alienation, between brethren. Frequent the Sanctuary. Read the Bible, and pray as at other times, and even more. The fashion of this world passeth away. Very soon the platforme and the processions of this busy day will have gone by, and President and people will have gone on to the Judgement. There is an election pending of vastly more importance than the Presidency of these United States. It is your election, reader. Strive to make it sure.

The College Commencements.

Do not our readers feel an interest in the education which the M. E. Church South is dispensing to the young men and women of the land? Let them show it by attendance upon the Anniversary Exercises published in this week's paper. They will consult, in doing this, not only their duty to education, but secure to themselves a refined and elevated satisfaction. Cheer on the cause by your presence—greet it with your smile. Look at the "bill of fare" presented. Can anything be more inviting?

To the young men and ladies, who are to be "the observed of all observers" on these brilliant occasions, and on whom many hearts hope, we present congratulations for the progress made, and the bright prospects opening before them. Let them not think too much on pleasure—usefulness is the most and the best that we can get out of life. When the flutter of Commencement is over, we commend to their serious attention the thoughts below. They were delivered not long since by Rev. H. W. Beecher, before a graduating class. Let those who would take POSITION hear from one who stands high, how it is to be done:

"True men are not properly valued, and fictitious men are over-estimated, by a loose habit of judgment. Real integrity is almost indestructible. If it goes down, it is only to rise again like a good ship, sinking in the trough of the sea, but rising again with the billows; while a bad man, when he falls, is like a stone cast into the water, which has not the least elasticity to rise again. A good man cast down is not destroyed; but a thoroughly bad man is drowned forever. In the case of an immoral man with great genius, he may fall and rise again, and fluctuate, but eventually he is bound to sink. * Be strong, strong by outward actions as well as inward worth. Cloude that swing through the summer sky with dumb thunderbolts, parsimonious of rain, are seen and forgotten in the same hour—but those that with a mighty besom sweep out the stagnant vault and visit every roof and every leaf with the treasures of rain, ask no praising. Their work is their praise—fountains are their credentials—rills run to carry their praises—troops of flowers thank them, and all the forests clap their hands and wave their leafy scarfs to their honor. Some men there be, that are but mighty wind-clouds. They appear. The heavens are grand with portents. All men stand in awe—their praises are before hand—the farmer waits—the traveler hides—birds hush—the very woods are still, and insects forbear. When all is past, and not a drop has fallen, men laugh and send it on its thankless errand with malisons, for a pompous cheat. The effects which are left, tell what men are—rank follows power, and measures the stride of the footstep. The force which men exert, not that which they could exert, if they pleased, must determine their position. The archer, whose arrow stands within a hair's breadth of the centre, must bear the palm over the archer that could hit the very eye, but whose modesty, or indolence, or selfish indulgence, held his arrow in the quiver. Genius unexerted, is no more genius than a bushel of acorns is a forest of oaks. There be epics in men's brains, just as there are oaks in acorns, but the tree and the book must come out before we can measure them. We very naturally recall here that large class of grumblers and wishers who spend their time longing to be higher than they are, while they should have been employed in advancing themselves. These bitterly moralize on the injustice of society. Do they want a change? Let them change, who prevents them? If you are as high as your faculties permit you to rise in the scale of society, why do you complain of men? It is God that arranged the law of precedence. Implead him or be silent! If you have the capacity for a higher station, take it, what hinders you? How many men would love to go to sleep and wake up Rothchilds or Astors! How many men would fain go to bed dunces to wake up Solomons! You reap what you have sown. They that sow dunce-seed, vice-seed, laziness-seed, usually get a crop. They that sow the wind reap the whirlwind. A man of mere capacity, never developed, is only an organized day-dream with a skin on it. A flint and a genius that won't strike fire, are no better than wet junk wood. We have Scripture for it, that a 'living dog is better than a dead lion.' If you would go up, go; if you would be seen, shine. If there is one youth here throbbing with a sacred ambition, let him come out of the garrulous rout that vex the hill of difficulties but never ascend it; who blow soap-bubbles, and because they are round, and they can see their own faces in them, swear they are living globes of immortality, and ask God to give them an orbit among the immortal stars. Let our praises follow you. Accept, never solicit them."

Death of Henry Clay.

By Telegraph, the news has been received of the death of Henry Clay. He died in Washington City, Tuesday, June 29, at half past 11 o'clock A. M.

This melancholy announcement cast a solemn gloom over our entire community. Whig and democrat recognized a great national misfortune; and whig and democrat spoke sorrowfully of the sad but not unexpected event.

Our city authorities designated yesterday as a day of mourning and solemn commemoration of this national bereavement. Business was suspended, and the principal streets and dwellings were draped in mourning.

LITERARY HONORS.—At the Commencement of Lagrange College, Ala., June 9, the degree of A. B. was conferred on J. Baker, B. B. Smith, T. R. Smith, J. A. Madding, Robt. King, J. S. Mayes and J. R. Mullens, of Alabama; W. W. Troup and Rev. J. A. Peebles, of Mississippi, and E. M. Davis, of N. C.

That of A. M. on Professor T. G. Rice, P. P. Keyes, Esq., Rev. L. B. McDonald, (Alabama Conference,) and Rev. J. S. McAlister, (Arkansas Conference,) Alumni of the College.

The honorary degree of A. M. was conferred on Dr. T. S. Malone, of Athens; and that of D. D. on Rev. B. H. Hubbard, A. M., President of the Tennessee Conference Female Institute.

At the Commencement of Emery and Henry College, Va., on June 9, the degree of A. B. was conferred on sixteen graduates.

Also, the honorary degree of A. M. was conferred upon Wm. R. Poindexter, President of the Female Collegiate Institute at Macon, Miss.

OUR INDIAN SCHOOLS.—Dr. Sehon writes, in the N. and L. Christian Advocate, 17th ult., that he has just returned from waiting on the Indian authorities at Washington, and reports this gratifying result:

"We have most satisfactorily arranged all matters with the government in regard to our different Indian schools, and take great pleasure in reporting the high estimate in which our principal and most important schools—the Fort Leavenworth, Creek and Chickasaw Manual Labor schools—are now held at Washington. Each is blessed with an able and energetic superintendent, and each now doing well. The Creek school is again in full and successful operation, notwithstanding all the attempts made to prostrate it. The Chickasaw Academy has now 120 scholars, and is doing well."

HO, FOR THE REGULAR WORK.—Dr. Pook, in his valedictory of 3d ult., informs his readers that "he declined to stand as a candidate." He desires to return to the regular work of the ministry, and has for years entertained the purpose.

We suspect this account of the matter is somewhat like the Irishman's, who said he had been forced to volunteer.

DR. N. BANGS.—At the late session of the New York East Conference, Dr. Bangs was superannuated at his own request. Strong resolutions in favor of temperance were passed.

REV. J. E. COBB has been elected ass't editor of the Memphis Christian Advocate. Mr. C. is one of the best writers in the church.

MARIANA, FLA.—The Florida Whig, of June 26, contains the following pleasing intelligence. Rev. G. W. Price is pastor of the Church:

"A revival has been going on in the Methodist Church of this place, for the past three weeks. The meetings are still kept up with no abatement of interest. A large number, between thirty and forty, we believe, have been added to the church."

DEATH OF BISHOP GADSDEN.—The Right Rev. Christopher Edwards Gadsden, D. D. of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and Bishop of the Diocese of South Carolina, died in Charleston on Thursday last. He was sixty-eight years of age. He was a native of Charleston, and a classmate in Yale College of John C. Calhoun. The funeral, which was attended by a large concourse of citizens, took place on Friday afternoon.

When our country becomes as densely populated as Holland, it will contain 837,433,019 inhabitants—nearly the present number of the human race.

METHODIST PRESS.

BRUSH COLLEGE, vs. BIBLICAL INSTITUTE: Dr. Parsons, in Notes of Travel, writes, passing through Concord, N. H.:

"As we pass out of this pleasant place, we see just on our left the Methodist Biblical Institute, where Dr. Dempster makes preachers upon the Presbyterian plan—Secundum artem. As father Taylor said, in a recent sermon, when speaking of the angels, that he would not 'tip his beaver to them' by way of confessing their superiority over him, so say we in regard to these theological seminaries, which, in the general way, do as much to put out the fire of native zeal in the heart, as they do to light up the flame of useful knowledge in the mind. The most useful and distinguished preachers in this country have come from Dr. Cartwright's 'Brush College,' as he calls it, the active itinerant field."

AS IT USED TO BE: Dr. Elliot, on his reappearance at the helm of the W. C. Advocate, thus alludes to the state of things thirty-four years ago, when he entered the itinerancy:

"At that period, aside from the Episcopacy, there were no other grades in office, save presiding elders and circuit preachers. One or two book agents, it is true, were selected, but even the office of book agent was scarcely then an integral part of our economy; it was just introduced, and the incumbents were still very closely allied to the itinerancy. An editor was then unknown as such; for his duties were considered of so little importance, that his office was merged in that of book agent. When the Methodist Magazine was first issued, in 1818, it was edited by Rev. Joshua Soule, since Bishop Soule. After being employed all day in packing books, the Magazine was the work of the night. In reference to this circumstance, the Bishop, in a vein of grave pleasantry, used to call it the 'work of darkness.' Then there were no professors for colleges or seminaries, for we had no such appendages in the Church. No agents for benevolent institutions were selected, as no agencies were then necessary to accomplish the intention of the Church, other than what was done by the ministers or private individuals. The circuit and the station were then identical, or so nearly one, that the difference between them was very small indeed."

IMPROVEMENT.—Our good neighbor, the T. W. Banner, (4th vol.,) comes this week with a new head, and four additional columns of matter. Success to Bro. Rettenstein and his patrons!

EX-BISHOP HAMLINE'S CASE.—The editor of the New York Advocate says:

"The acceptance of Bishop Hamline's resignation, and the debates on the subject, have been variously commented upon in the papers of the Church South. In the Southern there is a very strong smack of Methodist Puseyism—not of the real thing—not of the indelible imprint of episcopal ordination, but Presbyterial ordination."

THE CHICAGO (ILL.) PAPER: The Conference, North, having made provision for establishing a Church organ at that point, the last number of the Michigan Christian Advocate informs its readers:

"The Michigan Christian Advocate will cease to be published at Adrain, at the close of the current volume; it will, in fact, die with the last number of the present volume, 'die shoutiug' on the Thursday of the last week of the current year, to receive a resurrection at Chicago, improved at least five fold, on some day of the first week of the new year, 1853, under the name of the North Western Christian Advocate."

S. M. PULPIT—LAY DELEGATION.—The editor of the Memphie Ch. Advocate thus remarks upon Prof. Deems' position:

"Rigidly conservative as we hold ourselves to be, on all points contained in the essential doctrines and polity of Methodism, yet we have nothing to say against such a delegation, for we believe it will, if properly arranged, introduce to the system a new element of power, without injuriously affecting any of the old."

SPANISH DEPARTMENT.—The last two numbers of the Ch. Observer (Cal.) have presented a column or more (1st page) in the Spanish language. The editor speaks of the arrangement as permanent:

"Having secured the constant services of the Rev. J. S. Malone for this purpose, it is our intention to devote some two or three columns to the paper of this department, and we feel no hesitation in pledging for the undertaking the most valuable results."

NEW EDITOR.—Rev. Daniel Wise has been elected editor of Zion's Herald. Mr. Stevens turns himself over to his General Conference Appointments. We regret he should leave off his weekly visits to our office, to be succeeded by any one. He made the Herald one of the leading wooklies of the Church, and will doubtless give the National Magazine a place in the highest literature of our country.

Resolutions—O. B. F. College.

DEAR SIR: You will please give the two following resolutions a place in your columns.

Resolved, That the Board of Trustees, of the Oak Bowery Female Collage, still entertain undiminished confidence in the ability and faithfulness of the Faculty of said Institution, and take great pleasure in expressing their satisfaction with the examination and commencement exercises just closed.

Resolved, further, By the Board, that Miss M. J. Toomer, of the musical department, has rendered uniform and unbounded satisfaction, and that in our opinion the Oak Bowery Female College now offers unsurpassed inducements in that department.

J. F. DOWNELL, Sec. of the Board.

Rev. Dr. Collins, President of Emory and Henry College, was last week re-elected for the next five years. This will satisfy the numerous friends of the college as to the Dr.'s whereabouts. [Hol. Ch. Adv.

COTTON GIN, MISS.—Rev. T. W. Manning, Athens Circuit, writes of an interesting meeting, 13th and 14th ult. Seven accessions to the Church.

LITERARY NOTICES.

THE FRIEND OF MOSES, or a Defence of the Pentateuch, as an authentic and inspired document, against the objections of modern skepticism. By W. T. Hamilton, D. D. New York: 1852. M. W. Dodd: 8vo. pp. 552.

'Tis a sad fact that Moses needs a friend—in certain circles. Some of the literati of the last half century have come to speaking lightly, and even contemptuously, of his claims as a historian. Several of the growing and conceited family of the Ologies have set themselves against him—among the boldest of which are geology, physiology, ethnology and archæology. Dr. Hamilton vindicates the testimony of Moses, with the zeal of a Christian and ability of a profound scholar and man of science. His book has large scope, is eloquent and practical. It will heal the diseased faith of many. Just now his arguments for the unity of the human race, a point evidently assumed by Moses and all the sacred writers, possess much interest and utility. The Doctor has some very ingenious and original theories on this subject. Archæological revealments, so much vaunted by modern infidels, are sifted with satisfactory thoroughness, and geology is reconciled to Genesis. The work is an honor to the author, and will be serviceable to the truth.

The publisher, Dodd, has done a good part by the book—as is his wont. For sale by J. Ball.

WHAT NOW? For Young Ladies leaving School. By C. F. Deems, A. M. New York: 1852. M. W. Dodd: 16mo. pp. 130.

A question, with a very appropriate contribution to an answer. The author, as President of a Female College, is well prepared to advise young ladies with kindness and wisdom. This little souvenir, dedicated to a graduating class, might well be wrapped in every young lady's diploma and conveyed with it to her. Much remains to be learned and done after that happy event, and it tells what and how.

For sale by J. Ball.

THE LADIES' REPOSITORY, for July.

Dr. Tefft, in taking leave, gives this history of progress: At the end of Bp. Hamline's term the Repository had 3000 subscribers; at the end of Dr. Thomsen's term, 5000; at the end of his 17,000.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE, for June.

This old, unpretending, musty-looking monthly, keeps up its contrast between outside and in. Of the table of contents, we have been most interested by FIVE YEARS IN THE WEST INDIES. The author and the reviewer are Englishmen. They shew up the evil British negrophilists have done in wholesale emancipation. The stagnation of trade and commerce, the ridiculous pride, laziness and insolence of the blacks, the degradation of society, and the depreciation of what was once the most valuable property in the world, make a relishing picture for an Abolitionist!

LIFE OF J. W. CHILDS. By Rev. J. E. Edwards, of the Virginia Conference. Richmond, Va., Jno. Early: 1852. 12mo. pp. 294.

The publisher has sent us, by mail, a copy, and we are glad to be informed by his letter that several copies are on their way to "Ball." Mr. Edwards has made happy and skillful use of he materials in hand for quickening the Church and ministry. Mr. Childs was for twenty-three years a Methodist preacher. He was an extraordinary man. The reader will see this by one extract in which his biographer gives his uniform private habits—p. 18. "He rose at 4 in the morning, partially made his toilet: then took his Bible and knelt at a chair near a table on which his light was placed, and there continued in earnest, secret prayer, for a length of time, becoming occasionally much engaged and excited. Then he would open his Bible and read, taking it in regular order, every few moments audibly asking God for light upon the Word. Sometimes he would consult Wesley's Notes, a copy of which he always had at hand. Then again he would engage in prayer, spending altogether from one to two hours in that exercise. He would then finish his toilet, after which he usually made the entry upon his diary. Then return to his devotions for a short time; then pursued his regular course of study till called to family prayers. After breakfast he immediately retired to his room, where, after prayer, he pursued his books, or writing, with occasional intermissions for prayer till time to go to his appointment; not, however, without first praying with the family where he was staying. On his way, if time allowed, he would stop at houses on the road, speak to the family on religion, and propose a word of prayer."

There is a sample of the man. Does not the reader wish to know more of him?

TEMPERANCE.—At the late session of the New York Conference, Dr. Peck moved the adoption of the following resolutions, and there were adopted unanimously, by a rising vote:

"Resolved, That it is the duty of all Christians, and especially of all Christian ministers, heartily and efficiently to co-operate in the great Temperance Reformation.

"Resolved, That while we appreciate the power of those moral agencies that have been employed, and rejoice that so much has been accomplished by them, we are fully convinced that the legal prohibition of the traffic in intoxicating drinks is indispensably necessary to the success and final triumph of the Temperance cause.

"Resolved, That as the Maine Liquor Law, prohibiting the traffic in intoxicating drinks, presents the most feasible and the most efficient mode of action upon the subject, we earnestly and affectionately exhort all our people to co-operate with the efforts being made to secure to this State the blessings of such a law."

In this Conference there has been, during the year, a decrease of 161 members, and increase of 686 probationers.

The Vain Boast of Romanism.

The "game of brag" is a favorite one with the Papal party. They are growing, outgrowing and overgrowing every thing—taking the country, and all that. This is to palsy the Protestant opposition with fear, and to gain over the fluctuating and time-serving by the show of the strong side. The following figures and statements made by a Roman priest in this country, writing back to his brothers and exhorting them to duty, speak honestly and forcibly:

"Under the heading, 'A Word in Season to the Priests of Ireland,' the Rev. R. Mullen, Missionary to the United States, on behalf of the Catholic University, endorses, unintentionally a statement, 'that of the number of Irish Catholics emigrating to the United States, one third, at least, were lost to the Roman Catholic Church.' The Rev. gentleman recommends most earnestly that 'millions be saved from spiritual destruction.'

"The present population of the United States is about 25,000,000, and of these the Catholic church claims only 1,980,000. From the year 1825 to 1844, 1,256,000 left Ireland one million of whom came to America; the proportion of Catholics amongst them may be fairly estimated at 800,000. Since that period to the present the numbers who emigrated thither from Ireland, at the lowest calculation, were 1,500,000; and taking the Catholics as above, they will have in nine years, 1,200,000. A large number (say a half a million) came from Germany, some from Italy, France, Belgium and other countries, during the last ten years, half of whom were Catholics, say 250,000. Twelve years ago America had a Catholic population (according to Dr. England, Bishop of Charleston,) 1,200,000. Calculating the increase of this number by births, at the very small number of 500,000 and adding for converts in the larger cities and towns 20,000, will show the total:

Catholic emigrants from 1844 to 1852	1,200,000
Catholic emigrants from other countries	250,000
American Catholic population 12 years ago	1,200,000
Increase by births since	500,000
Number of Converts	20,000
Number who ought to be Catholics	3,970,000
Number who are Catholics	1,980,000
Number lost to the Catholic Church	1,990,000
Say, in round numbers	2,000,000

Mr. Mullen is not of opinion that the evil which he deplores is to be set down to the account of the Bishops and Priests of the United States. There is not, writes this enthusiastic and zealous servant of the Church, "a more apostolic, prudent, zealous, self-sacrificing body than the American Bishops. It is not their fault that the faith dies out in so many millions."

These statistics confirm the opinion we have often expressed, that the Roman Catholics who come to this country are in vast numbers, led to break away from the trammels of that corrupt and destroying Church.

A GOOD ONE.—Sometime since the Methodist Episcopal Ministers, of New York, met in convention, and denounced the fugitive slave law as being opposed to the Scriptures. This aroused a member of one of the churches, who answered this ministerial document with pungency, and closed his communication with an extract from one of the church expositions for the use of Sabbath Schools, as follows:

Who was Philemon?

He was a minister, a fellow-laborer with St. Paul.

Who was Onesimus?

A slave of Philemon, who having robbed his master, run away from him.

What became of Onesimus?

St. Paul found him, and after being instrumental in his conversation, sent him back to his master, not feeling it lawful to detain him.

The writer challenged these ministers to draw any other than the following conclusions from this passage of a book which they thught Sabbath schools:

1. That Philemon was a minister.
2. That he was a slaveholder.
3. That his slave run away from him.
4. That St. Paul, another minister, found him and returned him to his master.

The effect produced by this communication was electric. People began to examine for themselves, and the reaction commenced, the ablest theologians in the city taking the lead; and the result is that now the fugitive slave law is as quietly executed in that city as any other on the statute book.

BISHOP HEADING'S LEGACIES.—We learn from the New York Commercial Advertiser, that the Treasurer of the American Bible Society has received five hundred dollars from the executors of the late Bishop Hedding, being a legacy left by that venerable man for the spread of the Scriptures. At a recent meeting of the Board of Managers of the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, the Rev. Mr. Vincent, one of the executors of the Bishop, announced that he had left $1000 to that Society, and had made the Society residuary legatee; this will add from $7000 to $8000 to the bequest.

NAUVOO.—A correspondent of the Madison (Ind.) Courier has been making a pilgrimage to the ruins of what was the stronghold of the "Latter-Day Saints," in the time when Joe Smith was the Prophet. We extract the following from his interesting letter:

The city of the Mormons once had 20,000 inhabitants; they are now but 2000. One-half of the houses the Mormons left have been removed or pulled down, and the other half are tenantless. Each lot contains an acre. In walking through its deserted streets I started several quails, in the midst of the once populous city. The mansion of Joe Smith is kept by his wife, once his widow, but now again a wife—of another and a live man—as a tavern. Between this mansion and the river are the remains of a famous hotel, which was abandoned after its walls had reached the second story. The walls are of fine pressed brick, with marble doorsills and caps. Joe's store is also standing. The Masonic Hall is a fine brick building, three stories high. I am told that all the Mormons were masons. Their lodge was under the jurisdiction of the Grand Lodge of the State of Illinois. Smith, I am told, initiated some of the "mothers in church;" when the charter was taken from them, and the lodge closed. A company of French Socialists have purchased a portion of the property—the site and the ruins of the temple included. They number about 400.

THE WASHINGTON MONUMENT.—The National Intelligencer has the following: "The Washington National Monument is now languishing for the want of means to carry it on. The Board of Managers beg leave to suggest to the clergymen throughout the United States that, as the anniversary of our independence will fall on Sunday, they shall each and all take up collections in their churches for this great and patriotic object."

CALIFORNIA CORRESPONDENCE.

DEAR BRETHREN.—McTYEIRE: Perhaps it may not be uninteresting to your readers to hear from the land of gold, and the Pacific Conference. As far as we have seen the hills and vales of this unequalled country, they are unlike any of the kind in other countries. I am sure I cannot describe them, so as to give any tolerable notion of them. Vast plains greet the eye, covered over with the most nutritious kind of clover or wild oats, and sometimes both together, and variegated with tens of thousands of most beautiful flowers, of divers species and sundry colors, varnished over with the most beautiful gloss, peculiar to the climate. Skirting these plains are the table lands, swelling up to considerable height, presenting in their undulations a most beautiful aspect; here the eye rests upon a number of knowls in conical shape, there a series of parallel ridges, resemblings hay ricks; and elsewhere in the same view, all is cut out in form of segments of circles. Then looming up unto Heaven the snow veiled faces of mountains of Alpine altitude, claiming the respect due to higher standing. The whole country seems to be a succession of mountains in valleys, and valleys on the mountains. Sometimes in traveling up one of these valleys as the mountains seem to meet, the traveller is induced to think the road will soon run up hill and then take a cloud, but to the great satisfaction of the wanderer, he slides round into another vale of beauty and loveliness.

Under the maturing touches of the king of harvest the face of nature looks like hills of ripe oats, or fields of green wheat, or more properly like mountains of gold in oceans of silver. Respecting the mineral resources, the country is they have discovered another rich lead (vein of) mine or another discovery of quartz, some of which are exceedingly rich; one lump weighing twenty pounds has been lately found. Sister Campbell, in whose house I write informs me, that her son-in-law states, there has been a lead discovered, which is so rich as to induce some miners to offer one thousand dollars for the privilege of working it one hour. All accounts from the mines, represent the miners as prosperous and happy. The agricultural resources are inexhaustable. Dr. Bascomb says that the largest possible imigration to continue during the next twenty years, would not fill up these valleys, allowing each voter 160 acres for his claim. Land for cultivation is worth $80 per acre in this neighborhood, and at Vera Cruz it is worth $100 per acre. This may seem extravagant to you, but when you learn, that the produce of two and a half acres has been computed at $7,509, five thousand of which has been realized in actual cash by Dr. Bascomb, you will not be surprised at the present rates. So these are only some of the great things which have been realized.

Here things go rushingly, with life and energy. The Pacific Conference has been organised, session closed, a new year is before us, and the best of all is "God is with us."—Yes, thank God, the Pacific Conference is established on permanent basis, on these shores. I trust this infant daughter will live long, to honor the hoary heads of her many mothers of the Southern family of Conferences. We are respectfully informed that we owe Dr. Somers the thanks we now render him, for having named this child in prospect. Thanks also, to Dr. Wightman for having publicly baptized her, with ink and paper. We hope they will extend a fostering care over her, by way of advocating her claims &c.

Our session, like the name, was truly pacific, in every sense; love and harmony prevailed in our deliberations; and each esteemed other before himself. Never have I seen preachers more happy or willing to go into any part of the vineyard. The common principle seemed to be, We are come to work and labor, we will anywhere, God being our helper. Our paper, the Christian Observer, will inform you of the number of laborers, and their appointments, which will relieve me from the task, but please permit me to inform you, that three of these preachers have sprung from Northern seed, through the golden soil of California. So you see we have some home manufacture here.

Brother Wm. H. Long has been a worthy minister of the Congregational Church, Brother Munnier, travelled eight years in a Northern Conference, and has a fine report from Dr. Morrow, who was a member of this Conference, as also from others. The third is an influential Dr. Moore, who has changed his notions concerning the division, from reading Judge Nelson's decision on the Church suit.

So you see how the Lord is prospering his cause, our righteous cause in these ends of the earth. We have nothing so fear, but much to hope for God is giving us favor with the people, who recieve us kindly. In this might of the God of Isreal we will go onward to conquest and victory.

Before us lies a vast field, white unto the harvest, Cries are ringing in our ears, "Come over and help us." It is supposed that thirty men more are necessary to supply the present demand for laborers. Lord of the harvest deign to call and send them, to this field than which, a more interesting, the world can not present. Here we actually go into all the world and preach to the different nations, kindreds, tongues and people, in the same hour, for as the day of Pentecost, they meet us here and although we have not the gift of tongues, we can preach to them all in our own, which they understand (at least some among them.) Will the Church pray that they hear effectually, and then as they return to their own country, to proclaim that Jesus is the Christ. Glorious indeed then will our prospect of spreading, scriptual Holiness all over the earth, from north to south, from east to west. The thought is inexhaustible. To see our beloved Christianity, perching on the Isthmus, and in the Cherubic form, spreading wings over the continents of the earth, and the isles of the sea, dispelling the gloom of superstition and idolatry, and irradiating the hearts with the light of the knowledge of the glory of God, in the face of Jesus Christ.

NATIONAL AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.—The National Agricultural Convention assembled at Washington on the 1st ult. Marshall Wilder, of Massachusetts, was chosen President, and among the Secretaries we find the name of De Bow, of Louisiana. The annual subscription to the Society was fixed at $2. Annual meetings are to be held in Washington on the first Monday in February. A report was made in favor of the establishment, by government, of an Agricultural Bureau. Judge Douglas gave notice of a minority report, recommending the establishment of an agricultural department in the Smithsonian Institute.

Obituary Notices.

Died—In Perry County, Alabama, June 4th, Mrs. Mary Tabitha Wells, wife of Rev. J. M. Wells, of the Alabama Conference, after an illness of fifteen days. She was hopefully converted and joined the M. E. Church, in Mt. Zion, Brush Creek Circuit, Alabama Conference, under the ministry of the Rev. Wm. B. Neal. She had been married about two years.

Consistently and uniformly pious, consecrated to the service of God, she never murmured at the privations of life—but engaged in the peculiar labors of the itinerancy with that resignation and high sense of duty that becomes those set apart for so blessed a calling. On her, her husband leaned for comfort and encouragement. Wherever she traveled, she impressed with her meekness, and with her devotion to the great business to which she had given her all. To her, death was not clothed with terrors. She died not only peacefully, but triumphantly, like a Christian—exhorting her husband—oneouraging her friends.

While her numerous friends deploro her loss, let them rejoice in the assurance of her now unfading inheritance. Let her afflicted companion, her mourning relations, her bereaved friends, look to the time when the revelation of eternity's scenes shall present her, radient with celestial light and beauty. May God bless and preserve the infant daughter she has left without a mother.

"Jackson Lawrence deliberately shot his brother, Llorrow Lawrence, on the 13th inst., near the mouth of Red River, in Clarke county. He died almost instantly, some fifteen shots having entered his head and body. Lawrence made his escape, and is still at large. We learn that they had a falling out some time ago about a small matter, and had feelings have existed among some of the difficulty which was the cause of the shooting was a disagreement about a line; their farms joined, and since the first difficulty Lawrence refused to let his brother Morris join fences with him, which he put up. Last Sunday, Morris went out and put up his fence again; and found his brother Jackson there. Some alteration took place, and Jackson remarked that he would go to the house and get his gun and shoot him. He started off, and two men who were with Morris warned to him that he had better got out of the way, for perhaps Jackson would shoot. He replied no, he would not. In a short time Jackson returned with his gun, levelled it at Morris and shot him dead. The gun was loaded with slugs and shot. Some sixteen slugs of shot took effect in his head and body."

General Intelligence.

Meeting of the Bar.

At a meeting of the members of the Bar of New Orleans, held in the Supreme Court Room on Thursday, July 1, to render homage to the memory of Henry Clay, on motion of M. M. Cohen, Esq., the Hon. George Eustis, Chief Justice of the State of Louisiana, was called to the Chair, and A. K. Josephs appointed Secretary.

The meeting having been opened by an address from the President, on motion of R. N. Ogden, Esq., seconded by the Hon. I. E. Morse, and after appropriate and eloquent remarks from both gentlemen, it was resolved that a Committee of Eight be appointed by the Chair to prepare resolutions suitable to the occasion, to be, when adopted, offered to the Supreme Court, with the request that they be spread upon the minutes of that Court, in accordance therewith. Messrs. R. N. Ogden, M. M. Cohen, Charles Maurian, I. E. Morse, E. A. Bradford, Edw. Rawle, J. R. Price and Henry St. Paul were appointed, and the meeting adjourned until Friday, July 2, to receive the report of said committee, when, having met pursuant to adjournment, the Hon. R. N. Ogden, chairman of the same, reported the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted;

It has pleased the Almighty Disposer of the lives of men to call Henry Clay to rest from his great labors. His fame as a statesman belongs to the whole people of this great Union. The members of this Bar take a peculiar pride in his high standing as one of their profession and as their immediate associate.

Therefore, be it Resolved, That we bow with resignence and submission to this afflicting dispensation of an all wise Providence which has given fullness to the fame and perfection to the character of our illustrious brother.

Resolved, That we will ever cherish the memory of Henry Clay with sacred regard, as one who, in his learning—his eloquence—his integrity and his noble bearing, has raised the profession which he adorned up to the high standard of his world-wide fame.

Resolved, That the name and the deeds of Henry Clay have been transferred by death into the sacred keeping of history, and will ever stand as a noble exemplification of all that elevates the American character—in his unyielding integrity—his holy patriotism—his deep wisdom—his matchless eloquence—his sublime and unselfish devotion to the glory of his own land, and his ardent encouragement of the hopes of liberty throughout the world. In his life, without fear, and without reproach, he kept the brightness of his fame, which, as he went down to the shades of death,

"Great in the mouths of wisest censure,"

Resolved, That we condole with the immediate family of the illustrious dead, and with the whole American people in this great national bereavement.

On motion of Alfred Hennen, Esq., it was resolved that a Committee of Three be appointed to transmit a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

Messrs. Hennen, Barnett, Duncan and Strawbridge were appointed on said committee, and, on motion of Mr. Strawbridge, the Hon. Chief Justice Eustis was added.

On motion of H. H. Strawbridge, Esq., it was resolved that a copy of the resolutions of the Bar of New Orleans, just adopted, be presented by the Attorney General to the Supreme Court, with the request of the Bar that they may be spread upon the minutes of the Court.

On motion of Hon. E. Rawle, the meeting adjourned.

[Signed] GEORGE EUSTIS, Chairman.

Henry VanOerlinden, Clerk.

Board of Aldermen—Wednesday Evening, June 30, 1852.—This board met last evening, seven members present, Mr. Calhoun presiding.

A message from the Mayor was read, announcing the death of Henry Clay, whereupon the following preamble and resolutions, reported by a joint committee consisting of Messrs. Stockton, Burke, Labatut and Clarke from the Upper Board, and Messrs. Eustis, Heermann, Lauzis and Watkins, from the Board of Assistants, were read and unanimously adopted:

Whereas, it was announced to this Council last evening, that death had taken away from from America her beloved statesman and patriot, Henry Clay, there was an immediate adjournment moved, that some proper expression of feeling might be given; and whereas, we now meet to record upon our archives that which is already written upon the hearts of all, that Henry Clay was a great men, great because he was good, and a statesman respected not of party partialities, but because he narrowed not his mind to any thing less broad than his country, and his whole country; so it is that we mourn his loss as a loss to the American people, and while the Union lasts the name of Henry Clay shall be hallowed, and may this be for all time; and whereas, it is usual on occasions similar, not only to express our feelings of regret at the death of a great man, but to show some demonstration of respect for the memory,

Be it therefore resolved by the Common Council of the city of New Orleans, That they have heard with deep sorrow the death of that sage patriot, Henry Clay; that as a mark of respect for the memory of the deceased, that Friday, the 2nd day of July, be observed as a day of mourning, and the Mayor is hereby requested to order minute guns to be fired on said day from sun-rise to sunset.

Resolved further, That the masters of all vessels in port be requested to hoist their flags at half-mast, and the Mayor is also requested to have the flags of all the public buildings hung at half-mast on the day of mourning.

Resolved further, That the Secretaries of both Boards of Aldermen be and they are hereby directed to have the respective Council Chambers hung in mourning for six months; that the members of the Common Council wear the usual badge of mourning on the left arm for six months.

Resolved, That the Mayor be and he is hereby directed to forward a copy of the foregoing resolutions to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Mayor be requested to issue his Proclamation recommending to the citizens generally, to suspend all business on the day of mourning.

The Board then adjourned.

Mr. J. S. Thrasher.—On Monday night this gallant and whole-souled Amorican received an impromptu serenade from a party composed of several hundred of our citizens. Had his presence in our midst been known, thousands would have thronged to the St. Louis.

After several handsomely executed airs from Mesmor's band, Mr. Thrasher was forced to appear. He acknowledged the compliment in a few, manly, sensible and graceful remarks. He said that immediately on landing in this country, he felt restless till he had told the chivalrous people of Louisiana how deeply gateful he was to them for their kindness. Col. Wheat addressed him in a very handsome and spirited style. No man could be more heartily welcomo to our midst than is Mr. Thrasher.

Commissioners Gone.—We learn that Messrs. W. P. Converse and L. H. Place, commissioners of the consolidated debt of the city, left last evening on the steamer Boulder en route for New York, to superintend the sale of New Orleans bonds, to take place on the 10th inst.

Convicted.—The jury in the case of Nathan H. Crist, charged with the murder of Theodore Nye, in Mobile, rendered a verdict of guilty, with the death penalty, on Tuesday evening last.

Fire at Shreveport.—We learn from the officers of the steamer Caddo No. 2, which arrived yesterday from Shreveport, that on Friday night last (25th ult.) a fire broke out in Shreveport, by which the Saddlery establishment of Mr. Thompson, and the store of Mr. Jordan were entirely consumed. The total loss by the fire is estimated at not less than $30,000, of which amount Mr. Jordan's loss is put down at $27,000, $10,000 of which was covered by insurance.

Red River falling from Shreveport down, a heavy rise reported at Fulton, above the raft.

Alabama Crops.—A merchant, of Mobile, writing from Perry county, Ala., says: "The cotton crops, so far as I have seen them, are very backward, but the stands good. Some plantations are seriously injured by the worm. The wheat and oat crops are good. Corn is suffering very much for want of rain. In the black lands, however, there are pretty good prospects for both corn and cotton."

On the 4th inst. the annual Eton College speeches were delivered in the presence of Prince Albert, and a number of the nobility and foreign ministers. One of the lads, named Evered, boldly recited Burke's celebrated speech against taxing the American colonies. The reporter of the London Times says that "this, in the presence of Abbott Lawrence, had a marked effect and was loudly applauded."

Arrival of the Wm. Penn.

Terrible Mortality on board the Steamship Philadelphia.

The steamship Wm. Penn, Capt. Marks, arrived last evening from New York, having made the passage in eight days. The following is a list of her passengers:

Mrs. M. A. Lathais, Messrs. H. J. Bass, S. A. Chamberlain, J. G. Fairbanks, Jas. H. Shaw, Armand Peyeault, Leonard Robelot, Alfonse Robelot, Master F. P. Zacharie, Mr H. Wells, F. F. Clerie, Mrs. Elizabeth Davis.

We are indebted to Mr. S. A. Chamberlain, Harnden's Express Messenger, and to Capt. Marks, for the following information relative to the ravages of cholera on board the steamship Philadelphia. On the 20th ult., off Key West, the Wm. Penn spoke the pilot-boat Euphemia, who reported that the Philadelphia, from Aspinwall, bound to New Orleans, had put into Key West short of coal, and that the cholera was raging with fearful mortality among her passengers. Forty-eight had died in two days. The Philadelphia was lying near the Dry Rocks, ten miles from Key West, and was unable to obtain coal, as no one would go on board of her. Casks of water were taken to windward of her and allowed to float down to the ship. Most of the deaths occurred in a few hours after the first symptoms of the disease. The pilot-boat, which had been near her, reported that her decks were literally covered with the sick.

The steamship Isabel was at Key West, and a number of the Philadelphia's passengers attempted to get a passage to Havana, but the captain refused them, being fearful of carrying the disease into that city, and subjecting his vessel to a long quarantine.

The Philadelphia, we presume, sailed from Aspinwall for Havana, to make the connection at the latter place with the last steamer of the line, which sailed from this city for New York. She was probably ordered to quarantine and then left for Key West. She was daily expected here, and has been advertised to leave for Aspinwall on the 7th inst.

The Steamer G. W. Kendall.—Arrest of the Captain—Flight of the Mate.—The Louisville Journal of Monday, the 21st, says that the steamer G. W. Kendall arrived at Portland on the Saturday night previous, and was worked through the Canal on Sunday morning; but by some accident, the boat and one of the barges she had in tow, got on the rocks at the head of the Canal and remained there all day, with very little prospect of pulling them off. Some excitement in regard to the boat prevailed on shore, and it was rumored that five or six of the crew were confined in the hold, with the hatches fastened down. It appeared that the boat had been rather short handed, and had been 25 days out from New Orleans. A portion of the crew wanted to quit at Portland, but they were set upon, terribly beaten, dragged on board, and imprisoned in the hold. One of the crew, a Hermen, named Geo. Gardner, stated that he had been beaten and compelled to work at the fires all night, instead of the usual four hours. Three of the crew died during the trip and were buried below Memphis. The Captain was arrested, but the mate and his assistant made their escape. The Journal says there are other matters connected with the affair, which it will not now make public, as a legal investigation will be had. The Captain has the reputation of being a kind and humane man, and the Journal is of the opinion that he will be able to make a satisfactory explanation.

Louisiana Interior.

Another Tragedy.—The Alexandria Democrat states that Mr. Samuel Blenn and Moses Wiggins, citizens of Catahoula Parish, were killed near Trinity on the 21st ult., as they were proceeding to that place in a buggy. Thirteen shots were fired at them by men secreted in the high weeds. Glenn received three balls through the head, and fell out of the buggy dead. Wiggins received a shot which ranged along the breast, when he jumped out and attempted to make his escape by running, but he was pursued and killed. The Democrat says:

According to the account given, the correctness of which, in the main, there is no reason to doubt, an inquest was being held upon the dead bodies at Trinity on Monday, and great excitement prevailed.

This unfortunate and most aggravating loss of life is attributable to the Jones and Liddell hostility, a full account of which, in its inception and progress, we will give anon. Now that blood has been shed, we shall not be surprised to hear that numbers have fallen victims to a participation in this sanguinary quarrel. In a day or two we will have full particulars.

Cotton Worm.—The genuine cotton worm has made its appearence in great numbers on a plantation in East Feliciana.

The Corn Crop.—The Claiborne Advocate says the corn crop in that parish is suffering much for the want of rain.

Seventeen Year Locust.—As was predicted last year, the seventeen-year locusts have made their appearance in Connecticut. In 1818 and in 1835 their presence on a lot of land about fifty rods square, some three miles from the North Glastenbury Post-office, is chronicled. The woods on that spot are now alive, with their music.

Adjournment.—The National Agricultural Convention adjourned on the 25th ult., having adopted resolutions asking Congress to take steps towards aiding the Agricultural interest.

Exploring Expedition.—It is stated that the Government has determined to send out a party to make certain explorations in Africa. It is to be under the command of Lieut. Lynch, who gave us so interesting an account of his exploration of the Dead Sea.

A Youthful Impostor.—A girl thirteen years of age was recently arrested in Philadelphia while begging, with an infant in her arms. She had stolen the child from a family in which she was employed.

Disastrous Mortality.—Nine out of forty of the hands engaged at the lower tunnel of the Covington and Lexington (Ky.) Railroad, died of cholera on the 17th ult. There were also six deaths at the upper tunnel. The bands on the road have since been disbanded.

A Steady Customer.—A fellow named William Downs was released from the Baltimore Penitentiary on the 18th ult., to which establishment he has been sentenced seven different times, and in which he has spent nearly twenty-five out of the last twenty-nine years.

Friars of Lightning.—A violent thunder storm passed over the eastern part of Massachusetts, in the vicinity of Boston, on the 22d ult., and fourteen different buildings were struck by lightning. Several of them were consumed.

The Crops.—The Monroe (Ouachita) Register of the 22d ult., says: The cotton and corn in this Parish still continue to look well, but rain is very much needed, particularly in the table lands.

Sport.—The Monroe (Ouchita) Register says that fine sport in the way of fishing and hunting, is now to be had in that vicinity. The woods abound with deer and bear, and the river and bayous with the finest variety of fish.

Ice in Lake Superior.—A schooner returned to Sault Ste. Marie, on the 15th ult., from a cruise to the head of Lake Superior. She was unable to get within twenty miles of the mouth of St. Louis River, her destination, in consequence of ice. The ice appeared to extend along the whole western shore of the Lake, from fifteen to twenty miles in width, and very solid. No similar circumstance at this season is recollected by the oldest Indian in that country.

The Sioux Treaties.—The U. S. Senate has followed its action on the treaty with the upper band of Sioux by ratifying that entered into with the Med-ay-waksn-tonas and Way-pay Kootay bands for the acquisition of the lands now held by them in Iowa and Minnesota. The ratification of these treaties opens for settlement a vast region in the Northwest, and one which is regarded by competent judges as unsurpassed in the great desiderata of fertility and salubrity. It embraces large tracts of valuable timber, and an almost unlimited amount of water-power.

By the Atlantic.—England.—Advices received in London from Australia state that fresh discoveries of gold in that country are being made, and that consequently the supply of the precious metal is increasing. It is also said that large numbers of Californians and Chinese have arrived at Sydney, for the purpose of going to the mines. The overland mail has brought intelligence to London that Hariboldt had arrived at Hong Kong, in command of a Peruvian ship.

New Steamship Route.—The steamship Albatross, recently running between Philadelphia and Charleston, has been purchased by a company of Eastern gentlemen, who intend putting her on the route between New York and Quebec, touching at Pictou and Halifax, and connecting with the Canard steamers. A contract has been obtained, from the English Government for carrying the mails from Halifax to Quebec, at a compensation of $15,000 per annum.

Romantic.—An Irish girl named Sarah Garvin, eighteen years of age, was recently arrested in New York for being found in men's apparel, and was compelled to pass a night in a station-house. When brought before the Justice in the morning, she stated, that being friendless and without money, and having a strong desire to return to her native land, she had sold her scanty wardrobe and procured a sailor's dress, with a view of shipping on board of some vessel, and working her passage home. The keeper of the station-house, Mr. Edwards, having by enquiry ascertained that her story was true, kindly took upon himself the charge of procuring her apparel suited to her sex, and defraying her expenses to Ireland.

A Tob over Niagara Falls.—The Buffalo Commercial Advertiser says that a gentleman named Shaw, residing in the village of Niagara, recently tied the legs of a troublesome dog, owned by him, and threw him into the river above the falls. On the return of the gentleman to his house, about two hours afterwards, he was surprised to find his dog alive, although very much exhausted, awaiting his arrival. The animal had made the fearful journey in safety, and the ropes breaking had been enabled to return home.

A Board of Health has been organized in Cincinnati, and a health officer has been appointed, whose duty it will be to visit every boat arriving from below, and report her condition to the board; and if any said boats shall have passed the quarantine station without reporting to the physician in charge, he is directed to prosecute the owners or officers thereof in accordance with the requirements of an existing ordinance.

Novel Advertising.—During a recent hot day in New York, a hatter had men stationed at different points in Broadway, giving away palm-leaf fans, on both sides of which were posted the name of the hatter and the location of his store. It is stated that he distributed 20,000 fans in one day.

Home to Work.—The toundrymen of Louisville who struck for the ten hour system, have gone to work, a satisfactory arrangement having been made between them and their employers.

A Fine Bridge.—The railroad bridge over the Muskingum river, at Zanesville, Ohio, which is to be constructed of iron, is to be 538½ feet, in length, having four spans of 124½ feet each.

Gen. Changarnier.—The London Times is requested by Hon. Changarnier formally to contradict the statement that in 1848 he made a proposal to the Provisional Government to invade England.

When is it to be Finished.—The corner stone of a monument to Washington was laid in Philadelphia thirty years ago. The Sun thinks this solitary stone must be tired of waiting.

From Santa Fe.—A correspondent of the St. Louis Republican, writing from Independence on the 21st ult., furnishes some later items from Santa Fe, by the mail which had just arrived.

Gov. Calhoun and party were passed at Middle Cimarone Spring. The Governor was traveling slowly, in consequence of feeble health, and, at one time, had been compelled to halt.

After the departure of the Governor and Secretary, Col. Sumner removed his headquarters to Santa Fe, so that the civil government is now under the control of the military.

Two of the thieves who robbed the Commissary Department at Fort Union, had been captured by a party of soldiers, who followed them into the mountains. They were taken in irons to Santa Fe.

Philip Garcie, who killed a fellow prisoner to whom he was chained, was executed on the 29th of May. Garcie cut off his companion's leg before he was dead, and was in the act of making his escape when he was captured.

The mail from San Antonio reached Santa Fe on the 27th of May.

Messrs. Bent, Chouteau and a pleasure party of ladies and gentlemen were at Council Grove.

Lieut. Parke had died on the Plains of cholera.

Several tribes of Indians were encamped on the Arkansas, waiting the arrival of Major Fitzpatrick, to hold a "talk" with them.

Madame Goldschmidt.—A letter by the Niagara states that Madame Jenny Lind Goldschmidt arrived out in good health and spirits. She was waited on by numerous friends, who warmly welcomed her. The letter further states that she had already received several propositions to sing in opera or concerts, but had given no definite reply.

Another Death by Chloroform.—On the 20th ult. Mrs. Nathaniel Weed, the wife of a wealthy merchant in New York, died at Hartford, Connecticut, from the effects of chloroform. It was administered at her own request, preparatory to having a tooth extracted.

New College and Seminary.—The German Reformed Church of North Carolina has determined to establish a college and seminary at Newton in that State. A fund of $10,000 has been secured, and the citizens of the town have deeded ten acres of land.

Mobile and Ohio Railroad.—The Mobile papers publish an advertisement inviting contracts for the gradation, masonry and bridging of 179 miles more of the Mobile and Ohio Railroad—extending to the south line of Pontotoc county.

Reform.—The New York Tribune advocates the abolishment of all Presidential Conventions, proposing to submit the question directly to the preferences of the people.

La Grange, Georgia, June 15.

Messrs. G. & S.—The account of an old balance standing on your books against me is received.

Amount of the account	$12 00
Interest 24 years 5½ months, at 8 per cent	23 00
Discount on the enclosed note, at 1½ per cent	45
Amount enclosed	$35 50. $35 45

Wheat Crop of Alabama.—The Huntsville Advocate of the 16th inst. says: "The wheat crop has been harvested in the northern part of the State, and is an abundant one—larger than has been raised for years in this section."

The Pickensville Republican says the wheat crop in that vicinity is unusually large.

Sacrilegious.—Some thief or thieves the other day removed the corner stone of the new Episcopal Church, recently laid at Nashville, and stole the articles which had been there deposited, consisting of a bible, a prayer book, $130 in coins, and various other articles.

Curious.—The New York Tribune has been shown a portion of a maple tree 210 years old, (by the rings,) in the wood of which a large wolf trap is thoroughly imbedded, to the depth of five or six inches, having at least 100 years' growth over a part of it, while a part of it is entirely exposed. The tree was alive and standing, and the trap about twenty-five feet from the ground. There is no room for doubt that the wood has actually grown over and imbedded the trap, which evidently had a panther's foot in it when it was lodged there. The most remarkable feature of the business is the perfect preservation of the trap, which is but slightly oxidized. It was found by a timber-cutter in Woodhouse, Talbot District, Canada West.

Remedy for Cholera.—Sea captains who sail out of Liverpool now-a-days assert that they care no more for Asiatic cholera than for ordinary cholic or sickness of the stomach. They have a remedy which they pronounce infallible, and so accessible and simple as to relieve all apprehension of fatal results. We shall probably tell many of our readers nothing new when we state the prescription: Common salt, one table-spoonful; red pepper, one tea-spoonful, in a half-pint of hot water.

Death of an Author.—William M. Gould, author of "Zephyra from Italy and Sicily," a work just issued from the press of Appleton & Co., died on the 16th inst., in New York.

United States Steam Marine.—A report from Mr. Corwin, Secretary of the Treasury, shows that the steam tonnage of the United States is 416,220, or more than double that of Great Britain, employing as officers and crew 29,057 men. The report shows that, of the steamers of the interior, on the lakes and rivers, there were lost in the single year 1851, one hundred and eighteen steamers and six hundred and ninety-five lives! Of all the steamers in the United States, one-tenth part are annually destroyed by fatal accidents.

"One of those singular accidents, produced by a combination of circumstances, which probably never occurred before, and probably may never occur again, happened on the Portage Railroad, on Tuesday of last week. A man, whose name we could not learn, started on a truck from the foot of Plane No. 1, to go to Johnstown, followed closely by a section boat. He seated himself on a keg of powder, and let his truck run at a pretty good gait. A mile or two below the Plane, a wagon, loaded with wood, in hastening across the track, dropped a cord wood piece, which threw the truck off, and the man and powder on the track side—the powder keg bursting upon by the fall. The section boat passed over him, literally crushing him to death; at the same time, in striking, the truck by some means or other ignited the powder, and the man was completely blown up! When taken up, he was mangled, blackened, and his clothes were on fire, presenting one of the most horrid spectacles that over the eye of man gazed upon."

Honorable Testimonial.—The Collector of the port of New York has received from the State Department at Washington, the following articles presented by the British Government for distribution among the persons to whom they are awarded as testimonials of humane services rendered to British seamen in distress, viz: A box containing a gold medal and a sextant, bestowed upon Alexander Baxter, of the ship Cleone, of New York, for rescuing in December last, the master and crew of the British brig Elizabeth; and three gold medals, one to Capt. W. H. Howard, of the United States packet ship Daniel Webster, one to Captain Levi Marston, of the United States brig Harriet, and one to Capt. Browne, of the United States ship Star of the West, for saving, in November last, the passengers and crew of the British emigrant ship Unicorn.

Loss of Life in Prussia.—The districts of Mulhausen and Hellgenstaut, have been visited by a great calamity. The bursting of a water-spout caused such a sudden rise in the waters of the Unstrut and other streams, that not only is the whole harvest of the present year destroyed, but the fields are covered with stones and sands, to such an extent that it will be impossible to bring them into cultivation for years to come. In a quarter of an hour, the Unstrut rose eighteen feet above its usual level. The loss of life is not yet known; but it is feared it is considerable. In Dingelstet, eleven bodies have been found, and nineteen persons are missing. In the district of Mulhausen, about twenty persons are reported as having been drowned, and between twenty and thirty more are suspected to have shared the same fate. The roads are everywhere destroted; whole herds of cattle and sheep have been lost, and buildings have been so completely swept away, that scarcely a stone of them remains. The full extent of the loss of life and damage to property has not yet been ascertained.

The London Weekly Dispatch states that upwards of £30,000 ($149,340) were lost per week, for fifteen weeks, making no less than $2,242,500, by the recent strike of the English engineers.

Telegraphic Items.

Congressional Proceedings.

Washington, June 28.

In the House to-day, Mr. Pybin, of Alabama, on behalf of the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill granting lands for the use of the Charleston and Selma, and the Tennessee Railroads. The House then took up and passed the Senate bill relative to the awards under the treaty between the United States and Brazil, the bill being designed to settle the disputes growing out of the provisions of that treaty. The Pennsylvania contested election case was then taken up, and debated until adjournment, without result.

Respect for Mr. Clay.

The death of Mr. Clay causes the deepest sensation in all quarters, as reported by telegraph from different points. In New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and in this city, the flags on all the shipping and public offices have been placed at half-mast. Liverpool Markets.

Liverpool, June 10.

The week opened with a good demand in the Cotton market, but subsequently the inquiry fell off, and the market assumed a quiet appearance. The sales of the week embrace 51,000 bales, of which 7000 have been taken by exporters, and 10,000 for speculation. The advance reported per Niagara has been lost, and the official quotations now are: For Fair Orleans 5¼, Middling Orleans 5¼, Fair Uplands 5¼, and Middling Uplands 5¼d. ₱ lb. [The quotations by the Niagara were for Fair Orleans 5¾, Middling Orleans 5¼, Fair Uplands 5¾, and Middling Uplands 5¼d. ₱ lb. Eds.]

Flour has been in fair request at unchenged prices. The quotations are for Western Canal 29s., and for Ohio 29s. 6d. ₱ barrel.

Corn has further declined, and is now quoted at 29s. 6d. for Yellow, and 29s. ₱ quarter for White. Provisions have been in request, and with an advancing tendency. Beef has advanced, and is quoted at a range of 105@130s. Pork has also advanced, and the quotation is 85s. ₱ barrel.

Louisville, July 1.

Pittsburgh, July 1.

The river is still falling, and there are now only four feet ten inches water in the channel.

Great Fraud on Government.—Washington, June 28. Very extensive frauds on the U. S. Government, in the forging of land warrants, have been discovered in this city and the names of the guilty parties ascertained. A number of persons have been arrested here, among them Dawson and Horace Pike, land brokers, and Wm. Orlswold, a lawyer.

The frauds have been going on for several years. It is estimated that the Government has lost hundreds of thousands of dollars. One fraud alone covered eighteen thousand dollars.

Public Printing.—An effort will soon be made in Congress to take the public printing from the present contractors, and give it to the Union newspaper at the highest rates.

Bakat Fire.—Albany, June 28.—The Iron Works at Troy in this State, together with the buildings adjacent have been destroyed by fire. The loss is estimated at $150,000.

Foreign News by the Niagara.

We take from the Baltimore Sun, the following telegraphic summary of the news brought by steamer Niagara, which arrived at Halifax on the 23d ult:

ENGLAND.

Parliamentary proceedings were unimportant. On Wednesday much interruption was caused by the absurd conduct of Feargus O'Connor, who was committed to the custody of the sergeant-at-arms, and ordered to remain in confinement till the end of the session. He has since been pronounced insane, and will be sent to the lunatic asylum.

On Thursday petitions were presented from Jamaica and other West India islands, complaining of their distressed condition, which they attribute to the sugar act of 1846.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has announced that the extra grant of £200,000 for the expenses of the Kaffir war will not be needed.

The threat of the French Ministry of Police to expel all the correspondents of London papers from Paris, form the subject of the leading articles of the London press.

The English Ambassador had applied to the French Government on the subject of a line of steamers from Liverpool to Austria, to commence on the 1st of August.

WOOD THOUGHTS.... By Henry Spicer.

Dreaming in the Nassau forests
A voice crept by—
All that moved—the brown wood-lizards,
Gnats, and bats—and I—
All that spake, such sudden murmurs
As, from sylvan ground
Wake—and whisper—and then perish—
Utter thought, than sound—

Came a sense of soft inviting,
Such as lift the eyes
Of the world's forgotten children
In a glad surprise.
Listen—dwellers in dank hedges—
Listen—city's poor—
Listen—toil-soil, man mechanic—
Pauper—serf—and boor!

Weary-hatted—out at elbows—
All that cannot win
Access to a prince's pictures,
Here are mine. Come in.
Nature guards the portal—never Shut to fairy shoon—
Show your heart—'tis written, "Pencefal"—
Pass, where'er you choose.

Take the moss-throne she provides you—
Lift her lowest sceptre—
Softer than a queen's.
You, who lords have too much honored
With a saucy nod—
Stand—in His august creations—
Face to face with God.

Leaving then, take this memorial
Of one happy day—
He that rules from giant forest
Down to tiny May—
Breathes a welcome full as gracious,
Through these tongueless things,
To your homely, rude assemblage,
As to troops of kings;

Sees, perhaps, in those poor faces,
Bright with serious joy,
Something of man's first expression—
Love without alloy.
Something too of that high future
That still tow'rd us rolls—
Bringing woods whose trees are temples,
And whose flowers—white souls.

NAPOLEON BONAPARTE.

BY JOHN S. C. ABBOTT.

On the eastern frontiers of France there surge up, from luxuriant meadows and vine-clad fields and hill sides, the majestic ranges of the Alps, piercing the clouds and soaring with glittering pinnacles, into the region of perpetual ice and snow. Vast spurs of the mountain extend on each side, opening gloomy gorges and frightful defiles, through which foaming torrents rush impetuously, walled in by almost precipitous cliffs, whose summits, crowned with melancholy firs, are inaccessible to the foot of man. The principal pass over this enormous ridge was that of the great St. Bernard. The traveller, accompanied by a guide, and mounted on a mule, slowly and painfully ascended a steep and rugged path, now crossing a narrow bridge, spanning a fathomless abyss, again creeping along the edge of a precipice, where the eagle soared and screamed over the fir tops in the abyss below, and where a perpendicular wall rose to giddy heights in the clouds above. The path at times was so narrow, that it seemed that the mountain goat could with difficulty find a foothold for its slender hoof. A false steep, or a slip upon the icy rocks, would precipitate the traveler, a mangled corpse, a thousand feet upon the fragments of granite in the gulf beneath. As higher and higher he climbed these wild and rugged and cloud-enveloped paths, borne by the unerring instinct of the faithful mule, his steps were often arrested by the roar of the avalanche and he was appalled upon its resistless rush, as rocks, snow, trees, and earth, and ice, swept by upon with awful and resistless desolation, far down into the dimly discerned torrents which rushed beneath his feet. At God's bidding the avalanche fell. No precaution could save the traveler who was in his path. He was instantly borne to destruction, and buried where no voice but the archangel's trump could ever reach his ear. Terrific storms of wind and snow often swept through these bleak altitudes, blinding and smothering the traveler. Hundreds of bodies, like pillars of ice, embalmed in snow, are now sepulchered in those drifts, there to sleep till the fires of the last conflagration shall have consumed their winding sheet. Having toiled two days through such scenes of desolation and peril, the adventurous traveler stands upon the summit of the pass, eight thousand feet above the level of the sea, two thousand feet higher than the crest of Mount Washington, our own mountain monarch. This summit, over which the path winds, consists of a small level plain, surrounded by mountains of snow of still higher elevation.

The appointed hour at last arrived. On the 7th of May, 1800, Napoleon entered his carriage at the Tuileries, saying, "Good-by, my dear Josephine! I must go to Italy. I shall not forget you, and I will not be absent long." At a word, the whole majestic array was in motion, Like a meteor he swept over France. He arrived at the foot of the mountains. The troops and all the paraphernalia of war were on the spot at the designated hour. Napoleon immediately appointed a very careful inspection. Every foot soldier and every horseman passed before his scrutinizing eye. If a shoe was ragged, or a jacket torn, or a musket injured, the defect was immediately repaired. His glowing words inspired the troops with the ardor which was burning in his own bosom. The genius of the First Consul was infused into the mighty host. Each man exerted himself to the utmost. The eye of their chief was everywhere, and his cheering voice around the army to almost superhuman exertions. Two skillful engineers had been sent to explore the path, and to do what could be done in the removal of the obstructions. They returned with an appalling recital of the apparently insurmountable difficulties of the way. "Is it possible," inquired Napoleon "to cross the pass?" "Perhaps," was the hesitating reply, "it is within the limits of possibility." "Forward, then," was the energetic response. Each man was required to carry besides his arms, food for several days, and a large quantity of cartridges. As the dimensions of the precipitous path could only be trod in single file, the heavy wheels were taken from the carriages, and each slung upon a pole, was borne by two men. The task for the foot soldiers was far less than for the horsemen. The latter clambered upon foot, dragging their horses after them. The descent was very dangerous. The dragoon, in the steep and narrow path, was compelled to walk before his horse. At the least stumble he was exposed to being plunged headlong into the abyss yawning before him. In this way many horses and several riders perished. To support the heavy cannon and howitzers, pine logs were split in the centre, the parts hollowed out, and the guns sunk into the grooves. A long string of mules, in single file, were attached to the ponderous machines of war, to drag them up the slippery ascent. The mules soon began to fail, and then the men, with hearty good will, brought their own shoulders into the harness—a hundred men to a single gun. Napoleon offered the peasants two hundred dollars for the transportation of a twelve pounder over the pass. The love of gain was not strong enough to lure them to such tremendous exertions. But Napoleon's fascination over the hearts of his soldiers was a more powerful impulse. With shouts of encouragement they toiled at the cables, successive bands of a hundred men relieving each other every half hour. High on those craggy steeps gleaming through the mist, the glittering bands of armed men, like phantoms appeared. The eagle wheeled and screamed beneath their feet. The mountain goat, affrighted by the unwonted spectacle, bounded away and paused in bold relief upon the cliff to gaze upon the martial array which had so suddenly peopled the solitude.

When they approached any spot of any very especial difficulty, the trumpets sounded the charge, which re-echoed with sublime reverberations, from pinnacle to pinnacle of rock and ice. Animated by these bugle notes, the soldiers strained every nerve as if rushing upon the foe. Napoleon offered to these bands the same reward which he had promised to the peasants. But to a man, they refused the gold. They had imbibed the spirit of their chief, his enthusiasm, and his proud superiority to all mercenary motives. "We are not toiling for money," said they, "but for your approval and to share your glory."

[illegible] was the last man to cross the mountain. Seated upon a mule with a young peasant for his guide, slowly, and thoughtfully he [illegible] those silent solitudes. He was dressed in the gray great coat which he always wore. Art has pictured him as bounding up the cliff, proudly mounted on a prancing charger. Even the young peasant who acted as his guide was entirely unconscious of the distinguished rank of the plain traveler whose steps he was conducting. Much of the way Napoleon was silent, [illegible] And yet he found time [illegible]y. He drew from his young [illegible] the secrets of his heart. The young peasant was sincere and virtuous. He loved a fair maid among the mountains. She loved him. It was his heart's great desire to have her for his own. He was poor and had neither house or lands to support a family. Napoleon struggling with all his energies against combined England and Austria, and with all the cares of an army, on the march to meet one hundred and twenty thousand foes, crowding his mind, with pensive sympathy won the confidence of his companion, and elicited this artless recital of love and desire. As Napoleon dismissed his guide, with an ample reward, he drew from his pocket a pencil, and upon a loose piece of paper wrote a few lines, which he requested the young man to give, on his return, to the Administrator of the Army upon the other side. When the guide returned and presented the note, he found to his unbounded surprise and delight, that he had conducted Napoleon over the mountains, and that Napoleon had given him a field and a house. He was thus enabled to be married, and to realize all the dreams of his modest ambition. Generous impulses must have been instinctive in a heart, which, in an hour so fraught with mighty events, could turn from the toils of empire and of war, to find refreshment in sympathyzing with a peasant's love. This young man but recently died, having passed his quiet life in the enjoyment of the field and the cottage which had been given to him by the ruler of the world.

Napoleon ascended a mountain ridge, and upon its summit, quite exhausted with days and nights of sleeplessness and toil, laid himself down in the shadow of the rock, and fell asleep. The long line filed carefully and silently by, each soldier hushing his comrade, that the repose of their beloved chieftain might not be disturbed. It was an interesting spectacle, to witness the tender affection beaming from the countenances of these bronzed and war-worn veterans, as every foot trod softly, and each eye, in passing, was riveted upon the slender form and upon the pale and wasted cheek of the sleeping Napoleon.

The very day Napoleon left Paris, Desaix arrived in France from Egypt. Frank, sincere, upright and punctiliously honorable, he was one of the few whom Napoleon truly loved. Desaix regarded Napoleon as infinitely his superior, and looked up to him with a species of adoration; he loved him with a fervor of feeling which amounted almost to a passion. Napoleon, touched by the affection of a heart so noble, requited him with the most confiding friendship. Desaix, upon his arrival in Paris, found letters for him there from the First Consul. As he read the confidential lines, he was struck with the melancholy air with which they were pervaded, "Alas!" said he, "Napoleon has gained everything, and yet he is unhappy. I must hasten to meet him." Without delay he crossed the Alps, and arrived at the headquarters of Napoleon but a few days before the battle of Marengo. They passed the whole night together talking over the events of Egypt and the prospects of France. Napoleon felt greatly strengthened by the arrival of his noble friend, and immediately assigned to him the command of a division of the army. "Desaix," said he, "is my sheet anchor."

Napoleon was fully aware that a decisive battle would soon take place. Melas was rapidly from all parts, concentrating his army. The following laconic and characteristic order was issued by the First Consul to Lannes and Murat: "Gather your forces at the river Stradella. On the 8th or 9th at the latest, you will have on your hands fifteen or eighteen thousand Austrians. Meet them and cut them to pieces. It will be so many enemies less upon your hands on the day of the decisive battle we are to expect with the army of Melas." The prediction was true. An Austrian force advanced eighteen thousand strong. Lannes met them upon the field of Montabello. They were strongly posted, with batteries ranged upon the hill sides which swept the whole plain. It was of the utmost moment that this body should be prevented from combining with the other vast forces of the Austrians. Lannes had but eight thousand men. Could he sustain the unequal conflict for a few hours, Victor, who was some miles in the rear, could come up with a reserve of four thousand men. The French soldiers, fully conscious of the odds against which they were to contend, and of the carnage into the midst of which they were plunging, with shouts of enthusiasm, rushed upon their foes. Instantaneously a swarm of grape-shot from all the batteries, swept through his ranks. Said Lannes, "I could hear the bones crash in my division like glass in a hail storm!" For nine long hours, from eleven in the morning until eight at night, the horrid carnage continued. Again and again the mangled, bleeding, wasted columns were rallied to the charge.

At last, when three thousand Frenchmen were strewn dead upon the ground, the Austrians broke and fled, leaving also three thousand mutilated corpses and six thousand prisoners behind them. Napoleon, hastening to the aid of his lieutenant, arrived upon the field just in time to see the battle won. He rode up to Lannes. The intrepid soldier stood in the midst of mounds of the dead—his sword dripping with blood in his exhausted hand—his face blackened with powder and smoke—and his uniform soiled and tattered by the long and terrific strife. Napoleon silently, but proudly, smiled upon the heroic General, and forgot not his reward. From this battle Lannes received the title of Duke of Montebello, a title by which his family is distinguished to the present day.

This was the opening of the campaign. It inspired the French with enthusiasm; it nerved the Austrians to despair. Melas now determined to make a desperate effort to break through the toils. Napoleon, with intense solicitude, was watching every movement of his foe, knowing not upon what point the onset would fall. Before daybreak, on the morning of the 14th of June, Melas, having accumulated about forty thousand men, including seven thousand cavalry and two hundred pieces of cannon, made an impetuous assault upon the French, but twenty thousand in number, drawn up upon the plain of Marengo behind Desaix, with a reserve of six thousand men, was at such a distance—nearly thirty miles from Marengo—that he could not possibly be recalled before the close of the day. The danger was frightful that the French would be entirely cut to pieces before any succor could arrive. But the quick ear of Desaix caught the sound of the heavy cannonade, as it came booming over the plain like distant thunder. He sprung from his couch and listened. The heavy and uninterrupted roar proclaimed a pitched battle, and he was alarmed for his beloved chief. Immediately he roused his troops, and they started upon the rush to succor their comrades. Napoleon dispatched courier after courier to hurry the division along, while his troops stood firm through terrific hours, as their ranks were plowed by the murderous discharges of their foes. At last the destruction was too awful for mortal man to endure. Many divisions of the army broke and fled, crying, "All is lost! save himself who can!" A scene of frightful disorder ensued. The whole plain was covered with fugitives, swept like an inundation before the multitudinous Austrians. Napoleon still held a few squares together, who slowly and sullenly retreated, while two hundred pieces of artillery, closely pressing them, poured incessant death into their ranks. Every foot of ground was left encumbered with the dead. It was now three o'clock in the afternoon, and Melas, exhausted with toil and assured that he had gained a complete victory, left Gen. Zach to finish the work. He retired to his headquarters, and immediately dispatched couriers all over Europe to announce the great victory of Marengo. Said an Austrian veteran, who had before encountered Napoleon at Arcola and Rivoli, "Melas is too sanguine. Depend upon it, our day's work is not yet done. Napoleon will yet be upon us with his reserve."

Just then the anxious eye of the First Consul espied the solid columns of Desaix entering the plain. Desaix plunging his spurs into his horse, outstripped all the rest, and galloped into the presence of Napoleon. As he cast a glance over the wild confusion and devastation of the field, he exclaimed hurriedly, "I see that the battle is lost. I suppose I can do no more for you than to cover your retreat." "By no means," Napoleon replied, with apparently as much composure as if he had been sitting by his own fireside, "the battle, I trust, is gained. Charge with your column. The disordered troops will rally in your rear." Like a rock, Desaix, with his solid phalanx of ten thousand men, met the on rolling billow of Austrian victory. At the same time Napoleon dispatched an order to Kellerman, with his cavalry, to charge the triumphant column of the Austrians in flank. It was the work of a moment, and the whole aspect of the field was changed. Napoleon rode along the lines of those on the retreat, exclaiming, "My friends, we have retreated far enough. It is now our turn to advance. Recollect that I am in the habit of sleeping on the field of battle." The fugitives, reanimated by the arrival of the reserve, immediately rallied in their rear. The double charge in front and flank was instantly made. The Austrians were checked and staggered. A perfect tornado of bullets from Desaix's division swept their ranks. They poured an answering volley into the bosoms of the French. A bullet pierced the breast of Desaix, and he fell and almost instantly expired. His last words were, "Tell the First Consul that my only regret in dying is, to have perished before having done enough to live in the recollection of posterity." The soldiers, who devotedly loved him, saw his fall, and rushed more madly on to avenge his death. The swollen tide of uproar, confusion and dismay now turned, and rolled in surging billows in the opposite direction. Hardly one moment elapsed, before the Austrians, flushed with victory, were overwhelmed by defeat. In the midst of this terrific scene, an aid rode up to Napoleon and said, "Desaix is dead." But a moment before they were conversing side by side. Napoleon pressed his forehead convulsively with his hand, and exclaimed mournfully, "Why is it not permitted me to weep! Victory at such a price is dear."

If war has its chivalry and its pageantry, it has also revolting hideousness and demoniac woe. The young, the noble, the sanguine were writhing there in agony. Bullets respect not beauty. They tear out the eye, and shatter the jaw, and rend the cheek, and transform the human face divine into an aspect upon which one cannot but gaze with horror. From the field of Marengo many a young man returned to his home so mutilated as no longer to be recognized by friends, and passed a weary life in repulsive deformity. Mercy abandons the field of battle. The frantic war-horse with iron hoof tramples upon the mangled face, the throbbing and inflamed wounds, the splintered bones, and heeds not the shriek of torture. Crushed into the bloody mire by the ponderous wheels of heavy artillery, the victim of barbaric war thinks of mother, and father, and sister, and home, and shrieks and moans, and dies; his body is stripped by the vagabonds who follow the camp; his naked, mangled corpse is covered by a few shovels' full of earth, and left for food for vultures and for dogs, and he is forgotten for ever—and it is called glory! He who loves war for its excitements, and its pageantry, and its fancied glory, is the most eminent of all the dupes of folly and sin. He who loathes war, with an inexpressible loathing, who will do everything in his power to avert the dire and horrible calamity, but who will, nevertheless, in the last extremity, with a determined spirit, encounter all its perils, from love of country and of home, who is willing to sacrifice himself and all that is dear to him in life, to promote the well-being of his fellow-man, will ever receive the homage of the world, and who also fully believe that he will receive the approval of God. Washington abhorred war in all its forms, yet he braved all its perils.

Later from Texas.

Arrival Tuesday of the steamship Louisiana, Capt. Lawless, we have received Galveston papers to the 24th, and our exchanges from the interior.

Passengers Arrived.—The Russian brig St. Peters, from Bremen, arrived at Galveston on the 23d, with one hundred immigrants. Most of them left the next day for Houston. The Hamburg bark Miles arrived on the 21st with sixty-six passengers for Galveston, and thirty-seven for Indianola.

Military Depot.—The Galveston Journal says: "We have learned from several sources, and now find the information confirmed by the Nueces Valley, that Corpus Christi has been selected by the Government for the military depot of all the country west of the San Antonio river. This will undoubtedly tend greatly to the advantage of that beautiful place, and make it still more desirable as a place of residence or of business."

Cholera.—It is said that the cholera is prevailing to a considerable extent at Indianola. It is, however, principally confined to unacclimated Germans, of whom there is a large number in the place. We understand that Lavaca, Victoria and other towns are generally healthy.

A letter dated Wharton, June 10, says: "The cholera has broke out a mile and a half from Wharton, on Colonel Boalton's plantation. Five grown negroes have died—two of whom in three hours from the time they were taken. Eight new cases reported this morning on the same place."

Two children of Capt. W. Ward died of cholera, at Pelasclous, on Matagorda Bay, a few days since.

Outrages.—At Galveston on the evening of Saturday, the 19th inst., a party of drunken sailors assaulted the family of a German emigrant, and for attempting to defend them, he was so badly beaten with a billet of wood that he died the following Monday in the Hospital. The perpetrators of the outrage were arrested.

Da. Naphegyi.—The Colorado Reveille is exceedingly bitter in its remarks in reference to this enterprising individual, to whom it accords the alias of Sounenberg, the Jew peddler. The worthy Doctor it appears got into the Reveille about $60, which he found it convenient to forget when he eloped. The Reveille says he is one of the most consummate scoundrels that ever imposed on a community, and it trusts that the press will pass him round for the benefit of the public at large.

Sentenced.—Thomas Downey, convicted at San Antonio of rape, has been sent to the Penitentiary for 21 years.

Steamers and Rivers.—The Galveston News of the 22d says: We learn that the Jack Hays is lying at Green's Bluff, three miles above Liberty, on her way up the river, and can get neither up or down.

The Trinity river is reported to be dead low.

The Crops.—Highly favorable accounts of the crops in all parts of the State, continue to come in. There will be more corn than has ever before been raised in a season, and it is estimated that the price will not be more than twenty-five cents per bushel.

Jail to Let.—On the 19th inst. the jail at San Antonio was vacant.

Agricultural Society.—The citizens of Kaufman county met on the 29th of May for the purpose of forming an Agricultural Society.

The Pecan Crop.—This crop is said to be very abundant this season. The Victoria Advocate says that from the Guadaloupe valley there will probably be many thousand bushels shipped. It is noticed that the pecan trees do not yield abundantly oftener than once in four years. The last large crop was in 1848.

Light-house.—The materials for the new light-house at Matagorda Pass have arrived at that Point. The building is to be of cast iron, resting on a foundation of brick and granite forty feet square. The light—a revolving one—will be at an elevation of about seventy-five feet, and will be visible at a distance of eighteen miles.

Fell Overboard.—On the last trip of the Mexico from Indianola to Galveston, a little girl, about seven years of age, only child of Daniel DuFree, of Mississippi, fell overboard and was drowned.

Murders.—The Leon Pioneer gives an account of two murders recently committed in that section. A man named Cook, and another named Harrison, both residing in Navarro county, were paying their addresses to the same young lady, and being unable to settle the matter amicably, made an appeal to shot guns, which resulted in the instant death of Harrison. Cook was still at large.

On the 1st inst. a man named Bernier killed another named Day, near Springfield, in Limestone county. The cause was a dispute about their labor. Much excitement was created in Springfield, and it was thought an appeal for justice would be made to Judge Lynch.

Fresh Water.—A water tank is about being completed within half a mile of Indianola, by which that place will be supplied with good water.

Louisiana Interior.

The Weather and the Crops.—The Caddo Gazette of the 19th inst. says: The weather for the last few days has been excessively hot and oppressive—so much so that we fear the crops of our upland planters will suffer from drouth.

The sugar, corn and cotton crops on the Mississippi and Red rivers were never in a more flourishing condition than at this time. We observed that some few planters had permitted the grass to get the upper hand of them, but as a general thing the crops have been carefully attended, and they will repay the laborers for the culture they have received.

The Baton Rouge Gazette of the 26th says: For the past week the weather has been very warm and dry—we need rain very much, both for comfort and the good of the crops. The mercury in the thermometer had stood at 90 in the shade for some days previous to the above mentioned date.

Red River.—At Shreveport, on the 19th inst., the river was falling rapidly, but there was yet sufficient water for the largest class of boats.

Kossuth's Card—Good News for Certain Hotel Keepers.

Kossuth has published the following card, which will be exceedingly agreeable to the proprietors of the Burnet House, Cincinnati, as the economical Council of that city, after inviting the Magyar to visit them, refused to pay his bill at the hotel:

"At the approach of my departure, I request all those who might perhaps have whatever claims to settle with me, to apply in the course of this week to Mr. Paul Hajnik, No. 42 East Sixteenth street. At the same time, I request all those to whom perhaps any thing may have been intrusted, concerning myself or my country, to direct to the same gentleman.

Large Plates of Glass.—The large glass now so common in the show windows of stores constitute one of the most costly as well as beautiful of ornaments. These immense panes are made in France, and the process of their manufacture is thus described by the New York Mirror:

The large plates are cast. They come from the mould rough, and they must be polished. What a work! It seems an impossible one. But no—fasten down the plate upon a firm table, and go to work just as the marble men do with their slabs; draw the heavy polisher backward and forward hour after hour, with inexhaustible patience, and the sharp friction after a while prevails. As the work advances, finer and finer polishing powders are used, until at length you find the workmen engaged with soft rolls of cotton fabric, wet with some nice polished mixture which gives the highest perfection of surface.

It is not strange that these plates should cost something. Perhaps few are aware how fast the price rises with increase of size. Those large plates which are occasionally seen in shop windows, as in Stewart's great marble store, are thought a little noticeable indeed, but how few know what one of them costs. We do not know how much Mr. Stewart paid for his, but we know that such plates range at frightful prices—three, four and five hundred dollars! We think that one importer in this city has plates for sale which are as high as eight hundred dollars!

Now these are great prices for a single pane of glass. The glass is thick. Indeed, but after all, it is fragile. What a chance for damage on a large scale! How much mischief a careless boy may do in a moment. We saw a costly pane yesterday which had been cracked by the warping of the window frame.

Mirrors have attained a monstrous size. Ten feet is now no extra length; twelve is often attained. When the plates reach these great lengths, a little increase in width adds astonishingly to the price. A large mirror is so beautiful a thing, that we can hardly have the heart to reproach a man for buying it, who has the means. It is durable, and always useful. It fulfils that oft-quoted desire of Burns—"to see ourself as others see."

The Last of the Jacobites.—Janet Munro, or M'Kenzie, departed this life at Ainess, in Rossshire, on the 16th April. Janet, at the period of her decease, was the oldest woman in Scotland. It not in Great Britain, for she was at least 110 years of age, nod there is reason to believe that she was even more. She had a child's recollection of the great national event of the battle of Culloden, and from many of her nearest relations, the Monroes and M'Kenzies, having been "out" in that romantic and daring enterprise, she could detail a whole catalogue of curious incidents connected with these eventful times, which, from her retired mode of life and comparatively remote residence, never found their way into print. In Janet Munro there has passed away the last inhabitant of Scotland who was alive when Charles Edward held state in Holyrood, or skulked as a hunted deer amongst the Western Isles. She was a staunch Jacobite till her dying day, and was, we have no doubt, the last individual in the British dominions who conscientiously believed that her Majesty held the crown by an unlawful tenure. It is strange to think of what has passed during the five score years and ten which have elapsed since this venerable crone was christened. She was in the prime of life when the United States of America were English colonies; she was become elderly before Napoleon gained his first battle, and she had lapsed into old age before steamers or locomotives on railways were heard of. Janet belonged to the respectable class of small farmers; she was a woman of unblemished character, and was a widow for the period of 43 years. She retained till her last moments the exercise of her mental faculties, and previous to her last illness could read the smallest print with the naked eye. [Glasgow Herald.

From Buenos Ayres.—The Boston Advertiser has received a copy of the Buenos Ayres Herald of April 13. It is the second number of a semi-monthly journal, published in English, and devoted to "Temperance, Morality and General Intelligence." Although not of so late a date as our latest advices from that place, it contains some items of intelligence which had not before reached us. It contains a list of the Representatives of the Province—seventy in number—who were chosen on the preceding Sunday. The election is spoken of as the exercise of a privilege which but a small minority of the citizens ever before enjoyed. There were two tickets, one on white paper, considered semi-official, and the other on yellow, called the people's ticket. The latter succeeded, containing, however, ten of the candidates of the other. The candidates on both tickets, among whom were a Bishop and two Colonels, each received upwards of 7,300 votes,—these on the people's ticket only 3,809 to 3,962. Complaint is made, that in some of the parishes there was an interference of the military, but that this was in opposition to the policy of the Liberator, and from the disaffection it excited, it produced a contrary effect from what was intended.

On the 12th Gen. Urquiza was sworn into office under the appointment which he had received, as before announced, from the joint act of the Governors of Buenos Ayres, Entre Rios and Corientes, and of the Plenipotentiary of Santa Fe, as Director of the foreign affairs of the Argentine Republic until the assembling of the National Congress. He had appointed Dr. Luis J. de la Pena to be Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Safety Ships.—A correspondent of the Scientific American makes the following suggestion: "Safety ships have been constructed in England divided into water tight compartments. A variety of other plans have been suggested at different times, some of which are very good. Would it not be sufficient to place under the decks and between the beams, tubes or compartments of India rubber or gutta percha, connected with numerous pumps on deck, which might be inflated at a moment of danger so as to support the ship with ease? These tubes or compartments can be made to lie close against the ceilings, and kept there by pieces of wood, pressed by a spring, which would give by pressure from within. The whole contrivance is simple, in no way inconvenient, might be ornamental, and of but little expense. How much more consoling to run to the pumps to inflate these tubes (one half of which ought to be made sufficient to support the whole vessel) than to set to work in anxiety and doubt, amounting to despair to keep the water out of a leaking sinking ship.

*Rare Honesty.—General Magnan, Commander-in-Chief of Paris, has published the following general order, dated the 12th: "On Sunday, the 9th instant, a soldier of the 1st infantry regiment, in crossing the Place de la Concorde, picked up four bank notes which a gentleman let fall, ran after the owner with them, and gave them to him. Not only would he not accept any recompense, but he obstinately refused to tell his name, saying that he did not wish to be known. The General-in-Chief has nothing to add to the recital of this action, in which probity and disinterestedness are allied to the rarest delicacy and modesty. He employs an order, as the only means at his disposal, of causing to reach the soldier the testimony of his liveliest satisfaction, for conduct which honors the whole army in the person of one of its children."

Presence of Mind.—The herdsman of a farm in North Uist had occasion one day, lately, to send his daughter for the cattle under his charge. There were about eighty of them, and among them two bulls, one of which was occasionally in the habit of assaulting people. On the day in question, the damsel unwarily approached the bull too closely, when he immediately gave chase. On a level field, without dykes, hogs, or any other place of refuge to resort to, what would the reader have done—for, to run home, a distance of three quarters of a mile, was out of the question. The girl with great presence of mind, ran over to the other bull, a good natured animal, and much stronger than her assailant. Standing close by his side, and kindly tapping him on the back, she drove him towards her father's house, followed by her enraged enemy, who kept roaring and fuming all the way, but when he came too close, her protector turned round and kept her assailant at bay. In this manner the fugitive arrived safely at home. [Inverness (Scotland) Courier.

An Honest Lawyer.—A very old member of a Tennessee paper contains a quaint advertisement, signed "William Tatham," in which we find (among many more) the following rules of practice:

"I will turn a deaf ear to no man because his purse is empty." Good, but rather impracticable. "I will advise no man beyond my comprehension of his cause." Excellent and favorable to brevity of advice. "I will bring none into law who my conscience tells me should keep out of it." Unexceptionable. "I will advise the turbulent with candor, and if they will go to law against my advice they must pardon me for volunteering against them." Fair and open, certainly. "Serves right. I will never acknowledge the omnipotence of the Legislature, or consider their acts to be law beyond the spirit of the constitution." Capital! Mr. Tatham was doubtless a bold fellow, of rare honesty for a lawyer, who, if he kept his own rules, was a peace-maker, and a most useful citizen; a man greatly beloved by the poor, admired by the good, respected by all, and—died insolvent. The New York Art Union.—A new basis for the Art Union is proposed in case the decision of the court against its legality should be sustained. It is proposed to strike out from the constitution of the association all that conflicts with the law of the State, to abolish the distribution by lot, and to retain the fund with such increase as may be added by new subscribers, and to devote it to the encouragement of art by the purchase of pictures, to be the property of the individual shareholders whenever their stock in the concern, with the accumulated interest, shall reach the value of a picture.

A Delegate from the Sandwich Islands.—While the Secretaries to the Committee of Reception of the Whig National Convention were engaged in recording the names of delegates, they were somewhat startled by the appearance of a stout gentleman about forty-five years of age, with an open countenance, from which beamed as much benevolence as ever did from that of the immortal Mr. Pickwick, who calmly approached, and leaning over the railing, requested to have his name registered as a delegate from the Sandwich Islands. When informed that these Islands did not yet belong to the United States, he manifested considerable surprise and stoutly denied the fact. Finding all expostulation useless, he withdrew, apparently in great astonishment that a subject of King Kamehameha could not be admitted into an American Convention.

Commerce of the La Plata.—The merchants of Philadelphia have addressed a memorial to the Secretary of State on the subject of the commerce of the Rio de la Plata. They set forth that the French and English Governments are endeavoring to secure to themselves commercial advantages arising from the recent political changes in the countries bordering upon the La Plata and its tributaries. The memorialists, without undertaking to direct the nature of the agency to be employed, earnestly advise that it may be concurrent with an exploration as far as practicable, of the navigable tributaries of the La Plata, for the purpose of acquiring further information as to the commercial products of their shores and the physical wants of their consumption.

The name "Artesian" applied to bored wells is derived from the province of Artois, in France, where, it is said, they were first excavated.

A street peddler in Cincinnati sold a lady a nice silk dress which he had stolen a few hours before at her husband's store. The merchant valued it at $35, and the lady purchased it for $14.

Mr. Duncomb, in behalf of the corporation of Trinity Church, N. Y., on Tuesday, the 15th instant, laid one thousand dollars on the plate at the offertory for the poor.

A Cincinnati paper describes a race which recently took place in that city, between two hearses both containing corpses. The drivers whipped, shouted and swore, and half a dozen times narrowly escaped upsetting.

The locomotive Sandusky on the Mad River and Lake Erie Railroad, came into Cleveland (Ohio) on the 11th instant, with sixty-two heavily loaded four wheeled cars. The precise weight of the train we did not learn, but it must have been enormous.

A remarkable phenomenon took place at Cairo, Egypt, on the 1st ult., a regular contest between the Khamasin, or wind of the desert, and the north wind. The latter was at length the victor, after a hurricane of unheard-of violence. Trees were torn up by the roots, and the magnificent gardens of Choubra, and others in the environs of the city, were seriously injured. Never in the memory of man was thunder heard or hail seen at this season in Egypt. The hurricane was succeeded by a heavy rain, which lasted all the night of the 1st, and on the following day the Khamasin was more suffocating than ever.

In Madame De Stael's Considerations of the French Revolution, she relates that the eldest Napoleon, when First Consul, turned abruptly to Hindy in the circle, saying: "Madame, I do not like women to talk politics." "You are right, citizen Consul," was the retort; "but in a country where women's heads are taken off, it is natural for them to ask why."

The State of Maine takes precedence of every other State in the Union with regard to the number of vessels built, and the amount of tonnage owned, according to a statement in a late Treasury report. The total number of vessels built in that State, for the year ending the 30th of June last, was 234, the amount of tonnage 77,393. The State of New York the next in rank, numbered 220 vessels and 76,805 tons.

It is stated that the largest church on this continent is the French Cathedral of Notre Dame, in Montreal, Canada. It will comfortably seat ten thousand persons, and on the occasion of any great religious ceremony will hold fifteen thousand. It has been completed within the last few years. The bell, lately hung in one of the towers of this cathedral, is also the largest bell upon the continent of America; and, with some few exceptions, such as the great bell at Moscow, and the Great Tom at Lincoln, England, is the largest bell now hanging in the world.

God is Light.

Eternal Light! Eternal Light!
How pure the soul must be,
When placed within thy searching sight,
It shrinks not, but with calm delight,
Can live and look on Thee!

The spirits that surround thy throne
May bear the burning bliss;
But that is surely theirs alone,
For they have never, never known,
A fallen world like this!

O! how shall I whose native sphere
Is dark, whose mind is dim,
Before the ineffable appear,
And on my naked spirit bear,
That uncreated beam!

There is a way for man to rise,
To that sublime abode;
An offering and a sacrifice,
A Holy Spirit's energies,
An advocate with God.

These—these prepare us for the sight
Of Majesty above;
The sons of ignorance and night,
Can stand in the "Eternal Light,"
Thro' the "Eternal Love!"

The Disciple—Useful in Sickness.

Some of those situations in life which appear, at first sight, least favorable to extensive usefulness, may be so improved by a holy disciple as to become a fountain of many streams. In the memoir of James B. Taylor, there is frequent mention made of a Miss W——. The name of that lady was Pamela Wigton. While spending the winter of 1839 in the city of New York, the Rev. Mr. Janes (now Bishop Janes) invited the writer of this sketch to take an appointment to preach every third Thursday night, in a private house, in conjunction with himself and Dr. Bangs. The invitation was accepted. I found the place in the third story of a house in a small house is a small street in the lower end of the city. A long, dark, narrow passage, where two persons could scarcely walk abreast, led to a winding flight of stairs. At the head of this I found a room of moderate dimensions, very plainly, but very comfortably, and even neatly furnished. Propped with cushions in a rocking-chair, sat a lady of about fifty-five years of age, very interesting in her whole appearance, but very emaciated, and almost unable to assist herself in any respect. The oftener I visited her, the more and more lovely did she appear. For more than twenty years, I think she told me, she had been confined to her room, and a large portion of the time to her bed. Once she had been able to be carried carefully to a steamboat, and to go a short distance up the Hudson river. She suffered frequent and acute, and sometimes protracted pain. I have sat for hours at her feet, listening to her conversation, which was rich in memorials of many prominent persons and events, but still richer in a varied and profound Christian experience. Sometimes, for whole minutes, paroxysms of pain would seize her, and I could tell when they were coming by the increasing pressure of her hand; and then she would be silent for a short time, and the twitching of her features betrayed the agony which the firm and devoted expression of her eye showed she was endeavoring to endure in the strength which God supplies. Then her hand would relax, and her features fall into their usual play, and, with an ejaculation of thanksgiving, a tear or two, expressed by pain, standing in her mild eyes, while mine were moist with sympathy, she would ask to be reminded of the subject of our conversation, and resume her remarks with a cheerfulness which I could scarcely comprehend. Every attention, no matter how small, she would receive with, if nothing more, an appreciating look, which made it a pleasure to smooth her pillow, or adjust her cushion, or hold a cup of water to her lips. So beautiful was grace in her, that it soon became a delight to be in her presence. Many a time have I walked whole blocks in a dark and rainy night, and often when in pain myself, to be soothed and strengthened by an example which preached endurance with a wonderful power, and a voice made musical by love. Though dim of vision, she seemed instinctively to know the state of my feelings from the tones of my voice; and when, sick and jaded, I came to her from some public service, or from my desk, she would part my hair with her trembling hands, and kiss my forehead with a motherly affection that made me feel like a child, and then talk to me of Christian heroism, and of the noble souls who have toiled in pain for the fadeless crown, till I felt the spirit of a man revived in me. No one knows how many an hour I have spent in that obscure place, nor the blessed influence which that holy invalid exerted over my youthful ministry.

It was a preaching place, as I have said. Those who have heard Bishop Janes often, know the peculiar character of his preaching; how full it is of Christ and of Christian consolation. Perhaps some of the very finest of those thoughts and expressions which have won the almost loving attention of the thousands who have waited in crowds upon his ministry, were uttered in that little room, to half a dozen persons, Methodists, Baptists, and Presbyterians: for all classes and all denominations, who knew Miss Wigton, delighted in visiting her. By much the best sermon I ever heard delivered, was preached at Miss W.'s, from 1 Peter ii, 7,—"To you, therefore, which believe, he is precious." The light that played on the invalid's face, was a beautiful and forceful commentary upon the text, and a striking corroboration of the sermon. In the long period of her illness, she had enjoyed the services of many of the Lord's servants, and her recollection of their discourses and conversations furnished her with abundant materials for the entertainment and edification of her visitors.

Who would not say, at first sight, that her scope and verge of labor and usefulness was very limited? She was sick, weak, in pain, confined to her room, subsisting upon the benefactions of others; withal, she had no superior intellectual gifts, and had had very little advantage of education. And yet, her influence was felt in the far west of America, and in Europe. By the assistance of her friends, she maintained a correspondence with Christians at great distances, who had been profited by her example and conversation. I acted as her amanuensis in writing to a clergyman in the West who had entered the ministry as a man would enter upon the practice of the law. After a few years of almost utter hopelessness, he became acquainted with Miss W. She soon found that he "had not the root of the matter in him," that he was destitute of a proper knowledge of the plan of salvation, and had no interest in the atonement. She commenced to make his deficiencies manifest to himself. He became convinced that he was a sinner. His agony for some time was very great; but with a holy wisdom she led the stricken sinner to the lamb of God, and there at her feet he was converted, and returned to his people a new man in Christ Jesus, ready to do a great work. When John Summerfield commenced his ministry in America, he received much spiritual nursing from this mother in Israel. She loved him dearly. It was delightful to hear her talk of that young disciple. When James Brainard Taylor first went to New York, as a subordinate clerk, I think, in some establishment, he was very thoughtless and wayward. His brother took him to see Miss W. She became interested in him at once, and succeeded in winning him to her. There was nothing querulous, peevish, disagreeable, or repulsive in Miss W. The young could love her. She soon gained a mastery over the mind of young Taylor. By degrees, she interested him in religious subjects, and then in the subject of his personal salvation, until "the day dawned and the shadows fled away," and he was a free man in Christ Jesus. The Lord led him to the work of the ministry, and during his preparatory studies, he was instrumental in turning many from darkness to light. The Lord took him from the evil to come, but not before he had opened springs which shall flow down through the history of the church. The letters which he wrote to Miss W., she preserved as a sacred memorial of his excellence and holiness. Some of them appear in his memoirs, and I have had the pleasure of having for a short time in my possession the little green bag in which they were so carefully deposited.

She has followed Taylor to the rest of the saints. Her sufferings have ended, and the purified gold has gone up to adorn the temple on high; but with what warmth does the memory of her virtues lie on the hearts of many who have enjoyed her society on earth. What an example of endurance, in these latter times! No mission to China, or to the islands of the sea, could be sublimer than here. She was a living witness to the triumphs of faith over poverty, suffering, and confinement. She was poor, but made many rich; she was unknown, and yet well known; she had nothing, and yet possessed all things; she was dying, yet behold she lived. How many young ladies in our church would look upon the imprisonment for twenty years in a chamber of sickness as being a prolonged death! O! ye daughters of Ease, learn to look upon your lives in the blaze of fortune and fashion as despicable, when compared with hers. Ye that are sick and poor, and wish to do something for your Lord, "learn" not only "how sublime," but how Christian and how useful "a thing it is to suffer and be strong." A holy life—that is usefulness. Holiness of heart, in His members, is the lever with which His people must lift the world to lay it at the feet of Christ. If all the young were like Taylor, and all the aged and suffering like his Miss W., how lovely would Christianity become in the eyes of the world, and how powerfully would sinners be attracted to the Cross. I have written this sketch in the hope that the example to which it points may not be lost upon young women who by-and-by may be afflicted and in old age. There is no power in earth or hell to stay the irresistible influence of any human being whose soul is sanctified by the Spirit, and whose life is devoted to the work of Christ. [What Now? by Deems.

Preparation for Death.

When you lie down at night, compose your spirits as if you were not to awake till the heavens be no more. And when you awake in the morning, consider that new day as your last, and live accordingly. Surely that night cometh of which you will never see the morning, or that morning of which you will never see the night, but which of your mornings or nights will be such you know not. Let the mantle of worldly enjoyment hang loose about you, that it may be easily dropped when death comes to carry you into another world. When the corn is forsaking the ground, it is ready for the sickle: when the fruit is ripe, it falls off the tree easily. So when a Christian's heart is truly weaned from the world, he is prepared for death, and it will be the more easy for him. A heart disengaged from the world is a heavenly one, and then we are ready for heaven, when our heart is there before us. [Burton.

ABOUT TO MOVE.—A Christian does not turn his back upon the fine things of this world because he has no natural capacity to enjoy them, no taste for them; but because the Holy Spirit has shown him greater and better things. If he wants flowers that will never fade, he wants something that a man can take with him to another world. He is like a man who has had notice to quit his house, and having secured a new one he is no more anxious to repair, much less embellish and beautify the old one, as his thoughts are upon the removal. If you hear him converse, it is upon the house to which he is going. Thither he sends his goods, and thus he declares plainly what he is seeking.

The Succession of Christ's Ministry.

DEAR BRO. MCTYEIRE: I noticed in one of your previous numbers an allusion to a new paper about to commence at Vicksburg, in Miss., and from which you made a few extracts. Since reading that article, several copies of this paper, called the Church Herald, have fallen under my observation.

I judge the main object of this paper is to prove that the Protestant Episcopal Church is the only true church, by virtue of an unbroken hereditary succession from the Apostles. They place the proof of their claim to be considered as the true church upon the precise ground that there has been no break in the ordination since ordination began by imposition of Apostolic hands; that the Apostles ordained one set of bishops, these bishops ordained another set of bishops, and so on down, in unbroken order of successions, to the present bishops of the Episcopal Church. Their claim to be the true church, is in virtue of the unbroken chain of canonical ordination; that they would not be the true church without this unbroken chain; that if any person wished to know which was the true church, he would have to inquire solely into this isolated and independent question; that in order to find out the true church of Christ, it is not necessary to see whether the directions of Christ are obeyed, whether the members and the ministry have the proofs of Christianity in renovated natures and the fruits of the spirit, but only to learn from secular authority whether the chain of regular ordination has been observed or not—whether it be unbroken or not. They are ready to admit that Christ has no true church upon earth if this chain has been broken; that if this chain be indeed broken, the entire Christian system has failed and has now no existence in the world. They are ready to admit that though we may have the word of God, and though there may be disciples of Jesus Christ, yet there never could have been a church of God upon earth unless this regular order in the ordination of bishops had been preserved.

Now, it strikes me, that if this be so, we are beyond all kind of doubt more dependent upon the testimony of uninspired men in order to ascertain where the church of Christ may be found, or what amounts to the same thing, where Christ's true disciples may be found, or who are his true disciples, than upon the words of inspired wisdom itself. But this is not all. These doctors, in order to be consistent, will have to affirm that, no matter what may be the directions of inspired wisdom with reference to the question of who are the church of Christ, we are to disregard it and entirely to discredit it unless we are able to trace, by satisfactory testimony, its claim, or the claims of its officers, to the Apostles by an unbroken hereditary chain of regular and canonical ordination from the hands of the Apostles.

Does not the proof of the existence or non existence of the Church of Christ hang upon a narrow thread?

> "The spider's most attenuated thread
> Is cord, in cable to that tender tie."

Unless some credible person had told me so, I should not have thought it possible that any rational mind could believe that the proof of the question as to Christ's true church or disciples depended upon such a strange, obscure, difficult, delusive species of testimony.

But the object of this letter is not to discuss this question, but merely to direct your attention to a few prominent considerations.

There is nothing more distasteful to the natural heart of man than the doctrine of spiritual regeneration, the doctrine of the new birth. The natural heart longs to substitute some other kind of religion for the religion of the new spiritual birth. Here is the source of the heresy of the Apostolic succession. If you make a certain human organization the true church, having Apostolic unction and sanctity, why those persons who enter into the church are Christians by complying with certain forms, and they get thus rid of the doctrine of the new birth. The new birth takes place, then, when the party joins the true church and receives true introduction, by Apostolic successors of the Apostles, into Christ's body or church. Such a doctrine almost puralyzes my inmost nature.

These Apostolic succession doctors are, undoubtedly, honest in their views. They, doubtless, believe that they are preaching "Christ and him crucified," when they preach the "unbroken line." I have no unkind thought toward them. It is with the doctrine that I have to do.

In one of the last issues of the Church Herald, of date June 18th, we find at the close of an article upon Judas Iscariot the following singular theology: "That bad men are to be found in the ministry of Christ's church at the present day we may well expect, when we find one of the very first preachers of the word a devil." No where in the Scripture do we see it hinted that his ministrations were the less valid, his preaching the less successful, his authority the less ample, because he was the wretched and guilt-stained man we find him to have been. God's word preached by unworthy men, public prayers by them, and his sacraments administered by them; may be as efficacious for good as the like services of those who are Apostles in heart as well as in name."

After having overcome your—shall I say, horror?—of this doctrine, permit me now to refer you to another extract from the same paper, of date May 28th, in singular contrast, not to say violent opposition, to the above.

In the latter editorial it is maintained that "Our Lord, possessing all power in Heaven, imparted a portion of it to his ministry. With that ministry he has promised 'always' to be to the end of time; so that, guarded and sustained by him, its permanence is certain. We have seen too that he blesses and abides with the private communion of his people, continuing in its doctrine and fellowship. These are great truths." I do not pretend to doubt but that Christ is often with the ministrations of a wicked ministry in a certain sense. When they are preaching the word of God, or administering the sacraments, Christ may visit the hearts of people who hear the word, or who partake the sacraments, but that is not being with the ministry; that is being with his true disciples, who in a willing heart receive the truth with weakness. He is not with the wicked ministry in any other or true sense, because no communion can take place between a sinner and the holy God by divine impartations of his righteousness or grace. The sinful minister is the child of the devil, and an intercourse and communion takes place between the father and the child. But Christ has promised to be with his ministry. Who are his ministry? Why, undoubtedly, those true disciples or Christians whom he has called to be ministers. With these he has promised to be "always" present, filling their earthen vessels with the gold of righteousness, and making their cup to overrun.

If a minister in the Church of Christ have not Christ with him in ministrations of righteous joy and peace and power, in the Holy Ghost, he may take it for granted he is a thief and a robber, and if he has common honesty he will desert the ministry, or procure Christ to be with him, by complying with the condition of salvation. If every body else in the world thinks a certain man is one of Christ's ministers clothed with power from on high, for the duties of the sacred office, that does not make him a minister if he himself knows that he is a devil and a robber. He knows that he is not cheating God and his own heart, when he knows he is cheating his acquaintances. His ability to cheat his friends or the Church, is not sufficient to make him one of Christ's ministers. Christ he cannot deceive. A devil cannot be a minister of Christ, though he may be a minister in Christ's visible church.

Your friend, JETHRO.

Contentious Preachers.

Phil. i. 15.

"The gospel of peace is a strange text, one would think, to preach division and raise strife from: and the pulpit as strange a mount for to plant the battering pieces of contention on. O how strangely do these men forget their Lord, the Prince of peace, who sent them, and their work, which is not to blow a trumpet of sedition and confusion, or sound an alarm to battle, but rather a joyful retreat from the bloody fight, wherein their lusts had engaged them to fight against God and one another! Indeed there is a war they ought to proclaim, but 'tis only against sin and Satan: and I am sure we are not fit to march out against them, till we can agree among ourselves. Luther prayed—"From a vainglorious Doctor, a contentious Pastor, and nice questions, the Lord deliver his Church!" And we, in these sad times, have reason to say as hearty an Amen to it as any since his age. Do we not live in a time when the church is turned into a Sophister's school? when such wrangling and jangling hath been that the most precious truths of the gospel are lost already to many, whose eyes are put out with the dust these contentions have raised, and they have at last fairly disputed themselves out of all their sober principles. O woe to such vile men, who have prostituted the gospel to such devilish ends! God may have mercy on the cheated souls to bring them back to the love of the truth; but for the cheaters, we fear, they are gone too far in the error of the wicked, that we can look for their return."

The Hour of Trial.

Every man shows fair in prosperity; but the main trial of the Christian is in suffering; any man may steer in a good gale and clear sea; but the mariner's skill may be seen in a tempest.

Herein the Christian goes beyond the Pagan's, not practice only, but admiration. "We rejoice in tribulation," saith the chosen vessel. Lo! here a point transcending all the affectation of heathenism. Perhaps some resolute spirit, whether out of a natural fortitude, or out of an ambition of fame or earthly glory, may set a face upon a patient enduring of loss or pain; but never any of those heroic Gentiles durst pretend to a joy in suffering. Hither can Christian courage reach: knowing that "tribulation worketh patience, and patience experience, and experience hope, and hope maketh not ashamed."

Is he bereaved of his goods and wordly estate? he comforts himself in the conscience of a better treasure, that can never be lost. Is he afflicted with sickness? his comfort is, that the inward man is so much more renewed daily, as the outward perisheth. Is he slandered and unjustly disgraced? his comfort is, that there is a blessing which will more than make him amends. Is he banished? he knows he is on his way homeward. Is he imprisoned? his spirit cannot be locked in: God and his angels can not be locked out. Is he dying? to him "to live is Christ, and to die is gain." Is he dead? he "rests from his labors," and is crowned with glory. Shortly, he is perfect gold, that comes more pure out of the fire than it went in: neither had he ever been so great a saint in heaven, if he had not passed through the flames of his trial here upon earth. [Bishop Hall.

THE WAY OF SALVATION.—"I have steadily attended to my duties as enjoined by my priest," said a Catholic lady in Boston to a missionary, "but have never felt happy in my mind till I heard you explain God's way of saving sinners, through faith in the merits of Christ, in whom I have hope." "No other name is given under heaven whereby any can be saved."

TRUE GREATNESS.—It is easy in the world to live after the world's opinion; it is easy in solitude to live after our own; but the great man is he who, in the midst of the crowd, keeps with perfect correctness the independence of solitude.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

Rev. Chauncey Richardson, A. M.

FIFTH PAPER.

The world, in general, forms too low an estimate of the qualifications necessary in the Methodist ministry. The first and great requisite, (next to personal holiness) is the gift of popular oratory. To be a good administrator of discipline, he must have the legal attainment necessary for the bar. To transact the business of a Quarterly or Annual Conference, he ought to possess the talents of a legislator. To superintend the financial interests of his circuit, to build churches and parsonages, to establish and furnish Sunday Schools, to sell books, to circulate periodicals, to collect money for the Bible and missionary cause, requires the business capacity of the merchant. Considering the versatility of genius necessary, is it strange that so few men are found who attend to all the points, great and small, in the Methodist Discipline? Bro. Richardson was one of those men. He omitted no duty because he thought it of minor importance. He did not make extraordinary attention to one commute for the neglect of another. He performed each duty at the proper time, and gave it its due proportion of attention.

A good business talent is of vast importance to a Methodist preacher. Brother R. found ample scope for the employment of his varied and practical talents. Rutersville College stands a monument of his industry. To procure the charter, which is the most liberal one our State has ever granted, he attended the sessions of Congress in person, met the committee, prepared a draft, removed difficulties, and by his great personal influence secured its passage. To endow it he obtained large grants of land from the Legislature, and traversed our State throughout its length and breadth, soliciting donations in land and money. He succeeded better than any other man could have done, and exceeded the most sanguine expectations of his friends.

He labored indefatigably in the cause of education, not only in practical teaching but in delivering public addresses, and awaking a general interest on the subject. He was especially attentive to the mental improvement of our ministry. Happy was the lot of that young preacher who received an appointment in his district. He would privately, and in a kind and brotherly manner, point out any defects in the organism of his sermons, in his delivery, manners or gesticulation.

His business capacity and experience was of incalculable advantage to us in transacting the business of our Conference. When those of us, who may be permitted to live, shall meet for our next session, as we look towards the Secretary's table we shall feel sad, and an involuntary sigh will escape from every bosom as we realize that he who has so long and so ably occupied that seat, has been removed forever from our midst.

When we are shocked at receiving the unexpected intelligence of the death of a friend and fellow laborer, we are cheered by this consideration, the death of Christians, and especially of Christian ministers, is not a fortuitous event. The time, place and circumstances, in all their details, are under the direction of Him who numbers the hairs of our heads. Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints. In the case of our brother, we believe God had been preparing him for his removal hence. For several years his friends have marked a growing spirituality. As the time drew near he was favored with a presentiment of his approaching end, and set his house in order. He died as the Christian soldier would wish to die, with his harness on, at his post on the field of battle, amid shouts of victory.

We who survive feel bereft, feel that our Conference has suffered an irreparable loss. With a degree of despondency the question is frequently asked, Who will take his place? How shall this chasm be filled? When God translated Elijah he had an Elisha prepared to receive his falling mantle. This is not the first time we have had this trial in Texas. When Ruter died, the little band of missionaries who had gathered around him here felt as though they were left in a state of orphanage. When Fowler, Sullivan and others have died, we have felt this loss oh! how keenly. But the Great Shepherd and Bishop of Souls has had his eye upon us. Other instruments have been thrust out into the vineyard and continued prosperity has attended us. We have experienced the truth of the sentiment so beautifully expressed by Charles Wesley, "God buries his workmen, but carries on his work."

Before I close these sketches, I wish to make another suggestion. Our fathers and brethren in the ministry are passing away; who shall preserve their memorial! The Church in Texas stands as a monument of their zeal and fidelity, but would not posterity like to know something of the men who laid the foundation of this great work—who planted the tree of Methodism, whose roots have already struck so deep into the soil, and the shadow of whose branches even now fills the land? The soldier, amidst the roar of artillery and the din and hustle of the battle field, has no opportunity to write a history of the campaign. So it is in Church and State—the actiag, ruling spirits of the age have no time to preserve for posterity an account of the stirring scenes in which they mingle. I believe Bro. Richardson has been twice, by formal vote of our Conference, requested to collect materials, and prepare a history of Methodism in Texas. Whether he had made any progress in the work I know not. One thing I know; it ought to be done. By a history, I do not mean a catalogue of names and places and events, chronologically arranged, but a glowing narrative of these events, and a life-like picture of the MEN who have figured in them. Among the honored dead are those whose names would adorn the page of any history. Some are now in other portions of the vineyard who have once been identified with us, as a Summers, a Clark, a Stevens. On our superannuated list, we have such names as Haynie, Hard, etc. In our effective ranks we have our leaders yet—an Alexander in the West, a Williams in the East, with their colleagues and brethren, who, though they were pioneers in the work, are yet seen in the forefront of the battle, pushing on the victories of Emanuel's cause. Would not a sketch of the life and labors, the toils and triumphs of such men abound with interesting incidents? Then we have in our reserve corps such men as Kinney, McKenzie and the like, who, though not "regulars," have yet rendered invaluable services. The back-ground, if not indeed the fore-ground of the picture, might be ornamented with likenesses of some of our noble hearted laymen. Some of these, when in a distant land, heard the voice of Providence calling them to leave their country and their kindred, and go into a land that they should afterwards receive for an inheritance, and they obeyed, hardly knowing whither they went or what should befal them. As they penetrated the wilds of Texas, at the close of each day's journey, after camping for the night, the vales and groves were rendered vocal with the songs of Zion and the unusual voices of prayer. When they arrived at their destined homes, in spite of the persecuting decrees of the government, the scoffs of infidels, and the derisions of such as had dispensed with their religion on crossing the Sabine, they erected the family altar and offered up the morning and evening sacrifice. When the holy Sabbath arrived, instead of spending it in hunting and diversions, they gathered their neighbors together, to whom they read the Word of God, and frequently a practical sermon. Truly, they were sent like John the Baptist, to prepare the way of the Lord. Many have united with them who, by their prayers and zeal, and with their substance, have helped on the good work. Their reward is on high, but their characters, properly delineated, would illuminate the radiance of earth's historical records. Would that the spirit of some Theophilus Arminius could be stirred to write sketches of the rise and progress of Methodism in Texas.

And now I close these articles—this faint tribute to the memory of our dear departed Richardson. May the reader be as much profited in perusing them as the writer has been in preparing them for the press.

H. S. T.

I Ought to Pray More.

For one, I am convinced that I do not pray enough. I feel this conviction daily. As a half-fed man is conscious that he needs more food, so my half-furnished soul tells me that I need more prayer. I need it to give me strength, to quicken my affections, to vitalize my relations to the church, and spiritualize all my conversation.

I MUST PRAY MORE. I am in a world of sin; unholy influences are pressing me on every side. The spirit of the world assails me at every step; in all the domestic, social, and business relations of life, I meet it, and feel it, and without more prayer I shall yield to it. Alas! I have yielded, and am still yielding, and there is no alternative but more prayer! I must pray more, or be swept down by the tide. Lord save, or I perish!

I WILL PRAY MORE. A good resolution! May I have grace to keep it. How many such have been broken! Let me, then, first of all, pray for grace to do what I see needs to be done. And let me remember that it is prayer that I need; communion with God, intercourse with heaven, fellowship with the Holy Spirit. I need the penitence, humility, self-abasement and self-renunciation, which prayer alone can secure. I need the faith, and hope, and love which prayer alone can awaken.

I will pray more, then, because it is my duty to do so. I am morally and spiritually unfit to engage in God's service as I am. I have reason to fear that my offerings may be an abomination unto the Lord. But my obligation to serve God remains. I ought to do Christian duty, and bring my gifts to the altar. And God is waiting to be gracious! willing to give his Spirit to them that ask him.

Then I ought, and must, and will pray more for others, for my family, friends, the Church, the world, and especially for my pastor! Alas, how have I forgotten him of late! Lord, take not from me thine Holy Spirit! Restore unto me the joys of thy salvation, and uphold me by thy free Spirit. Then will I teach transgressors thy ways, and sinners shall be converted unto thee. O, teach me and help me to pray. My fainting and inconsistent heart turns to thee. O, strengthen me with strength in my soul!

A Rich Poor Man.

One windy afternoon I went with a friend into a country almshouse. There was sitting before a feeble fire a very aged man, who was deaf, and so shaken with the palsy, that one wooden shoe constantly pattered on the brick floor. But deaf, sick and helpless, it turned out that he was happy. "What are you doing, Wisby?" said my friend. "Wait, sir." "And for what?" "For the appearing of my Lord." "And what makes you wish for his appearing?" "Because, sir, I expect great things then. He has promised a crown of righteousness to all that love his appearing!" And to see if it was a right foundation on which he rested that glorious hope, we asked old Wisby what it was. By degrees he got on his spectacles, and opening the great Bible beside him, pointed to the text: "Therefore, being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ; by whom also we have access by faith into this grace wherein we stand, and rejoice in the hope of the glory of God." [

Though you possess untold wealth, if you have not old Wisby's faith, you are a poor man; if you have that faith, and are "rich towards God," count it all joy if you are as poor as Lazarus or Wisby in wordly goods. [Heber.

Universalism among Sailors.

We find the bright repositories of science enriched with beautiful gems of minstrelsy; productions of earth's gifted ones, whose peerless minds, penetrating the mystic labyrinths of melody, gather sweet reverberations, and weave the flowing numbers, whose dulcet notes so often soothe the crushed and broken heart, and chase the withering blight from life's adversities: theirs are names which History proudly emblazons on her imperishable registers. But the soul of music dwells not alone in the fairy measures which Genius has twined, imparting life to the dull chords of art. No, there is an instrument of divine origin, the human voice, whose delicate vibrations rival their sweetest strings. Sluggish is the fountain of feeling in that heart that has not paused to catch the joyous laugh of childhood—beautiful relict of pristine innocence! Our mother's voice! who can forget her gentle tones? Time may efface the hour of rapture when minstrel fingers woke enchanted sounds, but while memory's taper gilds the shadowy past, the loved tones which blest our earliest recollections will remain enshrined in the heart's secret urn. O, this world of ours is full of melody! Go, wander over nature's broad domain, and listen to her myriad harp strings, all telling of the wisdom, love and power of the great Creator. The trembling leaf, the murmuring rill, the green old forest with carols of birds, and its thousand voices, the dash of far off waterfall in the stilly night, the waves of ocean breaking on the lonely shore, the sighing gale, the howling blast, the deep bellowing of the storm wind, the roll of the thunder, and the terrific roar of the mighty cataract! Would that some golden cloud might linger in its airy flight, and trace on its rainbow canvas their lofty anthem. When Deity, enthroned in glory and majesty, went forth, and from the lap of chaos called our slumbering earth to rejoice in glad existence, to revel with sister planets and rolling spheres through the mazy fields of space, the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy. Each flowery vale reverberates with melody and song; they are borne on every zephyr's wing, faint symbols of those strains which float from seraph lyres among the hills of Paradise; and of the swelling chorus which ascends from that unnumbered host of of beatified spirits, who blaze around the Eternal's throne! Universalism among Sailors.

A Universalist was once appointed a chaplain in the navy, and reported for duty on board one of our ships setting for sea. His creed became known to the sailors, and was freely discussed in the mess:

"If we are all so good that we are going to heaven," said an old tar, "what it is the use in overhauling one's sins? It's only to give a man a bloody sight of trouble for nothing."

"If we are all on the right track," said another, "and must bring up at the right port, what is the use preaching and praying about it?"

"If we trust this doctrine, and it don't turn out so be true, there'll be hell to pay," exclaimed a third.

These sentiments were shared in by the whole crew, and soon became known to the new appointed chaplain, who was wise enough to resign his commission. [Rev. W. Colton.

DEATH.—What woes are caused by death in this world! They are seen every where. The earth is "arched with graves!" In almost every dwelling death has been doing his work of misery. The palace can not exclude him; and he comes unbidden into the cottage. He finds his way into the dwelling of ice in which the Greenlander and Esquimaux lives; to the tent of the Bedouin Arab, and the wandering Tartar; to the wigwam of the Indian, and to the harem of the Turk; to the splendid mansion of the rich, as well as to the abode of the poor.

THE THREE CONDITIONS OF BELIEVERS.—They were "dead in sins," "Enemies to God," "Children of wrath." They are reconciled to God, regenerated, washed, sanctified, obedient children, delight in the Lord, walking in love and in the fellowship of the Spirit. They will be saved eternally, crowned with glory and immortality at the appearing of Jesus Christ. Happy believers! mightily delivered, gloriously saved, and waiting for glory's crown. Be faithful, and soon you will wear it.

THE PEACE OF GOD.—This "passeth all understanding." It can not, therefore, be defined; it refuses to be held in the vice of her logic, or to be subjected to the iron pressure of our metaphysical systems. It comes to the soul through the avenue of the sensibility, and not through the intellect or the will. The knowledge of it is derived from the experience of the heart rather than from any process of the understanding. Peace comes from God!

ADHERING TO CHRIST.—A Christian friend visiting a good man under great distress and afflicting dispensations, which he bore with such patient and composed resignation as to make his friend wonder and admire it, inquired how he was enabled so to comfort himself? The good man said, "The distress I am under is indeed severe; but I find it lighteneth the stroke very much to creep near to him who handles the rod," adding, "But where else, save in the religion of Christ, could such a sufferer find such a supplier?"

TEMPERANCE.—With all the knowledge at present before us, of the [illegible] of strong drink, both to body [illegible] it is not surprising that so many are [illegible] who neglect their duties, forsake their [illegible] and abandon all the obligations to God and man, for the love of this one ruinous [illegible]

NEW ORLEANS:

Saturday Morning, July 10.

The Local Church—Its [illegible].

The Church universal, the [illegible] body of Christians—our subject is not that not so large as that; but the Church considered as an assembly of Christians, "a congregation of faithful men, in which the true word of God is preached and sacraments duly administered." It may be called after the name of the village, or the street, or the nearest road or creek where the assembly meet. There stands and long has stood the meeting-house, built of wood, or it may be of brick or mortar. Perhaps a grave-yard is attached, and the grounds have been given and dedicated to holy uses, by some patriarch long gone to his rest. One is reminded by it of "the parcel of ground that Jacob gave to his son Joseph. Now, Jacob's well was there." For [illegible] deep and living well, in a land where no [illegible], so is a pure Church, in any community, in this sinful world. The fathers [illegible] their children.

[illegible]—the A. St. or B. St. [illegible] perhaps it is Rehoboth or Bethel, Carmel or Ebenezer, or some [illegible]. It has a history. [illegible] are not surpassed by any. They are worth [illegible] and ought to be known, at least, to those who hold membership there. It [illegible] more a higher end than curiosity. Will the steward or class-leader of a local Church take pen in hand and note down these items:

1. The date of its organization and the [illegible] and incidents connected therewith.

2. The pastors—in their order.

3. The visitations of revival grace and their [illegible].

4. [illegible] of souls converted there and added to the Church.

5. The aggregate contributions to supporting the Gospel at home.

6. The sums given to the poor.

7. The money contributed for domestic and foreign missions.

8. The aggregate contributions to other religious and benevolent causes.

9. The number (if any) of preachers that have been raised up in that Church and sent out into the Vineyard.

More items might be added, completing the [illegible] of a Church's moral wealth and worth. It would help the membership to add up those figures and look them full in the face. They would see what they are doing, and whether bearing their proportionate part in the great work of extending Christ's Kingdom in the earth. It is a good sign of the times that Reports of the work are every year assuming speciality. They are descending from the generalities of Conferences to Districts, from Districts to Circuits, and from Circuits to Appointments. The eyes of all are being directed to the local Churches, and thus it is seen which are doing their duty, and which not. We hope this tendency will be followed to utmost minuteness.

If a victory is won the whole army gets the glory, notwithstanding some regiments were on the reserve and others faltered. But this is a day with the Church militant, when every one is expected to do his duty, and the eye of our King and Captain is upon every detachment of his host.

It is well to note that the Lord regards his Churches, [illegible]. While viewed in their connectional character, as of the whole family in glory and heaven, their individuality is [illegible] sight of. The addresses to the seven Churches of Asia are marked with startling discrimination. Each begins with—"I know thy works." Laodicea and Sardis are not confounded together. The "charity and service" of the Church in Thyatira are not credited to the Church in Pergamos. They stand forth distinctly, and each is dealt with on its own account.

Not long ago we were told of a certain Church in which there had never been a missionary collection. Of another that, for eleven years consecutively, had fallen short in the support of its pastor. It would do them good to add figures and pray over the sum of them. "Given of all our substance to send the gospel abroad, $0—multiplied by eleven. In debt for the home supply, an average of $200 per year, multiplied by eleven." Query—How many such Churches would it require to convert the world in any given time?

The Lord has "a few things against" them. The heathen and the poor that have no helper, complain because they have not been ministered unto; God has a charge of robbing "in tithes and offerings." There may have been lax discipline, and the unworthy have been kept in communion to the reproach of religion. General amendment must go before a general blessing. The candle-stick is in danger of removal. Such a Church is barren, and not the joyful mother of children.

"That Church, sir," said a citizen once to us, pointing to a plain, but well used convention, "that Church has done a great deal for this place. I reckon a thousand people have been converted there first and last; and if the Sunday offerings since it began were counted up, the sum would be surprising." How amiable! Their good is past finding out.

The standard of a pure morality elevated the entire community, and of life steadily held forth, comforted; the weak fortified in virtue, and multitudes led by holy teachings and examples to heaven. The Sabbath School has been maintained, and its effects are manifest on the generation that has risen up. "This and that man was born in her; and the Highest himself shall establish her. The Lord shall count, when he writeth up the people, that this man was born there."

Happy the people who have such a Church among them. Happy the town, the village, the neighborhood, where it is—doing its work, bearing its testimony. Delightful associations cluster about it, for many hearts which can never forget its altars, and in distant lands they long to see God's power and glory so as they have seen them in that sanctuary. Where such Churches are multiplied there does the kingdom of God increase with power.

It is to be hoped, Christian brother, that the Church where you belong, has not forfeited its charter. Look you, and cause your brethren to look at its history. What has it done, and what is it doing? Doubtless, you take pleasure in the strength of the Church at large; its annual increase—the sums it pours into God's treasury—the weight and character it enjoys in the world. But answer, Does any of the credit belong to your local Church? If not, your boasting is not good. Hold off that flattering connectional view of things, and take a congregational one. The eye of God is on your local Church; he has an account with it and a message for it. Its history is being made up. And may it be to the praise of His glory.

The License Law of Louisiana.

We learn, by our exchanges, that an attempt was made last week in Donaldsonville, La., to give the people there the benefit of the law established by the last Legislature, whereby, if disposed, the community might protect themselves, their children and servants, from the infliction of grog shops and doggeries. The question "license or no license" was quite exciting, and to the coffee-house men threatened to be absorbing. It was doubtful at one time how it would go, but finally it went in favor of liberty—to retail cursing and do mischief. What a triumph! Wonder if the big gun was not set off!

A Temperance lecturer lately lectured in the Ohio Penitentiary, at the close of which, as we understand it, he took the vote of the convicts as to the cause which led them ultimately to prison, when four-fifths of the whole number voted—STRONG DRINK! That is about as we would expect to find it in every State prison or county jail.

It might be interesting to look over the criminal records of the parish in which Donaldsonville is situated—to inspect the jail there and see how much dark, bloody, expensive business is chargeable to STRONG DRINK. An inspection of the Penitentiary at Baton Rouge might bring out facts equal to those of Ohio. What redeeming trait is there in this low, degrading, impoverishing traffic, that justifies society in maintaining it?

PER CONTRA: In Jackson, La., the question, "license or no license," has been decided more in accordance with reason, humanity, Christianity. The "Mirror" publishes a stringent town ordinance, passed June 7, making it unlawful for any person or persons to vend spirituous liquors in any quantities, under any pretext whatever, within the limits of the corporation, under a penalty of not less than ten, or more than seventy-five dollars.

We have heard of favorable action in other parts of the State. Let the ball roll on.

ORPHAN ASYLUMS.—The two or three hundred orphans of the Protestant Asylums of New Orleans had a lovely reunion, on Monday evening, at the Boys' Asylum, in Fourth District. The boys, under the care of Mr. Upson, seemed well bestowed and cared for: the girls, too, showed that the Father of the fatherless had provided them good guardians. Mrs. Beardsley and Mrs. Bowers, teachers, are doing a work here for which many shall rise up and call them blessed. Many citizens were present, infected with the general and innocent joy around. The face of Elder Hadden actually beamed as he distributed the good things provided by confectioners Flitt, Nichols and others.

A BLOCK FOR THE MONUMENT.—The appeal of Rev. J. M. Hofer, "German Missions," will not be in vain. He starts out shortly on a tour of collections to which the Conferences have invited him. The Conferences have resolved well, and now will have an opportunity to "perform the doing of it." Heartily do we commend the man and his cause to all.

SABBATH SCHOOL CELEBRATION.—Rev. J. D. Parker, pastor, has furnished an account of the eleventh anniversary of the Algiers Sunday School, 6th inst. The Exercises were arranged, (as they should be) not only for interest, but fine moral effect. After carolling of sweet and pious hymns, and sundry dialogues and speeches, the citizens spread out a collation. Thus duty is enlivened with joy, and the children "blest and pious grow."

SUNDAY SCHOOL VISITOR.—As there are many families, congregations, and Sunday Schools, that have never seen the Visitor, we are requested to state that back numbers of the present volume, to wit, from January to June, will be sent to any person ordering them for gratuitous distribution, free of subscription charge. In ordering them, state the number of copies desired and the post office and State to which they are to be sent. Address, post

METHODIST PRESS.

OBITUARIES.—Just hear our friend Dr. Lee, with the "thermometer at 82 in the shade before nine o'clock." He has almost lost that good humor of his:

"Our inability to give satisfaction to those who fill this department of the Advocate is one of our regular trials. Do what we may we are subject to constant complaints. We can't please when we do our best; and we get along about as well when we don't try at all. Some abuse us personally in their letters. Others get fretted, and say, "Stop my paper"—three very bad words in themselves, and especially distasteful to an editor. We wish sometimes people could quit dying just for a spell; or until we get off the number of obituaries we have on hand; or that some people were as averse to writing long ones as most people are to reading them. Or that somehow or other we could satisfy the wishes of all our readers on the subject; or cease to dissatisfy them, either or both, without disturbing ourself by the process. But as it seems impossible to do this, why we shall have to do as heretofore—try to please ourself, which is generally a very difficult matter."

EDITORIAL FREEDOM.—The editor of Zion's Herald gives some sound advice to patrons of a paper in his Farewell. There are who prefer safety in an editor to any other quality: by which they mean, his paper must be "a stagnant pool of admitted opinions." In their estimation a Church paper is set to keep things in statu quo. He must keep to the rut, no matter how crooked the road, how deep the sand. Under penalty of "stop my paper," they refuse him any freedom of discussion. What think they of this:

"It is blind folly to insist that an editor must only represent the received sentiments of his readers, the stereotyped ideas of his party or sect. We do not believe that intelligent readers can be satisfied with the uniformity, if not stupidity of such a course. They wish to be prompted by progressive suggestions. The interest of a paper depends largely upon the originality and bravery of its positions, and the editor who bestirs himself amidst the inquiries of the day, who takes positive views of his subjects, and has independence enough to propound new ideas, even if they be against old prejudices—he is the man who will always be most read, even if he should be most rebuked."

SUNDAY INSTEAD OF WEEK DAY PREACHING. This question is receiving thorough discussion, by strong disputants, in the columns of our Charleston contemporary.

THE CALIFORNIA PRESS.—The papers north and south are engaged in a pretty sharp discussion. The charge was made that the M. E. Church North, while abolition in its sentiments, had slaveholders in its ministry in California. The Christian Advocate denies this, saying:

"The brethren alluded to are Revs. Wm. Taylor and A. Bland. They married sisters who inherited slave property. One of the heirs is under age. When they joined the Baltimore Conference they publicly declared that they had not claimed a division of the estate on the ground that it would separate the slave families; that they received nothing whatever from them, and solemnly declared their determination to manumit them all together, when the youngest heir should marry or attain her majority. She is yet unmarried and a minor in law. But arrangements have been completed for the manumission of the whole families together, as soon as these conditions change. In the meantime these brethren receive no avails of this property."

To which the "Observer" replies:

"The editor says, 'these brethren' (Taylor and Bland) 'receive no avails of this (negro) property.' Will the editor tell us who does? Their wives! Ah, indeed! Beautiful subterfuge!"

On one subject the organ of the Church North in California seems to be ahead of the press in the old States. Speaking of the lay movement the C. C. Advocate, of May 20, remarks:

"For ourselves we cannot see what danger there can be in admitting the laity of the church to assist, especially in the business and financial arrangements of it. We believe Ministers are called of God to preach, teach and disseminate truth, and they are not by this call better fitted than their lay brethren to facilitate the pecuniary arrangements of the church. If the matter is entertained by the General Conference of course many alterations must be made to make the plan work harmoniously, and able heads are there to make them. We fear because there has been no very strong demonstration upon the subject, it will not receive the attention it deserves, and thereby agitation grow out of it, that will be agitation indeed. We would prefer at this early day, the ministers gracefully yield to their lay brethren the whole of their financial responsibilities, necessarily, as we think, assumed at the beginning."

Randolph Macon College.

From the R. C. Advocate we learn that the late Commencement came off with a crowd of visitors on 9 and 10 June. W. M. Cabell, of Lynchburg, Va., a graduate of 1844, delivered the address before Alumni, which Dr. Smith speaks highly of. The degree of A. B. was conferred on 12 graduates—that of A. M. on Revs. Duncan and Foote, of Va. Conference. The names of the graduates are embraced within the three States, Va., N. C, and S. C.

The following disciplinary arrangements have been made:

"The former method of grading and awarding honors has been dispensed with. The different studies pursued, and conduct, have now particular numerical values assigned to each; and every student who, at the close of his college course, shall have obtained not less than four-fifths of the sum of the values assigned to the studies he has pursued, and to conduct, shall be considered in the first grade of scholarship, and entitled to rank as an Honor Graduate. Those who may fall below four-fifths, but who are nevertheless sufficiently high to be approved by the Faculty, shall rank in the second or third grade lediotory is awarded to the one who obtains the highest number, and the Latin speech to the one who obtains the next highest number. Hence there is but one honor, and that attainable by all who obtain the above specified average. This we consider a great improvement on the former plan, and is found to give great satisfaction to all concerned.

"A demerit system has been established, by which a specified numerical value is given to the offences usually committed in college, and the accumulation of a certain number of demerits leads to dismission. This system has been in operation a session, and is found to be highly effectual in promoting good order and attention to study."

How the system takes with those most concerned, may be inferred from an extract from the College Magazine. The article is signed by a student:

"How often now on these fine mornings are we desirous to enjoy the luxury of a blissful nap. There never was a time, according to our view, so well suited to indulge our somniferous propensities. Just about sunrise, oh! what a delightful hour to lie, and doze, and dream, and sleep! Recitations! Prayers! What particularly inconvenient things these are to attend at this particular hour. 'I'd rather get six demerits this morning,' says one about half asleep, 'than to get up; I feel so comfortable.' 'But you'd better be getting up from there,' says his kind chum; 'the bell will stop directly, and you know you don't lack but — demerits of obtaining the beautiful, round number of one hundred and fifty.' The former, impressed with the imminent danger of his position, leaps up and rushes with unwashed face and dishevelled hair into the Chapel. And thus it is with nearly all of us lazy fellows. We push the thing as far as possible; but when the number of our demerits has arrived at one hundred and forty-five, or six, or seven, or somewhere along there, somebody just ought to see us, to witness what industrious folks we are. This grand "Demerit System," makes cowards of us all; at least, it makes us get up very punctually, when, if it did not exist, there would be considerable doubt on this point. To be a little more sober, we are bound to admit that the effect which this system is producing is the very thing for our health and for our intellectual and moral advancement; and, therefore, although it is pretty strict, as we before intimated, we like it; we wish it eminent success. And if we may judge from the good which it has already done, we doubt not that it will be of permanent benefit to every student, and that the interests of the Institution will be greatly enhanced by its rigid enforcement."

LITERARY NOTICES.

END OF PRELACY, including a demonstration of the system of, so called, Evangelical Low-Churchism. By Rev. R. C. Shimeall. New York, C. Scribner: 1852. 8vo pp. 520.

The Author was for seventeen years a presbyter of the P. E. Church, and is now a member of the Presbytery of New York. He is of those who think that the battle of the reformation is again to be fought. The line of argument is, so far as we have been able to examine it, the old one, followed up laboriously and with an ample array of authority. The only thing fresh and new discoverable in this addition to the literature of the Prelatic controversy is the mention and discussion of some late writers on both sides of the question who have not heretofore been gravely booked in octavo form.

Mr. Shimeall exhibits an intimate acquaintance with his subject and treats it thoroughly. His zeal for truth and the pure faith is commendable, and also his exactness as a disputant in citing authorities. The style lacks ease, perspicuity and force, and we vote the volume a decided bore.

Union of Church Papers.

Bro. MCTYEIRE:—I have just read another article from our much esteemed brother, R. Ahbey, in which he advocates still the mammoth paper scheme. Now, sir, I believe we may make improvements in our Church papers, but I think it must be done by increasing their number, and not by diminishing it.

It used to be thought almost impossible to sustain a religious newspaper unless the whole Church came up to the rescue; but now many of our Conferences can do it respectively themselves. And the time will soon come, I doubt not, or at least ought to come, when, wherever a political paper can be supported, a religious one can. Every town of any size or respectability will, in the course of time, have its religious as well as its secular paper.

Why, sir, for us on the sea-shore of Louisiana and Mississippi, we can get ten subscribers for a New Orleans paper, for one from some great central town of the land, at so long a distance from us that it is all stale before we get it; or filled up, as it must in a great degree be, with matters so foreign from us that we shall have no interest in them. The only objection ever used before against multiplying papers is, that it destroys the dividend from theirs. Bro. A.'s plan has none.

MINISTER RECALLED.—By a dispatch to last evening's Picayune, it appears that the French Minister at Washington has been recalled. The Secretary of Legation is to German Missions.

To Rev. E. W. Sehon, D. D., Secretary of the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, South.

DEAR BROTHER:—Again do we wish to inform you of what we are doing in the Crescent City among the Germans.

God has preserved the health and the lives of the missionaries and their families, and no good thing has he withholden from us. We are still upon our posts, which were assigned to us at our last Conference by our beloved Superintendent, Bishop Paine. We are determined to stay on them, no matter what the summer season may bring forth, unless we are called away by the Bishop of our souls.

The work of the Lord among the Germans is still in a prospering state. Our meetings generally are well attended on week-day evenings, as well as on Sundays; our Sunday schools promise well. In the first mission some have joined since last Conference, and can testify that they have found peace with God through Christ. At every Spring season we have to lose some of our members by removals, but we are always enabled to fill up the vacancies; only the growth of the society is in this wise slow. This mission has in the last six months not increased as could be desired, mostly on account of the want of a suitable meeting-house, the present one being out of the German part of the city, and inconvenient in every respect; but blessed be God, that we are now in a way to remedy this evil. We shall soon build a convenient church, such an one as has long been wanting in New Orleans. An eligible lot, 64 by 128 feet, has been purchased. We do not wish to lose any time, but go right forward in gathering up the means. Our plan is to put up a good brick building, forty-five by seventy-five, with a steeple large enough to point out where the house is.

The second mission is growing. A number have joined since Conference, and the most of them are converted to God; among whom are some from the Roman Catholic Church. I shall not wonder at all if, in a year or two, the little Chapel should have to be replaced by a more spacious one. The prophet says: "that the upright shall prosper, and the pious God protects," this has been literally fulfilled in this mission. The devil and his host, though armed with rage, is losing ground, whilst the little army of Christ, with their banner of Peace and Love, is increasing every week!

In Carrollton and Lafayette we have not been so successful as we could wish, yet are not discouraged.

I should like to say to the preachers and members of the Methodist E. Church, South, but more especially to those in the bounds of the Louisiana and Alabama Conferences, that it now becomes necesary for us to make use of your liberal and benevolent resolution, made at the last sessions, to wit: "to aid in the erection of a German missionary church." Dear brethren, God permitting, I shall shortly visit as many of your circuits and stations as I possibly can; hoping that you will reach out to your humble brother a helping hand to assist in this work. We doubt not, but that we shall find cheerful givers wherever we go. We are not particular in our collections, but take the dime from a cheerful giver as gladhearted as the fifty and one hundred dollars. Many little rivulets make a stream, and when these streams flow together, they make a mighty river.

To those who are too distant for us to visit, but who would, notwithstanding, wish to contribute to our German Missionary Church, we would say: Please, dear brethren and sisters, and friends in Christ, send on your donations to the address of Rev. J. C. Keener, or Rev. N. H. McTyeire, or to mine.

We wish to build a commodious house, not overcostly; we shall avoid all unnecessary exponse, but yet it should be such a house that shall stand for years as a monument in New Orleans, to tell to those that come after us, that missionary zeal and missionary love have done the work.

Since I have been reading of the Washington Monument—of its praiseworthy undertaking—of the contributions in gold and silver, as also of stone blocks from the new as well as from the old States, yea, even from Rome, from the Pope himself, it has occurred to my mind again and again: what a praiseworthy undertaking it would be, if the whole M. E. Church South would unite and raise not only $10,000, but $20,000, and build a monumental German Missionary Church in New Orleans, where not only the spectators would gaze and admire the free and full offering of your charity, but where hundreds of my poor forlorn countrymen could be gathered into the fold of Christ.

At our last Conference, held in Thibodaux, while giving account of our missionary labors in this city, I deplored that we had not a proper House of Worship, nor the means to build one, Bishop Paine interrupted me, saying, "You shall have it." I thought then, "O, that these words had an echo in the hearts of the Church South."

Now, do not shake your heads after reading this my poor pleading, and let the matter rest there, but look into your purse, or your treasury, after you lay the paper by, and send us something forthwith. Send us a block to our Missionary Monument! You shall not regret it if you do. Hundreds of grateful German voices will unite to bless you. But, perhaps, you will doubt whether the Pope of Rome will send us one? Well, be not hasty in judging. A strenuous Roman Catholic lady, of this city, who but a few months ago told me, in a religious conversation, that it had been far better if Luther and Calvin had never existed, than that they should have caused such a great split in the holy Roman Catholic Church, handed me $22 dollars, all in gold pieces, as a donation to our new Church. There—I consider this a small block from Rome.

To many of those that read this, I may have the pleasure of speaking face to face; I shall then be able to tell you more.

Send your gifts without delay, remembering the words of the Apostle, "A cheerful giver the Lord loves."

German Missionary.

The Late Judge Preston.

Among those whose loss on the ill-fated St. James we are so suddenly called on to mourn, there was none who filled a larger space in public estimation than Judge Isaac T. Preston. He was among the foremost of our citizens in wisdom, patriotism and public spirit, and united the noble qualities of mind and heart with a striking simplicity of character. For years he has occupied a seat on the supreme bench of the State, and he has been distinguished for the soundness of his judicial opinions and the bold and fearless manner in which he gave expression to them. His life and acts form an important part of the history of the country. The purity of his private life, the warm and generous impulses of his heart, and his known deep sympathy with the people, gave to all his acts and opinions the sanctity of sincerity, while his urbanity, learning and devoted attention to the duties of his official position secured to him the unbounded respect and warmest esteem of the whole community.

Judge Preston was a Virginian by birth, born, we believe, in Abingdon, and a brother of W. C. Preston and John S. Preston, of South Carolina. At the commencement of the last war with Great Britain he entered the army, and soon after its close he removed to New Orleans and commenced the study of the law. He soon embarked in the practice of this profession, and before many years had elapsed, he attained a high eminence. He held several high official stations in the State previous to his being appointed to the Supreme Bench. He was appointed Attorney General two or three times, and was once Judge of the First District Court. But yesterday full of life and vigor, with promise of many years of usefulness; to-day, he has gone to the spirit land, leaving a bereaved and heart-broken family to mourn his untimely end; and his large circle of warm and admiring friends, while they deeply sympathize with that family, will, when the passing events of the day shall be forgotten, cherish his memory as a treasured legacy. Judge P. was 60 years of age.

To the Preachers of the Southwestern Conferences.

DEAR BRETHREN: Although our sales, during the past winter and spring, have greatly exceeded our most sanguine expectations, we have, however, been able to keep up a full and ample supply of stock, consisting of standard Methodist books and valuable miscellaneous publications, and are now prepared to meet the entire demand of the Church for approved theological literature, in all its various departments, throughout the whole Southwestern range of this great field of evangelical operation. Your patronage is therefore respectfully invited. Should you find it convenient to accompany your orders with the cash, it will be a matter of special accommodation to the concern at this time; but if this should not be practicable, your orders will be promptly filled at four months, or until the approaching sessions of your respective Conferences.

Yours, very truly and affectionately,

E. STEVENSON, Agent.

Ministerial Changes—Texas Conference.

BRO. MCTYEIRE:—Six months since I furnished your readers with brief notes of the proceedings of our Annual Conference, and concluded by giving the appointments of the preachers for 1852. Since that time quite a number of changes have taken place, as follows:

Upon the Galveston District C. Richardson, its excellent P. E., has been removed from the church militant to the church triumphant. Bishop Paine has appointed R. Alexander his successor.

David R. Kellogg was employed upon the Brazonia Circuit, but, after a very short period of labor, a mutual and, to all appearance, a cordial dislike sprung up between him and his charge, and he left it, and soon afterwards united with the Baptist church in Independence.

Edward A. Stocking is laboring as a supply upon the San Jacinto mission.

In the Rutersville District Bro. Kollen, appointed to the Fayetteville Circuit, failed to take his work. The Circuit was attached to Rutersville, and a Bro. Cox employed to assist Bro. Coulson.

J. M. Dierhammer has left his work on the Washington Circuit.

A. M. Box, late of the Alabama Conference, has charge of Austin and Bastrop Circuit.

Bro. J. W. Whipple, the P. E., has visited Brownsville, but, so far as I know, there is not in the whole valley of the Rio Grande a regular Methodist preacher.

M. Yell has declined taking charge of Springfield Circuit, which has been united with Ware, under the charge of P. M. Yell.

A new church has been erected in Victoria, and the congregation so enlarged that it is now made a separate charge under the pastoral care of O. M. Addison, whose place upon the Texanan Circuit is supplied by G. W. Cottingham, late of the Arkansas Conference.

H. S. Thrall takes charge of Port Lavacca and Indianola.

A Bro. Lafferty has been engaged for the Corpus Christi mission.

J. Stuyher was, for a short time, employed upon the Egypt Circuit, but the charge is now unsupplied.

J. W. Phillips, B. F. Peel and J. M. Follansbee are traveling for their health.

Yours truly,

JULIUS.

CAPT. ENSIGN.—We hear from all quarters the highest praise awarded to Capt. Ensign, of the steamer California, for his noble exertions in saving the passengers on the ill-fated St. James. His boat was in imminent danger while lying alongside the burning wreck, and some of his passengers repeatedly urged him to look out for their safety. He steadily refused, however, to shove off as long as there was the slightest chance of saving any one.

PROCEEDINGS RELATIVE TO THE EXPLOSION.—The Coroner was engaged yesterday and the day before in investigating the causes that led to the explosion of the St. James. The conclusion arrived at, was, that it was purely accidental, and that no one was to blame.

The following is the weekly report of the Charity Hospital for the week ending Friday, July 9: Admitted, 307; discharged, 260; died, 21, five of which were from cholera and two from sun stroke. Number remaining, 773. A single accidental case was admitted during this week, viz: Lasso, a Spaniard, fell from the third story of a house in Dauphin street. He was admitted into the Hospital for a fracture of the ribs, and he is

The Memory of Mr. Clay.

We give below a portion of the eulogies on the life and character of Henry Clay, pronounced in the Senate of the United States on the 30th [illegible]

Prayer by Rev. C. M. Butler.

The journal having been read,

Mr. Underwood rose and said: Mr. President, I rise to announce the death of my colleague, Mr. Clay. He died at his lodgings in the National Hotel of this city, at seventeen minutes past eleven o'clock yesterday morning, in the seventy-sixth year of his age. He expired in perfect composure, and without a groan or struggle.

By his death our country has lost one of its most eminent citizens and statesmen; and I think, its greatest genius. I shall not detain the Senate by narrating the transactions of a long and useful life. His distinguished services as a statesman are inseparably connected with the history of his country. As Representative and Speaker in the other House of Congress, as Senator in this body, as Secretary of State, and as Envoy abroad, he has, in all these positions, exhibited a wisdom and patriotism which have made a deep and lasting impression upon the grateful hearts of his countrymen. His thoughts and his actions have already been published to the world in written biography; in Congressional debates and reports; in the journals of the two Houses, and in the pages of American history. They have been commemorated in monuments erected on the wayside. They have been engraven on medals of gold. Their memory will survive the monuments of marble and the medals of gold; for these are effaced and decay by the friction of ages; but the thoughts and actions of my late colleague have become identified with the immortality of the human mind, and will pass down from generation to generation as a portion of our national inheritance, incapable of annihilation so long as the sympathies has an admirer or liberty a friend.

Mr. President, the character of Henry Clay was formed and developed by the influence of our free institutions. His physical, mental and moral faculties were the gift of God. That they were greatly superior to the faculties allotted to most man cannot be questioned. They were not cultivated, improved, and directed by a liberal or collegiate education. His respectable parents were not wealthy, and had not the means of maintaining their children at college. Moreover, his father died when he was a boy. At an early period, Mr. Clay was thrown upon his own resources, without patrimony. He grew up in a clerk's office in Richmond, Virginia. There he studied law. He emigrated from that State, and settled in Lexington, Kentucky, where he commenced the practice of his profession before he was of full age.

The road to wealth, to honor, and fame was open before him. Under our institutions and laws he might freely employ his great faculties, unobstructed by legal impediments, and unclogged by exclusive privileges. Very soon Mr. Clay made a deep and favorable impression upon the people among whom he began his career. The excellence of his natural faculties was soon displayed. Necessity stimulated him in their cultivation. His assiduity, skill, and fidelity in professional engagements secured public confidence. He was elected member of the Legislature of Kentucky, in which body he served several sessions prior to 1806. In that year he was elevated to a seat in the Senate of the United States.

At the bar and in the General Assembly of Kentucky, Mr. Clay first manifested those high qualities as a public speaker which have secured to him so much popular applause and admiration. His physical and mental organization eminently qualified him to become a great and impressive orator. His person was tall, slender and commanding; his temperament ardent, fearless and full of hope; his countenance clear, expressive and amiable—indicating the emotion which predominated at the moment with exact similitude. His voice, cultivated and modulated in harmony with the sentiment he desired to express, fell on the ear like the melody of enrapturing music; his eye, beaming with intelligence, and flashing with corruscations of genius; his gesture and attitudes graceful and natural—his personal advantages won the prepossession of an audience, even before his intellectual power began to move his hearers; and when his uncommon sense, his profound reasoning, his clear conceptions of his subject in all its bearings, and his striking and beautiful illustrations, were with such personal qualities, were brought to the discussion of any question, his audience was enraptured, convinced, and led by the orator as if enchanted by the lyre of Orpheus.

No man was ever blessed by his Creator with faculties of a higher order than those given to Mr. Clay. In the quickness of his perceptions and the rapidity with which his conceptions were formed, he had few equals and no superiors. He was eminently endowed with a nice discriminating taste for order, symmetry and beauty. He detected in a moment everything out of place or deficient in his room, upon his person, or in his own or the dress of others. He was a skilful judge of the form and qualities of the domestic animals, which he delighted to raise or possess. I could give you instances of the quickness and minuteness of his keen faculty of observation which never overlooked anything. A want of neatness and order was offensive to him. He was particular and neat in his handwriting and in his apparel. A slovenly blot, or negligence of any sort, met his condemnation. While he was so organized that he attended to and enjoyed little things to please and gratify his taste and love for neatness, order and beauty, his great intellectual faculties grasped all the subjects of jurieprudence and politics with a power amounting almost to intuition. As a lawyer he stood at the head of his profession. As a statesman, his stand at the head of the party he can which party for nearly half a century, and polishes his title to pre-eminence among his illustrious associates.

Mr. Clay was deeply versed in all the walks of human action. He had read and studied geography and history. Shortly after I left college, I had occasion to call on him in Frankfort, where he was attending court, and well do I remember to have found him with Plutarch's Lives in his hands. No one better than he knew how to avail himself of human motives, or the circumstances which surrounded a case, or could present them with more force and effect to accomplish the object of an argument.

Mr. Clay, throughout his public career, was influenced by the loftiest patriotism. Confident in the truth of his convictions and the purposes of his purposes, he was ardent, sometimes impetuous, in the pursuit of objects which he believed essential to the general welfare. Those who stood in his way were thrown aside without ceremony. He never affected a courtesy of language to men or opinions which he thought subversive to the best interests of his country; hence he may have wounded the vanity of those who thought themselves of consequence. But certain, whatever the cause, that at the close of his life Mr. Clay might have been justified as proof that there is more truth than fable in those profound lines of the poet—

"He who ascends the mountain top shall find
Its loftiest peaks most wrapt in clouds and snow;
He who surpasses or subdues mankind
Must look down on the hate of those below.
Though far above the sun of glory glow,
And far beneath the earth and ocean spread,
Round him are icy rocks, and loudly blow
Contending tempests on his naked head,
And thus reward the toils which to those summits lead."

Calumny and detraction engulfed their waves upon him. But how glorious the change! He outlived malice and envy. He lived long enough to prove to the world that his ambition was not more than a holy aspiration to make his name the greatest, most powerful, and best monument on the earth. If he desired the highest office, it was because the greater power and influence resulting from such elevation would enable him to do more than he otherwise could for the progress and advancement—first of his countrymen, then of his whole race. The sympathies embraced all. The African and the Creole of Spanish America, the children of the ovated classic Greece—all families of men, without respect to color or clime, found in his expanded bosom and comprehensive heart a friend of their elevation and amelioration. His ambition as that is God's implantation in the human heart for raising the down-trodden portions of the earth, and fitting them for the regenerated existence in politics, in morals, and in religion.

Bold and determined as Mr. Clay was in his actions, he was, nevertheless, conservative. He did not obstinately adhere to things because they were tenable. If he could not accomplish all he contented himself with the attempt, and then turned to it. He has been the great conservator of those political agitations and quiescences which, in the belief of thousands at the present times, endangered the perpetuity of

The New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Mr. Clay was no less remarkable for his admirable social qualities than for his intellectual abilities. As a companion, he was the delight of his friends; and no man had ever better or truer. They have loved him from the beginning, and loved him to the last. His hospitable mansion at Ashland was always open to their reception. No guest ever thence departed without feeling happier for his visit. But, alas! that hospitable mansion has already been converted into a house of mourning; already has intelligence of his death passed with electric velocity to that aged and now widowed lady, who for more than fifty years bore to him all the endearing relations of wife, and whose feeble condition prevented her from joining him in this city, and soothing the anguish of life's last scene by those endearing attentions which no one can give so well as a woman and a wife. May God infuse into her heart and mind the Christian spirit of submission under her bereavement! It cannot be long before she may expect a reunion in Heaven. A nation condoles with her and her children on account of their irreparable loss.

Mr. Clay, from the nature of his disease, declined very gradually. He bore his protracted sufferings with great equanimity and patience. On one occasion he said to me that when death was inevitable and must soon come, and when the sufferer was ready to die, he did not see the wisdom of praying to be "delivered from sudden death." He thought under such circumstances the sooner suffering was relieved by death the better. He desired the termination of his own sufferings, while he acknowledged the duty of patiently waiting and abiding the pleasure of God. Mr. Clay frequently spoke to me of his hope of eternal life, founded upon the merits of Jesus Christ as a Saviour; who, as he remarked, came into the world to bring "life and immortality to light." He was a member of the Episcopalian Church. In one of our conversations he told me that, as his hour of dissolution approached, he found that his affections were concentrating more and more upon his domestic circle—his wife and children. In my daily visits he was in the habit of asking me to detail to him the transactions of the Senate that I did, and he manifested much interest in passing occurrences. His inquiries were less frequent as his end approached. For the week preceding his death he seemed to be altogether abstracted from the concerns of the world. Then he became so low that he could not converse without being fatigued, he frequently requested those around him to converse. He would then quietly listen. He retained his mental faculties in great perfection. His memory remained perfect; he frequently mentioned events and conversations of recent occurrence, showing that he had a perfect recollection of what was said and done. He said to me that he was grateful to God for continuing to him the blessing of reason, which enabled him to contemplate and reflect on his situation. He manifested during his confinement the same characteristics which marked his conduct through the vigor of his life. He was exceedingly averse to give his friends "trouble," as he called it. Some time before he knew it, we commenced waiting through the night in an adjoining room. He said to me, after passing a painful day, "perhaps some one had better remain all night in the parlor." From this time he knew some friend was constantly at hand ready to attend to him.

Mr. President, the majestic form of Mr. Clay will no more grace these halls. No more shall we hear that voice which has so often thrilled and charmed the assembled representatives of the people. No more shall we see that waving hand and eye of light, as when he was engaged unfolding his policy in regard to the varied interests of our growing and mighty republican empire. His voice is silent on earth for ever. The darkness of death has obscured the lustre of his eye. But the memory of his services—not only to his beloved Kentucky, not only to the United States, but for the cause of human freedom and progress throughout the world—will live through future ages, as a bright example, stimulating and encouraging his own countrymen and the people of all nations in their patriotic devotions to country and humanity.

With Christians there is yet a nobler and a higher thought in regard to Mr. Clay. They think of him in connection with eternity. They will contemplate his immortal spirit occupying its true relative magnitude among the myriad stars of glory in the presence of God. They will think of him as having fulfilled the work allotted to him on earth, having been recreated by divino grace, and having passed through the valley of the shadow of death, and obtained an everlasting and happy home in that house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

On Sunday morning last I was watching alone by Mr. Clay's bedside. For the last hour he had been unusually quiet, and I thought he was sleeping. In that, however, he told me I was mistaken. Opening his eyes and looking at me, he said, "Mr. Underwood, there may be some question where my remains shall be buried. Some persons may designate Frankfort. I wish to repose at the cemetery in Lexington, where many of my friends and connexions are buried." My reply was, "I will endeavor to have your wishes executed."

I now ask the Senate to have his corpse transported to Lexington, Kentucky, for sepulture. Let him sleep with the dead of that city, in and near which his home has been for more than a century. For the people of Lexington—the living and the dead—he manifested, by the last statement made to me, a pure and holy sympathy, and a desire to cleave unto them as strongly as that which bound Ruth to Naomi. It was his anxious wish to return to them before he died, and to realize what the daughter of Moab so strongly felt and beautifully expressed: "Thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God. Where thou diest will I die, and there will I be buried."

It is fit that the tomb of Henry Clay should be in the city of Lexington. In our Revolution, every first libation blood was poured out in the town of that name in Massachusetts. On it, the pioneers of Kentucky consecrated the name, and applied it to the place where Mr. Clay desired to be buried. The associations connected with the name harmonize with his character; and the monument erected to his memory at the spot selected by him will be visited by the votaries of genius and liberty with a reverence which is inspired at the tomb of Washington. Upon that monument let his epitaph be engraved.

Mr. President, I have availed myself of Dr. Watts's paraphrase of the epitaph on Thomas Parnell, with a few alterations and additions, to express in borrowed verse my admiration for the life and character of Mr. Clay, and with a heart-tribute to the memory of my illustrious colleague, I conclude my remarks:

> Born when Freedom her stripes and stars unfurled,
> When Revolution shook the startled world;
> Heroes and sages taught his brilliant mind
> To know and love the rights of all mankind.
> In life's first bloom his public toils began,
> All ages commenced the senator and man;
> In business dextrous, weighty in debate,
> Near fifty years he labored for the State.
> In every speech persuasive wisdom flowed,
> In every act radiant virtue glowed;
> Suspended factions ceased from rage and strife,
> To hear his eloquence and praise his life.
> Resistless sacred fixed the members' choice,
> Who ballot him Speaker with united voice.
> His talents ripening with advancing years—
> His wisdom growing with his public cares—
> A chosen envoy, war's dark horrors cease,
> And tides of carnage turn to streams of peace.
> Conflicting principles, internal strife,
> Slavery and slavery, disunion vice—
> All are composed by his great hand,
> And beams of joy illuminate the land.
> Patriot, Christian, husband, father, friend,
> Thy work of life achieved a glorious end!

Mr. Underwood closed by offering a series of appropriate resolutions, and was followed by Mr. Cass.

President: Again has an impressive warning come to us that in the midst of life we are in death. The labors of this frail ero suspended, and its conquered passions, as he said of old to the waves of the sea, be still. The lessons of his Providence, seen and felt, become merciful dispensations, for which now pervading sorrow though the land. Such is reminding us that we have higher duties to discharge, graver responsibilities to encounter than those we have known, when we lay our hands upon His holy word and invoke his holy name, promising to be faithful to the Constitution which he gave us in His mercy, and which only to the hour of our blindness and disorder, and of his own wrath.

A great man has fallen in our land, ripe indeed in years and in honors, but never dearer to the American heart than when called from the theatre of his services to that final bar where the lofty and the low-born all meet at last.

I rise upon this mournful occasion to indulge in no strain of panegyric. My regard for the memory of the dead, and for the obligations of the living, would rebuke such a course. The severity of truth is at once the proper duty, and our best consolation. Born during the revolutionary struggle, our deceased associate has left few remaining public men who connect the present generation with the actors in the trying scenes of that period, and whose names and deeds will soon be in the Greensboro', June 29, 1852.

Died—On 8th June, Mrs. Mary, consort of Mr. P. H. Senles, and youngest daughter of Alex. and P. Young.

She was born in Claiborne, Ala., August 24, 1823, and unrried September 10, 1845; professed religion soon after, and ever lived a consistent Christian, faithfully performing the various duties of wife, mother, daughter, sister and friend. Her death leaves a husband, three sweet little children, an aged mother and other near relatives, to mourn her loss; but they sorrow not as those having no hope, for our sister gave full evidence of Christ's power to save, even to the uttermost. Often at her bedside during her illness, which was near seven months, I inquired for her spiritual welfare; the response ever was, "I'm resigned to the will of my Father," and often in rapture exclaim, "I am happy." A few moments previous to her death she asked me to sing "Heaven, sweet heaven," after which her spirit rose to realms on high.

General Intelligence.

Explosion of the St. James!

MELANCHOLY LOSS OF LIFE!

We are again called upon to record one of those terrible disasters which so frequently occur in our vicinity, and bring desolation to the homes of so large a number of our citizens. At an early hour on Monday morning, we, in common with the community, were startled by the shocking intelligence that the steamer St. James, which has been running to Illinois and other watering places over the Lake, had blown up and burnt to the water's edge, killing and wounding a large number of her passengers.

The St. James left Bay St. Louis on Sunday night, in company with the California, having on board a large number of persons who had been spending the Fourth at that and other watering places. It is known that there were about seventy passengers, and the crew of the boat numbered over thirty.

Between two and three o'clock in the morning, when within about 15 miles of the Pontchartrain Railroad, the St. James being a short distance ahead of the California, she exploded both her boilers, making a complete wreck of the forward part of the boat, and killing and wounding a large number of the passengers and crew. The stenchions being torn away by the explosion, the whole forward deck fell down upon the boilers and machinery, whereby a large number were burned and scalded, who were not before hurt. At the time of the explosion nearly all the passengers were asleep and the scene that followed, beggars description. Capt. Clarke rushed out of his stateroom, and with Samuel Henderson, pilot, took possession of the yawl. They kept the crowd back, and permitted several ladies who were near, and Robert Smith, steersman, who had his arm broken, to enter the boat. Among the persons in the boat were Mrs. Asher and her three children. The yawl drifted about, and was struck by the California when she came up, and all on board, with the exception of one lady, were drowned. Capt. Clarke had his two little sons with him, and when requested to put them in the yawl, he refused, saying that the passengers, particularly the females, must be taken care of first. The little heroes, together with a little son of Mr. J. M. Wolf, jumped overboard and swam to the California, where they were picked up. It is said that Mr. Wolf's son endeavored to persuade his father to jump overboard, but he would not do it, and was lost. The boy had the coolness to take his clothes with him on a stick, and he dressed himself very leisurely when on board the California.

Capt. Ensign, of the California, which came up in a few minutes after the explosion, behaved most nobly. The St. James was in flames, and the California caught fire several times from being so near her.

Capt. E., however, made fast to the stern of the burning boat, ran out a plank and took off all the passengers. Capt. Clarke was the last person to leave the wreck. When the California shoved off, a boy named John Bouligny was seen running about the wreck, with nothing but the stumps of his arms left, they having been blown off. He appeared to be insane, and it was found impossible to rescue him. He was left to perish in the flames.

Dr. Ulhorn happened to be on board the California, and he, together with Dr. Pennisten, who was saved from the St. James, rendered most efficient assistance to the wounded.

The steamer St. Charles had just arrived at the Railroad when the explosion took place, and she left immediately for the scene of the disaster. The California, however, had done every thing that could be done.

The second clerk, Mr. Charles Reynolds, from whom we obtained our information relative to the unfortunate affair, says that not more than half of the passengers had registered their names. He estimates the number killed at about twenty, but others think the estimate entirely too small. Among the killed, as will be seen, is Judge Preston, of the Supreme Court of the State. His berth was directly over the boilers, and he was seen to retire. After the explosion, the place where his berth was, was observed to have been shattered in pieces. No trace of him could be discovered, and the supposition is, that he was killed instantly.

This terrible casualty, which has buried so many souls into eternity, is attributed by different persons to different causes. Some of the passengers say the boilers were defective. As usual, we presume, the true cause never will be known.

SEARCH FOR THE BODIES.

Tuesday the steamer Calliforuia having been chartered by the Mayor for the purpose, took on board Captain Vonsenes, Offer of Police, with a select body of policemen, and together with a detachment of Captain Grivet's Company of Artillery, with one six-pounder field piece, proceeded to the scene of the late explosion. Guns were fired for the purpose of raising the bodies of the drowned. After remaining until near dark, three bodies were recovered. One of a lady, about thirty years of age, and having on a dark dress; another of a female infant, aged about nine months, and the third of a young lady, aged about twenty. The bodies were brought to town and decently taken care of.

The Victims of the St. James—More Bodies Found!—The bodies of the following were found on the 6th. Of course, there were very much disfigured by the effect of the water upon them.

The "Material Aid" Moving.—It is stated in New York that M. Pulszky, Kossuth's private secretary, who sailed for Europe in the Baltic, took with him a large portion of the "material aid" collected by his master in this country, with a view of investing it in British securities subject to the Governor's control.

A Whole Family Poisoned.—The Mobile Tribune states that, on Sunday evening last, a man named Pretlove, residing at the corner of Maine and Hamilton streets, in that city, died very suddenly, and an inquiry revealed the fact that he had died from the effects of nitric acid. Mrs Pretlove, who was apparently well at the time of her husband's death, was taken sick soon after, and died during the night. A boy about ten years of age, died the next morning, and James Carroll, a brother-in-law of Pretlove's, died the following evening. All the deaths were caused by nitric acid, which is supposed by some to have been administered. Various other rumors, though, are afloat. It is altogether a most mysterious affair, and a judicial investigation should be instituted.

The Ladies Got Wet.—The Boston Bee says: About one thousand ladies who went to Dorchester, on Tuesday, the 29th ult., to attend the consecration of the new Cemetery, got thoroughly drenched in the remarkable shower that raged at that time. A friend, who was present, describes them as most sorry-looking creatures, straight, tall, slim, long-faced affairs, looking as though they were ready to enter the Cemetery in another capacity than as spectators. It was utterly impossible for them to gain shelter, and thus for two long hours they were compelled to submit to the hydropathy of heaven. Beautiful bonnets, handsome silks, fastidiously starched muslins, new and rich de laines, all were soaked, undone, ruined. The sex, so brave in dress, so beautiful in color, in one short hour lost all its poetry, all its fine sentiment, all its delicious philosophy.

Cherokee Nation.—The Cherokee Advocate says the prospect for abundant crops in the nation is highly favorable. There will be more corn than has ever before been raised in one season.

Liberal.—We learn from the Chicago Tribune that the Superintendent of the Michigan Southern railroad has notified the Ministers of the Gospel in that city that until the first of January, 1853, they will be charged only half fare on that road.

Disasters on the Western Waters.—The St. Louis Republican has published a statement showing the total number of steamboats lost, and the recorded loss of life on them, from the beginning of steam navigation in the West up to the year 1852. Boats sunk 570; of which the total tonnage was 85,238, and total original cost $7,113,040. The above statistics refer only to boats sunk by snags and other obstructions. The total number of boats destroyed by fire is 199; total original cost $2,010,554. The total number of explosions is 209, and the recorded loss of life 1,446. The number of wounded 838. The supposed pecuniary loss is put down at about $2,800,000. Estimate of persons killed by 209 explosions, averaging 11 persons to each case, 2299. Estimate of persons injured, averaging 9 to each case, 1881. Supposed total, killed and wounded, 4,180. The record of boats destroyed by collisions is somewhat incomplete. It comprises a list of 45 boats, whose original cost was $533,906.

Spiritual Rappings.—The Misses Fox have been giving an exhibition of spiritual rappings at the Varieties Theatre in St. Louis. A wardrobe was placed on the stage, near the foot-lights, and the Fays were placed in it. Mr. Field then requested the honor of a little chat with Benjamin Franklin and Shakespeare. The spirits of these distinguished individuals happened to be in an excellent humor, and they rapped away most lustily. Various other spirits afterwards signified their presence at the performance. Dr. Gland and another gentleman attempted to give their ideas on the subject of spirit rapping generally, but the democracy in the pit would not allow any lecturing, and the gentlemen were compelled to withdraw. The editor of the Union says the Misses Fox were very long dresses, and he was under the impression that he discovered, once or twice, a convulsive movement of the feet. He suggests the propriety of having a committee of ladies appointed to ascertain what part the feet perform in the rappings.

Medical College of Ohio.—The Cincinnati papers announce that the faculty in the Medical College of Ohio has recently been organized. Prof. H. W. Baxley, of Baltimore, who has for the last two sessions filled the chair of Anatomy with distinguished success, has been appointed Professor of Surgery and Surgical Anatomy, and Dr. Cobb succeeds him as Professor of Anatomy, and Dr. Drake takes the Chair of Practice.

Sugar-House Burned.—The sugar-house of Mr. John Kuhler, in West Baton Rouge, was destroyed by fire on the 4th inst. Mr. B. was insured for $12,00 in the Merchants' Insurance Company.

A Nuisance.—The Washington Republic states that the Board of Health of that city "have declared the numerous shade trees planted in various parts of that city, called the Ailanthus, (the China tree) which emits, when in bloom, so oppressive an odor, a nuisance; and, as a consequence, they will be supplanted by others less objectionable."

The Bridgewater Mineral Paint.—Our attention has been called to the large orders for this valuable article, which are daily coming in from Alabama, Mississippi, Texas, and from the interior of our own State. As we predicted when it was first introduced here, and we had witnessed the experiments made with it, this paint is coming into general use, and almost every order is accompanied with the highest testimonials as to its merits.

Martyrs of the Revolution.—An association was formed in Brooklyn, N. Y., on the 30th ult., for the purpose of removing the remains of the 11,500 martyrs of the British prison ships, now piled up beneath the Navy Yard wall in that city, to a more decent and appropriate place. It is designed to reinter these reliets on Forte Greene, (Washington Park;) and to erect a suitable monument over them, to mark the spot forever where they lie. A movement of this kind was heretofore made, but fell through from lack of energy. The character of the men who have taken it in hand now, however, is said to be a guaranty that the project will be pushed forward and finally consummated.

Collision.—The steamers Whirlwind and Paul Anderson came into collision in Cape Girardeau Bend on the 27th ultimo, by which the latter had nearly all her upper starboard works carried away.

German Immigrants.—The Cincinnati Commercial of the 1st inst. says: "Fifteen hundred German immigrants, we learn, arrived and took up their abode in this city within the past two weeks."

Cholera.—The cholera has broken out among the laborers on the Wabash and Erie canal. Many were dying.

The Daily Wisconsin says that the emigration to Western Wisconsin was never larger nor of a better class.

The second assessment of personal property in Cincinnati, city and county, gives a return of upwards of thirteen millions and a half.

It is stated that thirteen thousand cows are kept in London, confined in cellars and sheds, in various parts of the town.

There has been no rain on the island of St. Croix since November last, and the sugar crops consequently have suffered much.

There were in Boston, week before last, only 43 deaths—8 of consumption. In Philadelphia there were 196 deaths—seventeen of consumption. In NewYork there were 339 deaths—41 of consumption.

We see it stated that the phonetic system of spelling has been introduced into no less than fifty-three of the public schools of Massachusetts. Of these, twelve are in Fitchburg.

The census of France of 1851 gives one curious result. The number of women is greater than that of men! The difference is extraordinary, being nearly a million and a half. In Paris, the difference is on the other side, there being 25,000 more men than women.

James McDonald, an old man, said to be 102 years of age, applied at the Third District Station-house, Brooklyn, N. Y., on Monday night, the 28th ult., for lodgings. The Morning Journal says he lives near Boston, the had been to see his son, who is seventy-one years old, and was returning on foot to the house of his daughter, a widow, sixty-one years old, who lives half-way between NewYork and Boston.

Munroe & Francis, printers and publishers, is the oldest firm in Boston—it was formed in 1800. These two gentlemen—one seventy-seven years of age, and the other seventy-two—have lately published a volume of upwards of three hundred pages, the types for which were all "set" with their own hands. They are gentlemen of property, but pursue these habits of industry as the most agreeable manner in which they can pass the time of their "green old age."

Mowing Machines.—Great difficulty has been experienced on Long Island in obtaining laborers to carry on the usual farming processes, and large fields of grass have every season remained unmown until the hay was nearly worthless. The farmers are now beginning to use mowing machines, and it is said with perfect success. A machine cuts down ten or twelve acres of grass a day, sheering off the tangled and prostrate grass with the same dispatch as if it stood upright.

Vehicles.—A considerable advance in freights to New Orivans has taken place at St. Louis. The Evening Union of the 1st inst. says the steamer Illinois had engaged nearly a full cargo on the following terms: Flour

The New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Letter from the Rio Grande.

The steamship Texas, Capt. Thompson, arrived Wednesday, bringing dates from Brownsville to the 28th ult., and Galveston to the 31st inst. The Brownsville Flag says that the boards of Commissioners which holds sessions in each county above Brownsville, on the Rio Grande, are now at work. Two that have which left Brownsville some time since on their return to Guerrero, Mexico, have not returned, some of the stragglers died and the balance were killed by the same party whose murderous work have been recorded. Two of the men who were on the boats had returned to Brownsville, having made their escape, and report that while near the rancho Rosario, they were fired upon and driven from the boats. They report having seen one man killed, but having succeeded in escaping soon after the attack, they are unable to say how many of their companions were killed before the boats were taken. They say that after the boats were taken possession of they were conveyed to the Mexican shore of the river and ridden by their captors.

The Rio Bravo says that the party who robbed these boats was headed by the notorious Pedro Villareal, who holds a commission from Gen. Avalos. The same paper says these boats never touched on the Mexican side of the river during the trip.

The Matamoros Flag of the 8th says there is some insight into the character of the armed bands of Indians and Mexicans who have been committing the recent murders and robberies on the Rio Grande.

The Alcalde of Reynosa, alarmed and indignant at the acts of Pedro Valleral and willing to preserve the inhabitants of his jurisdiction from reprisals, wrote two official notes to Gen. Avalos, complaining and requesting that Pedro Valleral and his Indian Chief with their partizans be punished for the murder of the Texans and Mexicans. Gen. Avalos assigned not to reply to either of his letters; but the Alcalde, hearing of the renewed outrage from the citizens of Guerrero, and the robbery and destruction of their boats, advanced up on the rancho Rosario with 30 men, recruiting citizens, and came to the log fort occupied by the Indians.

Upon being ordered by him to disperse, he was defied and insulted by the Indians having a number superior force. Outside of the fort was the notorious Capt. Tijerina, with a company. The Alcalde ordered him to disperse, but he refused, threatening to molest the Indians. Tijerina and the Indians wrote to Gen. Avalos for a reinforcement, and a company of Dragoons was sent by him to their assistance. The Alcalde, seeing the collection of so large a force, demanded of the commander of his detachment under arms for the protection of the citizens of their rights, and sustaining the laws of the country; through the mediation of Col. Cruz, of the Mexican army, who happened to be passing at the time, a reconciliation took place between the people with the troops and Indians were peacefully Colonel promising to see Gen. Avalos, and endeavor to prevent further intrigues. So a civil war rests at the last advices.

PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

PARIS, June 17, 1852.

Besides the Religious Societies mentioned in my last, there are four more, which I am desirous of noticing.

THE PARIS TRACT SOCIETY

has been in existence 30 years, and is therefore one of the oldest of our Religious Societies. Since its formation, it has published 301 French, 18 Spanish, 14 German and 4 Italian tracts, besides 12 handbills, an almanack, and half a dozen volumes such as Baxter's Saints' Rest, An Appeal to Literary Men, etc. In 1850, it undertook a series of tracts for children, edited by a sub-committee, the Secretary of which is a Wesleyan local preacher. This series comprises already 14 tracts. The yearly issues of the Society have gradually increased from 80,000 copies, in 1822, to 1,030,000 copies, in 1851, and the whole of the sales and distributions from the beginning amount to about 15½ millions. The receipts have increased in the same proportion. From $800 the first year, they reached at the last anniversary $13,560, of which $5600 proceeded from sales. The expenses, however, were still larger, leaving a deficiency of $1300. Last year, there were published 16 new tracts, of which 9 belong to the childrens' series. God's blessing has rested in a very particular manner on the Society's Almanack, entitled, "The Almanac of Good Counsels." When first published, 6 years ago, 8000 copies only were printed. In 1851, 156,000 copies were required to meet the sales, and this unprecedented circulation has placed it at the head of all the French Annuals. A remarkable circumstance connected with this almanac is that in many instances colporteurs asking for a license to sell books and tracts have received it without the least difficulty, whenever it was ascertained that they intended to sell the "Almanac des bons conseils."

Among the interesting facts contained in the Report just issued, is that of two English ladies who, during 18 years' residence in Paris, have provided with tracts 630 drapers' shops, 260 eating houses, and a great number of cabmen. Many cases have been made known to these ladies, in which the tracts thus disposed of have been the means of the conversion of souls, and there is actually in Paris, studying for the ministry, a young man, formerly a very bigoted Papist, who, being assistant in a draper's shop, was brought a year ago, to the knowledge of the truth by means of one of these little messengers which the ladies just mentioned had given him.

One of our best anniversaries this year was that of the

the object of which I must explain. Whenever children are brought before the Magistrate for various offenses, they are generally acquitted, as having acted without discernment, but if they have really perpetrated the crime they are accused of, they are sent to a house of correction, to be taught and taken care of, until they attain the age of discretion. The Papists have established in France what they call colonies, 15 in number, where these young rascals are sent by government and taught agriculture, so that when they are released they are able to gain an honest livelihood. But, of course, a condition of admission in these colonies is, on the part of young Protestants, a renunciation of their communion. The Protestants have therefore founded a colony of their own at St. Foy (Gironde), and placed it under the superintendence of a very pious minister of the National Reformed Church; and the Government has consented to give up to this colony the young people of our communion who were formerly detained either in prison or in Popish colonies.

The Report stated that there were actually in the colony 46 boys and 11 girls; 17 had left during the year, having finished their time, and the reputation of the establishment is now so good, on account of the great improvement of the colonists, during their stay in the place, that they had no difficulty whatever in finding excellent situations, and the reports sent in by their employers are, except in one instance, highly favorable. Touching instances were related of the good done by former colonists, who were converted before leaving the establishment.

The colony of St. Foy is also open to vicious children, placed there by their parents. But it often happens that parents are too poor to pay the sum of $60 a year, required for the maintainance of each colonist, and many requests for admission were therefore refused last year, the committee being too poor to admit any child gratuitously. In order to meet these cases, it was proposed in the Report that bursaries of $60 each should be established. A young Wesleyan, present at the meeting, responded at once to this proposal, by announcing that he, with 9 other young men, would make up the first bursary. This example was contagious, and before the meeting broke up, 6 bursaries had been promised to the Secretary.

THE SOCIETY OF THE PROTESTANT 800 OR CENT

is of recent origin. Its object is to raise money for benevolent purposes, by establishing all over France weekly subscriptions of one cent. The sums thus subscribed are divided every six months among all the Protestant Religious Societies, each receiving a quota proportional to the receipts of the three preceding years. The receipts have this year amounted to about $3000. After the reading of the Report, a gentleman offered to give to the Society $500 as soon as 10,000 new subscribers would be found, and in answer to this a minister promised to find at once 500 new subscribers.

THE DEACONESSES' INSTITUTION

is a kind of Normal School, opened 10 years ago, for Deaconesses, or Protestant Sisters of Charity, who are there taught to visit the poor, to nurse the sick, to teach the young and to reclaim fallen females. Thirty Sisters are now in the establishment, and attend to the following branches:

1. That of the children, comprising: A "crèche," for the nursing of babes, whose mothers are obliged, through poverty, to work out of their homes, in order to gain a living; an infant school, which contains more than 120 children; a day school for girls, which averages 112 pupils, 92 of whom can read fluently; a sewing school, in which 22 apprentices, from 14 to 16 years old, are being taught sewing and house keeping; and two Sunday schools.

2. That of the sick, comprising an hospital, in which, in 1851, 77 women, 24 men and 35 children have been under treatment, 556 gratuitous consultations given, and 32 children vaccinated; 16 deaths have occurred.

3. That of the Refuge, comprising: a disciplinary, for refractory girls, from 7 to 14; it now contains 18 girls; a refuge, where there are now 12 reclaimed females; 4 have left during the year, after having been brought back to the paths of virtue, and one of them died lately, after having been the means of much good among her neighbors.

The average daily number of persons living in the institution, including the officers, the sisters, the sick, etc., has been 103. Receipts $12,200, of which $5200 are from payments of boarders, etc., and $7000 from donations and subscriptions.

Pastor Vermeil, the principal of the institution, remarked that the institutions of Sisters of Charity are of a Protestant, and not of a Popish origin, as is generally thought, for there were Protestant Sisters of Charity at Sedan, 80 years before St. Vincent de Paule established them in France. The most interesting part of the Report is that which related the happy death of a child in the infirmary, who found peace a few days before her removal, and distributed her playthings among her little friends, saying to them: "I shall not want them any more, for I am going to die, and I shall go to heaven." In the day school, a girl being asked whether she understood a verse of the Bible, which had just been explained, answered: "It isn't to understand it which is wanting, but to do it."

I think I cannot better close this enumeration of our religious associations than by the following statistics of Protestant Churches in Paris, which I was requested to prepare last week for the "Young Men's Christian Union."

National Reformed Church—5 places of worship, 11 ministers, 4 of whom are Rationalists, 7 Sunday schools.

Lutheran Church—7 places of worship, in which there is both French and German preaching, 6 ministers, 3 Sunday schools.

Presbyterian Free Church—3 places of worship, 2 ministers, 1 Sunday school.

Independants—5 chapels, 6 ministers, 3 Sunday schools.

Wesleyan Methodists—2 chapels, 2 ministers (1 French, 1 English,) 1 Sunday school.

Church of England—3 chapels, in which service is celebrated in English only; 3 ministers, 2 of whom are Tractarians.

Total, 25 places of worship for Protestants, 30 ministers, 15 Sabbath schools.

In order to understand fully the meaning of these numbers, it would be necessary to compare them with Popish statistics. But these I do not possess.

The political world is now quiet, and confidence seems to be restored, if we are to judge by the state of the funds, and by the activity given to commerce. The Imperialist aspirations attributed to Louis Napoleon are no more spoken of, and whatever be the reasons, he appears likely to remain President. Some say that he intended to become Emperor, but that a Somnambula, whom he consulted, predicted to him that he would lose all he had, if he tried to rise higher. It is much more probable that he found he would, by so doing, lose much of his popularity. The imperialist party is not a strong one in France; its daily organ, the "Public," has ceased to appear, from want of support, and the "Constitutionnel" is all but dead under the successive blows it has received from the Government for having spoken out too plainly in its favor.

I am glad to say that the dread of denunciation, which Brother X. Y. alludes to in the Advocate of May 15th, has very much ceased. In the Provinces, people begin to speak out their minds without fear of being taken up by the gendarmes, as they were some months ago. I say, in the Provinces, for liberty of speech has never been stepped in Paris. I well remember, in February, a French gentleman exclaiming aloud in a public reading room, after he had perused some newly issued decree of the President: "What a rascal that man must be!" He was not even noticed, whilst in some Departments he might have been sent to prison by some zealous Government agent, desirous of pleasing the authorities.

As the daily papers dare not, under the restrictive measures which regulate them, speak plainly on French politics, they find some difficulty in filling their columns, and they now direct the attention of the readers much oftener to literary, scientific and even religious subjects. Two of these have lately been taken up in good style by opposite papers. The first refers to the sanctification of the Lord's day. The "Univers" and other religious papers have maintained that the Government ought to interfere, so as to cause all shops to be shut, and all traffic to cease on Sundays. Emile de Girardin answered in the "Presse" that so long as these papers appeared on Monday, and thus forced their printers to work all the Sunday, they had no business to tell others how necessary it was to rest on that day. The Government settled at last the question by declaring in the "Moniteur," that the sanctification of the Lord's day was a matter of conscience, with which laws had nothing to do, and therefore the Government could only set a good example to the country by not allowing its offices to be open on that day. Orders have accordingly been given for none of the public works to be carried on on the Sabbath.

The second question is one of education, and has caused between two Bishops a scission which once more shows how vain it is for the Popish Church to pretend to unity of teaching. It is well known that Bossuet and many eminent Catholic writers have allowed the Latin and Greek authors of Paganism to be used in clerical colleges. This the "Univers" has declared to be a sin, adding that to the reading of heathen authors is to be attributed the immorality and infidelity reigning in many colleges which are in the hands of the Romish clergy. But such is not the opinion of the Bishop of Orleans, M. Dupanloup, a well known educator, who has just published a mandate, in which he positively declares the use of heathen classics compatible with Christianity, anathematizes the "Univers" for thinking otherwise, and forbids his Curates from reading, or subscribing to, that paper. Whilst the political papers have taken the matter in hand, I suppose the Pope will have to interfere between the two Bishops, and he probably will settle the question, as he did some months ago, when the Bishop of Chartres and the Archbishop of Paris had a quarrel together, by saying that the one is right, and the other is not wrong. Both will submit to this decision, and the unity of Popery will be proclaimed again for the millionth time.

ABRAHAM AND LOT.

"Abraham dwelled in the land of Canaan, and Lot dwelled in the cities of the plain, and pitched his tent toward Sodom."

Come, then, let us enter in for a little to this lone tent of Abraham upon the mountains, and observe whether, after all, it be not a beautiful dwelling for an immortal soul. Consider for a moment what were the elements which constituted the happiness of that dwelling in Canaan.

First, there was that sweet solace of an approving conscience—that sense of well doing which comes like a heavenly atmosphere to the reposing soul; and there was that delightful anticipation of becoming so pre-eminently a blessing to his family and to the world. His household being trained in the pure faith; his child reared into manhood in close intercourse with God; his whole race, in the lapse of eighty generations, receiving as the result of his faithfulness the offer of a Bible, a Gospel, a Saviour, a Heaven! O, what was the dignity of Sodom's prince compared with that most illustrious greatness of the father of the family whence Messiah sprung! And that Abraham had an eye upon these remote results of his faith and faithfulness, who can doubt? Who does not perceive that in the touching transaction on Moriah Abraham saw as in a vision the sacrificial atonement of the Lamb of God!

But not only in memory, and the charm of an approving conscience, and the rich anticipation of blessing a world, dwelt the secret of Abraham's happiness. He enjoyed even in the present ineffable delights. His was a daily, hourly intercourse with God. Whether Jehovah assumed, in his communion with the patriarch, a visible form, it is not for us to conjecture. We look forward with delight to hear the story of that sojourn in Canaan from Abraham's lip. Till then, we can only bid you come in and behold the unspeakable gladness and glory that breaks out in this tent on the mountain. And wonder not, O, wonder not, for Jehovah, the great God whose hand hath stadded yon firmament with sparkling gems—even God dwelleth with Abraham.

Behold the patriarch at his tent door, as the cool shadows of evening lengthen along the plains below. See, his eye is lifted from the beautiful landscapes of earth, and searching the azure vault, as if in sensible and seen realities! What looks he for? For the coming out of the first star of eventide to its place in heaven? No, no. Let the Apostle answer: "He is looking for a city which hath foundation, whose builder and maker is God." His faith is "the substance of things hoped for." Who doubteth that visions, akin to those of the exile of Patmos, are granted ante him? Those hills of Canaan reach far up into heaven. Abraham's tent was pitched in view of the eternal city; visions of its glorious gates—voices from its immortal harmonies are his at times.

The patriarch did well to pitch his tent in Canaan. What have earth's vaunted cities to match with it? That rude tabernacle around the mountains—it is like the home of the whole hearted Christian in all later time. It is filled with immortal gladness—it is the scene of more than earthly affection—it stands on heights above the soarings of earth's storm-clouds—it is the point of all the world nearest the realities of the celestial city—the inhabitant seeth shapes of glory, and heareth sounds of immortal music.

The tent of the patriarch is nobler than the palace of a king; for the name of its baptism is Bethel. It is the waiting chamber of the redeemed spirit, ere it enter the shining circles of an immortal world. It is the house of the Almighty God—it is the gate of an eternal heaven.

And now we turn to Sodom—verily this house of Lot looks nobly—lofty in its architecture, and rich in its adornment; golden vessels upon its board, voluptuous couches in all its chambers, the red light beaming mellowed through its mighty halls, and instruments of rare music in its sumptuous parlors.

At first view, it seemeth wise in Lot to have turned from Canaan's sojourn, and pitched his tent toward Sodom. But let us enter in for a moment, and perceive whether, after all, Sodom be as blest a home as Canaan. Behold that wrinkled man, with his head upon his clenched hand, as if bowed down with the burthen of mighty Sodom. Ah, it is Lot! He is not happy in Sodom. Do you ask the secret of this unhappiness? it is that which at all times gathers over the home of all wordly minded Christians. First of all, Lot was despised even by the Sodomites. Just as a clear sighted world always despise a half-hearted professor, who, forgetful of his covenant vows, comes to mingle with them in worldliness. Wicked men see clearly in this matter. They perceive inconsistencies of profession and practice. And just as wordly men despise a traitor, though they may have been advantaged by his treachery, so do they, while mingling in the society of wordly Christians, despise them in their heart for their worldliness. The men of Sodom said in their contempt, "This fellow came in to sojourn with us, and now he will needs be a judge," and they pressed upon him to destroy him. Lot was not at home in Sodom—he felt like a stranger. Then, again, he lost his property. Just as God will take away earthly idols; so that verily the way to grow in earthly comforts is to grow in grace. God sent against Sodom the kings of the East, and they conquered the cities of the plain, and carried away the riches of all its inhabitants, and left Lot beggared of all the flocks and herds wherewith he had descended from Canaan.

Moreover, there was constantly busy in the heart of the Patriarch the fierce stings of a reproving conscience. God will not let alone a wordly minded disciple to rest contented in his apostasy. Says Inspiration: "Lot was vexed with the filthy conversation of the wicked." He saw sights and heard sounds in Sodom, that stirred up the depths of bitter thoughts within him, as the hurricane stirs up the ocean.

Then, too, his dear children were forming intimacies with the foul sinners of the plain; and they would not come when the fire was kindled on his household altar. They were away where, with foul rites, and dance and song, there went on the beastly worship of the heathen. Tell me, ye parents, who will go amid the vanities of a false and perilous world, and think it due to the courtesies of refined life to mingle in those scenes of fashionable gaiety, where God is as little thought of as he was in Sodom; tell me, if seeing your children, as they are this day, given up to vanity, ye cannot understand the poignancy of Lot's sorrow at that awful thought. But, alas! alas! we are as yet on the outskirts of the Patriarch's sorrow. The winding up of that startling drama of worldliness on a Christian is alike rapid and horrible. The story is too peculiar to need repetition. Just at the time when, worn out with the bitterness of a conscience stricken life, Lot was looking to the grave for repose; just then came the awful mission to Sodom—"Up, up; get ye out of this city, for I will destroy it." But cried the old man; "O, not so, my Lord. Behold I am old; I cannot escape to the mountains, lest some evil befall me." "Well, then, if you stay, you perish—up—up; escape for thy life; stay not in all the plain; look not behind thee, lest thou be consumed." Now, the home of Sodom begins to lose its voluptuous beauty—verily, the rosy cloude that curtained it at sunset, are burning with the fire of the wrath of God. Behold the patriarch fleeing to his son-in-law at midnight perhaps, in weeping anguish, as they will not come forth unto his deep entreaties. See him fleeing forth in the dim night, leaving home, property and plenty, and rushing toward the mountains for life—then wearied, all friendless and poor, in his rude dwelling above Zoar.

Once more behold him upon the shore of that dark water, which covers the devastated plains of Siddim—that wild, gloomy, desolated expanse of lifeless billowe—whose name is Asphaltites—the Lake of Death—upon the border of that sluggish, festering gulf, standing an old and withered wanderer, all alone. Come near, and note him well. How that old heart is wrung with mighty anguish! and why? Because, far down amid those sluggish waters there lie, burnt into ashes by an angry God, smitten down in the vigor of beauty—his beloved dead. See how his bosom is heaving with the agony of a broken heart. Listen to his voice in its tremulous anguish! "O, my children! my children! who perished because I would not dwell in Canaan! Would God—would God, I had died for you!" And see, now! he turns away from that dark water, and retires slowly along the plain. But, what ails him? What hath met him on the way? Why, it looketh like a human form—and yet it does not. It speaks not—cold—stony—statue like—a pillar, a monument of salt!

How the old man trembles! how he casts himself upon the cold ground in agony! And who wonders? The wife of his bosom, the partner of his home for many a long year, the mother of his children, the beloved one whose dear voice had cheered him all along life's pathway, smitten down by divine anger because he would not love and dwell in Canaan. Hark to his agonizing, his heart-broken cry, "O beloved one! O lost one! Lost by my unfaithfulness, lost for ever! Would God I had died for thee!"

Now here I want to leave you. You that, having professed Christ, are living lives of wordliness, seeking its riches and honors and pleasures, and not making it the supreme end of your lives to glorify Good and save souls. Here I want to leave you, by the poor, cold, cavern bed of heart-broken and homeless Lot; while afar in the distance, with heaven's softest sunshine on its beautiful repose, rich too in earthly goods of flock and herd, and the fragrance of its accepted sweetness ascending the sunny firmament, ye catch the matchless loveliness of the habitation where Abraham dwelled.

Here we leave you, praying that visions of the sadness and sorrow of the desolated patriarch shall so force themselves upon your spirit, that, firm in the strength of your great Deliverer, ye shall look away from all the solicitations of sinfulness, assured that it is better even in this world to love God with a whole spirit, as it was well for Abraham that he dwelt in Canaan, and most sorrowful for Lot when he pitched his tent toward Sodom.

The Succession of Christ's Ministry.

JUDAS ISCARIOT.

BRO. MCTYEIRE:

The aspect in which the character of Judas is considered varies, as the opinions of Christians upon other theological questions happen to differ. With the differences prevailing in the Arminian and Calvinistic schools, with regard to the son of perdition, I do not now design to interfere.

I propose, with your permission, at some length, to consider the character of Judas in connection with the question of the Apostolic succession. The argument founded upon the case of the wicked Apostle, is one of the main spokes in the wheel of prelatical succession, and as I do not remember ever to have seen a full expose and refutation of the reasons which are drawn from the case of Judas to sustain the cause of the Apostolic succession, I design to address myself to that task in what is to follow.

You can scarcely lay your hand upon a work upon the subject under discussion, that does not contain some allusion to the case of Judas.

It is incumbent upon the advocates of Apostolic succession, (and it is a duty they manifest a ready aptitude to discharge,) to maintain that the virtue communicated from the Apostles to their successors, in those instances where the chain of ordination in unbroken descent is preserved, looses none of its efficacy, even if one of the successors of the Apostles should happen to be a devil. And their reliance is upon the case of Judas.

They contend that Christ's promise to be "always" with his Apostles means that he will be with them, if they are in the line of regular ordination, in power to impart divine unction to all upon whom they may impose their hands, whatever may be their private character; that in the imposition of hands the Holy Ghost descends not in virtue of the merit of the recipient, or of the personal holiness of the Minister, but exclusively in virtue of the divine promise of the Savior: "that the strength of this chain is just that of our Savior's promise," and that hence a devil, as in the case of Judas, can impart the divine unction as well as a saint; "that it would seem as if one reason for numbering Judas in that ministry was to teach to the latest time the momentous truth that man's wickedness cannot make void the work of God." And they rely upon the case of Judas.

In the first place, we desire to say that whatever support may be found for the theory in other portions of the Scripture, it can derive none from the case of Judas. Judas never received the commission to preach the Gospel, or to ordain Ministers. Strange and unaccountable as it may appear, the advocates of Apostolic succession appear wholly to have overlooked this momentous consideration. It is to be borne in mind that Apostolic succession doctors predicate their claim upon the promise of Christ to his Apostles, or upon what they call the "Apostolic commission," but they are extremely careful to forget that Judas was not an Apostle when the "Apostolic commission" was given. What application, we would be glad to be informed, can a promise of Christ "to be with" eleven Apostles, who were holy men, have to another person who was, when the commission was given, not an Apostle, but a "devil," and in his grave?

Is it not therefore preposterous for sensible men to contend that because Judas was a bad man, and was once one of Christ's followers and Apostles, or Bishops, but by transgression had fallen, that therefore a promise subsequently made, to be with his true disciples to the end of time in ministrations of spiritual power, by impartation of the Holy Ghost, Christ promised to be with such men as Judas? The argument might have some show of reason in it, if the promise had been made while Judas was an Apostle, or if the promise had specially included Judas and men like him. Judas was never a Minister of the Gospel, or of the Christian dispensation. He had hanged himself previous to the death of Christ, and it was the shed blood of Christ that constituted the seal of the Gospel. When Peter opened the doors of the Gospel Judas had been dead many days.

The whole superstructure of Apostolic succession is based upon the ground that Christ's promise, or commission to be with his Apostles and their successors, does not have respect to the question of the holiness of the Ministry. Its advocates know, if holiness is regarded by Christ as an essential qualification of a Bishop, whatever position they may occupy in the visible Church, and that such was the law of the Christian system, it would be easy to prove that many breaks had occurred in the succession line. If the chain is broken, the system is broken. You see at once the value of the supposed case of Judas. If it be proven that Christ selects and calls his own ministry, and selects and calls none but holy men, and his promise is to be only with his ministry, then, every wicked man, and every devil like Judas, that had been thrust into the office by men like themselves, and who were in the line of ordination between present ministers and Christ's immediate Apostles, would constitute a clean break in the line, and the theory would fall to the ground. And there it ought to fall and there it ought to lie, because it is the establishment of another Gospel.

No historical facts are more indisputable than that Bishoprics of the highest order have been sold backwards and forwards for mere money—have been bestowed as rewards of licentiousness, have been the fruits of successful popular insurrection, have been procured by violence, have been bestowed by fraud and villainy, and have been granted by the hand of hoary iniquity upon infants of ten years of age, without sense, and upon women without virtue.

McCaulay doubts, we are aware, whether Juan was a Pope, but McCaulay is not upon all points the very best historical testimony. But to our argument the question is immaterial. No historical fact is more indisputable than that some of the Popes have been the most licentious of men, wicked in every sense of the word, with whom the character of Judas would be compared favorably. Judas would not suffer by the comparison. The great extenuation for the crime of Judas is that he died before the shower of Pentecostal fire. Peter was unfaithful before, but never afterwards.

Now, if wickedness that caused Judas to fall, in the dispensation preceding the Gospel proper, be cause, in the law of the Gospel, to cut a party off from the unction and divine virtue which are to come through the hands of the Apostles, then the theory is gone for ever.

Hence it is that they affirm that "nowhere in the Scriptures do we see it hinted that Judas's ministrations were the less valid, his preaching the less successful, his authority the less ample," the ordinations of men like Judas less unctious, "than the like services of those who are Apostles in heart as well as in name."

Bishop Mellvaine says that "the prejudice that arises against such an idea will not bear a moment's reflection. If it is sprung from a comparison as to personal character and fitness of the modern successors, with the first in the chain, be it remembered that Judas Iscariot was numbered with the Apostles by the Savior himself, and Judas was a traitor." But, my dear Bishop, will you please to remember that Judas never received the Apostolic commission at all. If you compare the personal character and fitness of the modern successors, (some of whom we hear of in this country, but whose names we forbear to mention,) with the first in the chain, (excluding Judas, of course, for he never was in the chain,) you will readily perceive an astounding distinction.

We agree with Bishop Mellvaine, and with the whole league of Apostolic succession doctors, who sing to the same time, that our Savior numbered Judas with the Apostles, and that he was a traitor—that Judas preached and performed miracles, healed the sick and cast out devils. But how does that help his cause. His chain begins with the "Apostolic commission. Judas was then suffering the reward of his guilt. He was then dead and buried, and his soul was in the land of spirits.

It is sometimes objected against our Church that Dr. Adam Clark maintained the position of the possibility of the salvation of Judas, upon the ground of his repentance. But it should be remembered that the opposite opinion is maintained by names in the Methodist Church not a whit behind Dr. Clark in eminent ability and sound judgment. I allude to William Winans. But however the point may be settled, Dr. Clark is only a very learned and very eminent commentator in the Methodist Church. Because Dr. Clark indulges in a vagary—a common error with great men—supposing his opinion to be a vagary, and with regard to it I pronounce no opinion, it is no reason why the Methodist Church has not a valid Ministry.

But can nothing be urged in defence of Judas. Upon what ground is St. Peter's apostasy excused? Upon the ground of his repentance and the other ground that he had not been "baptized with the Holy Ghost." The Apostles "whom he (Christ) had chosen," as we are informed in the Acts of the Apostles, were directed to remain in Jerusalem and "to wait for the promise of the Father," for that "John truly baptized with water, but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost." Judas was never baptized with the Holy Ghost as were the eleven Apostles. If he transgressed, he transgressed under a dark dispensation, under the dispensation of water baptism—under the dispensation that looked to Christ in his bodily presence. But how is it with the wicked Bishops of the present day? They live under the Gospel, or Holy Ghost dispensation. You may look in vain for any Judas among the eleven, or among the twelve Apostles, who were such under the promise of Christ to be always with the Apostles of the completed Gospel of salvation to the end of time.

But what is the promise? It is to be with his Apostles and with their successors. I believe that Christ is now with the successors of the Apostles. But this is nothing in aid of the theory of the Apostolic succession doctrine. That theory makes Christ's promise stretch much farther than a promise to be with his Apostles and their successors. It makes the promise mean that he will not only be with the successors, but be, through them, with other persons also—to pass through them, to pass from them, at their bidding. This is doing very great violence, as well as very great injustice to the promise. When Christ promises to be with his Apostles, the promise is fulfilled when he is with them. His promise does not extend any further. He does not promise that he will pass through the Apostles upon other Apostles. This He does directly, this is His office. This is the mistake the doctors of the Protestant Episcopal Church make. They are not content to have Christ with them in the baptism of the Holy Ghost and with fire, which has been promised by Christ, but they wish the Holy Ghost to pass through them upon other parties. They make themselves indispensible mediums. That is, they are assuming the awful prerogatives of Christ Jesus himself as the Melchisedec and High Priest of the Gospel sanctuary. Can any assumption be more terrific? It makes the very blood of my heart tingle with horror. Is the promise of Christ to be with his Apostles and their successors not enough to satisfy the utmost cravings of the heart of man, without his desiring that Christ should restrict himself to passing the blessing from himself upon other parties about to become successors indirectly through an existing priesthood? If Christ's promise means that he is with the successors of the Apostles, how can that promise be stretched to mean that he will pass the blessing through them upon other parties who may be about to become successors by ordination. It cannot, without violence being done to plain language. Christ's promise, upon their own showing, is to be with his Apostles, and his successive Apostles, throughout all succeeding time. Is he [illegible] word? If you doubt it, inquire of his Apostles—inquire of a succeeding Ministry—ask them: Do you feel that Christ Jesus is formed in you the hope of glory? Do you know your Redeemer liveth? Does your cup overflow with Christian affection? Does a constraining love impel you into action, or are you moved by other considerations? Are you born again into Christ's spiritual kingdom? Are you freed by Christ from the power of sin and Satan? Do you walk in the light? Are you ready to be offered up? If any one of Christ's Apostles or Bishops can answer these questions affirmatively, then, and not till then, can they know that Christ has fulfilled his promise, and is with [illegible]. There are living Bishops, doubtless, in the Protestant Episcopal Church, who can answer these questions affirmatively. Then, Christ is as good as his word. They are in the succession.

Gatherings—"Macedonian Call," by D. K.

I was glad to see the article above in your paper, (No. 65) and would echo the call to brethren in those Conferences that have many, and some to spare. The disciples would, doubtless, have delighted to tarry in Jerusalem, but a persecution scattered them; and Paul, when the call came over from Macedonia, had just founded a Church; but the cry was one for life, and he went.

We have only forty-three itinerant preachers in our list of appointments, and [illegible] one is a President of a College, one the registrator of the Land Office, and some others are so situated as to render themselves unable to take any work that the Bishops might assign them. I suppose we have about 35 who devote their whole time and talents to the preaching of the Gospel. Thirty-five soldiers of the Cross to conquer Louisiana, and bring her people under the peaceful reign of the Lord Jesus Christ! How feeble the instrumentality for such a mighty and glorious work. We want French missionaries for the State more than they do in California.

Many of the French would gladly come to hear one who could preach to them in their own language. If any desire to know whether this State supports its preachers, whether their families will be kindly provided for—I answer, unhesitatingly, that when a preacher does his duty and his whole duty, the Louisianians [illegible] with cheerfulness. Many places have preaching only once in two or four weeks, and there are places now, on circuits, that would gladly support station preachers if there were a sufficient number among us to make these places stations. Now don't come because you think you can be better supported here; but admitting that our people do support their preachers, come to win souls to heaven's eternal bliss.

OUR CHURCH STEWARDSHIP.

The question has been raised in many minds—What is to be done with the money coming to the Church South, from a division of the capital of the Book Concerns at New York and Cincinnati. The cautious saw—not to count the chickens before the eggs are hatched—may be in place here. Yet all the eggs can not turn out addled. We are approximating the close of the suits, and a considerable amount of funds must fall to our share. What is to be done with it? We do not presume to answer so grave a question, even to our own satisfaction, and rest in comfortable assurance upon others' wisdom.

A writer discusses this matter in the South-western Quarterly with modesty and ability. Alluding to and lamenting the unfortunate necessity of the "Church suits," he says:

"Although we of the Church South, in the performance of our duty toward God and man, were not at liberty to waive the contest and resign our rights, yet their successful assertion will lay us under high responsibilities and obligations, which we may not with impunity disregard or treat lightly. Should we succeed, talents will thus be committed to us, which we shall not have a right to use according to caprice, or mere pleasure or interest; but which we shall be bound to use according to our ability, for the glory of God and the good of His Church. Hence we should weigh the subject very maturely; first, because of our obligations for the right performance of duty: and secondly, because only a proper commencement promises a proper prosecution of the object. An error in the beginning will naturally lead to errors, and perhaps insurmountable difficulties, in the progress of our purposes."

It is taken for granted that the Church, South, looks for this settlement to adopt a permanent Book Concern policy. She will, in some proper location, have a publishing house—a real affair of brick and mortar. There her literature will be supervised and furnished to the world in purity, suitableness and abundance. The agents who have had this interest in hand since our organization, have, under the circumstances, done admirably well, but it has not been deemed by them or others that the present arrangements were either permanent or perfect.

The writer of the article alluded to argues favorably for publishing well and publishing cheap. The idea of taxing religious literature is, we believe, growing into disfavor with the entire Church. It pays enough if it pays its own way. Let it go at cost: its return will swell the funds of benevolence more than a direct tax upon its issues. Books circulated with the facility of cheapness may unlock the hearts of hundreds, enlighten them as to duty, and lead their souls to God, made ready for every good word and work. And all these results are not cut off by the miserable penny of profit upon it, confining it to a limited circulation, or laying it up on the shelf. Surely we are prepared for a more liberal policy.

There is a mercantile necessity for this course. We shall be forced to it by competition. On this we make another extract:

"Every intelligent man must perceive that to maintain and increase the influence which, as a Church, we ought to possess, we must furnish, in this reading age, as large a share as possible and a larger than we have hitherto done, of the literature both standard and current, miscellaneous and periodical, of the country. And to do this, we must complete with others in the cheapness of our books and periodicals and also their internal value as well as cheapness. But this we can not do under the old plan, in a large class of the friendly religious publications of the day; and they having such influence, we shall, on a scheme of profit directly on the books published by us, be thrown out, and others will monopolize the whole field."

As for the location we of course will not obtain it for NewOrleans, or Mobile, or Montgomery, or Vicksburg—not think of it; only ask a Depository, which long patience and destitution ought to entitle us to.

As to the collecting of the Book Concern, that is to be, we may be allowed to hope that the Church will not detail any of her ministry for this. It is unfair to them and herself. It is a work and hard work that we can not be persuaded falls legitimately within their calling. Our repugnance is increased if in the new Concern the old plan is to be kept up, which expects them to make money as well as books—money for what purpose soever, be it for Bishops, worn out preachers or widows.

Let these be fed from the Altar as before. Their claims lie against the altar and should be met there.

As far as deriving a revenue is concerned we hold it that the Church has as much business in running a steamboat, as carrying on a publishing house. Perhaps as a money-making business the former investment would pay better. How would this placard look:

"Up for the Methodist steamboat. Strictly temperance; no bar kept, no Sunday travel. Rev. Dr. A. Captain; Rev. Dr. B. 1st Clerk, Rev. Dr. C. 2d Clerk, Rev. D. Mate. All General Conference officers! As an inducement to all friends and members to patronize this Concern, be it understood that the profits are appropriated to the support of the Bishops, the deficient preachers, the superannuated ones, and the widows and orphans of such as have died in the work."

Let no body wonder. Mutato nomine, etc.

The first preachers considered it out of their way even to distribute money to the Church benefactories, and this business was assigned to others; but our brethren are set to making it. It is grievous that such service be imposed on them, while their vows as preachers rest on them also with all their force. We would rather see no Book Concern in the South, than to see incarcerated within its walls men fit for Bishops, the Pauls and Apolloses of the Church.

Here is an inside view of 200 Mulberry street. The description we take from the correspondence of the Western Ch. Advocate. Reader, think of these mens' call to the ministry, their ordination, their strong cries and tears in calling sinners to repentance, and then think on their employment as this writer describes it with utmost naïveté:

"The New Book Agents.—The regular visitors at 200 Mulberry street, New York, on entering the office of the agents, as they are accustomed to do, will be struck with the change that has taken place in its occupants. They have been so used to seeing father Lane, as he was familiarly called, sitting, with his calm and pleasant face, in his large and well-cushioned leather-chair, opening letters, and handling great piles of bank notes, that they instinctively draw back on finding, not only that he is not there, but that some one else is occupying his chair with entire self-possession, reading his letters, and counting over his money. When I visited the Book Concern for the first time after the General Conference, I walked into the office scarcely thinking of the new agents, and I must confess the impression was somewhat odd. The old gentleman was not there; and in his seat sat a large, good-looking stranger, apparently about forty-five years of age, with a dark, bilious complexion and crow-black hair. This, I soon learned, was the senior Agent, Brother Carlton. In all respects he seems unlike his predecessor. Instead of that quiet manner which made father Lane almost a fixture in his room, there is a restlessness about the present incumbent that keeps him constantly in motion—yet I should not say he is a fidgety person. He comes to his responsible post with the reputation of being one of the most accomplished financiers in the Church, and a thorough man of business. If I do not misjudge him, he will, in less than a month, know all the ropes, large and small, in this vast Concern. He will see into all the corners and by-places of the establishment, and his restless energy will be felt in every department of the business. He seems to have slipped into his place with so much ease, and takes every thing so coolly and with so little embarrassment, you would think he had been born to the business. Of the junior agent I can not as yet speak, not having had the pleasure of seeing him at his post."

How do you like the view? Counting over his money! Accomplished financiers! Thorough man of business! Finding out all the ropes, large and small, of this vast Concern! These ropes in place of his gospel trump. Poor Brother Carlton; well you might be fidgetty. They have got Sampson at the sand mill. No doubt you are a good pastor, can preach well, and set a district in a blaze; but hold those useless qualities in abeyance now—a "thorough man of business" is wanted. Count that money; sustain your financial reputation there; know those ropes, large and small; and may you come out as you went in—with "crow-black hair."

We put the question—What right, what propriety in the Church commanding her ministers to such posts? Besides the labors of a theological editor, we can see no demand for any but mere business qualifications at such posts. "It is not reason" that ministers should leave the word of God to serve these tables. And when the Church, South, selects officers for her Book Concern, we trust she will look out among her laymen men of honest report and wisdom to appoint over this business, and permit the preachers to give themselves "continually to prayer and to the ministry of the Word."

THE WAY OPEN.—The Convention of Louisiana have, with great unanimity, left out of the new Constitution the clauses forbidding "ministers of any sect" being members of the Assembly, Governor or Lieut. Governor. This is well. We suppose there will be no great rush, now the way is opened, to these high places, but this may be left with the persons concerned. If they choose to abide in their own high calling, and not aspire after civil honors, their rights as citizens should nevertheless stand acknowledged. We accept this acknowledgment of our honorable legislators.

ANN THEM UP.—Recently a missionary collection of $1200 was raised in Washington St. Church, Petersburg, Va. The following is a table of amounts raised for several successive years by this Congregation: In 1842, $223, in 1844, $500, 1845, $600, 1847, $530, 1848, $500, 1849, $500, 1850, $521, 1851, $839, 1852, $1200.

THE LOUISVILLE DEPOSITORY.—The card of Dr. Stevenson highly concerns the traveling preachers. The terms are favorable, and we feel confident he will do his best for them.

WESTERN CHURCH SUIT. We learn from exchanges that the arguments in this case have been closed in Columbus, O. The court reserves a decision till October. The line of argument pursued in the New York case was adopted without any material deviation.

PRINCETON COLLEGE.—At the late commencement, June 30, the degree of A. B. was conferred on a graduating class of 75. The honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred on the Rev. David Brown, of Glasgow, Scotland; and on the Rev. Robert L. Stanton, President of Oakland College, Mississippi.

Dr. Latta, author of the "Chain of Sacred Wonders," and formerly editor of the Methodist Expositor, died in Cincinnati, O., on Sabbath the 27th ult. His disease was apoplexy.

The numbers of students at Oberlin College, is between six and seven hundred, exclusive of theological students, and one thousand are expected next year.

The Uss of Hymn Books.

They are intended for use, and not their looks. It seems to us a good worshipper would as soon start to the Church or social meeting without his hat as his hymn book. But this would convict some of not being good worshippers.

It may be that the Methodist usage of lining hymns has led to this neglect of the hymn book. So it is, the hymn book is too much neglected. In a large congregation, hardly one in ten has a copy in hand. It is a good book to read at home, to study. Few poetical collections are better for the soul of taste and piety. The mind is instructed, indoctrinated, by its even and delightful flow of numbers, with a well digested system of theology; and devotional feelings, otherwise unutterable, find expression there.

The want of edification and spirit in our congregational singing is largely attributable to this neglect of the hymn book. When the selection of hymns is confined to the few that are "known by heart," there can be no variety, no choice and aptness of subjects. The monotonous round is repeated and repeated till the strain becomes dull, and the best hymns and songs are worn threadbare.

Our collection has hundreds of hymns in it never sung in certain congregations. If any one should, perchance, in a social meeting, fall upon any of these, be it ever so fitting to the occasion, he is doomed to perform a solo. The bookless majority are silent—they know not the strain, and how can they join? But there are, say half a dozen familiar ones, used more or less on all occasions. Among these is one, a single verse of which is, alas, too often appropriate on account of the lifeless formality caused by this lack of variety:

"In vain we tune our formal songs,
In vain we strive to rise;
Hosannas languish on our tongues,
And our devotion dies."

MARIANA, FLA.—The Pastor has forwarded us a fuller account of the work of God at this place, noticed a few weeks ago. Under date of 6th July, he writes:

"We have enjoyed one of the most powerful revivals that ever swept through this community. Mariana has heretofore had preeminence abroad in wickedness. God has revealed himself in a most remarkable manner in our midst. The work commenced on the 6th ult., and has continued with slight intermission to the present time. The revival has been characterized by deep and abiding feeling throughout all ranks of society. It is not distinguished by number so much as by the character of the subjects of the work. About 30 have been added to the fold of Christ. Many have been reclaimed. Old difficulties have been removed, harmony reestablished, and concert and unanimity of action secured. The spirit of God is at work through this entire region of country. Revivals are springing up in all directions. God deepen and widen the feeling until the millennium dawns."

GREENSBORO, ALA.—The Pastor, Rev. A. H. Powell writes, June 30: "We have closed a protracted meeting of 3 weeks, resulting in much profit: backsliders were reclaimed, the Church quickened and souls converted."

WARRINGTON, FLA.—Rev. G. L. Crosby, L. P., gives us an account of Church extension in this interesting portion of Florida:

"Our Church affairs here are tolerably flourishing. We now have a Church of over 60 members, with a stationed preacher, Bro. Peavy. Bro. Stanley, of the Ga. Conference, is Chaplain in the U. S. Navy-yard. Bro. Capers, (a brother of Bishop Capers,) local Minister, is with us as a Teacher, and I have a select School in the Navy-yard, so that Methodism rears her head from the dust. Two years since we had hardly a Church, and neither preacher nor meeting-house."

MISSIONARY COLLECTIONS, ALA.—Rev. C. S. Hurt closes a business letter with this information:

"The preachers on the Tuskegee Circuit are doing well in their missionary collections. At some of the appointments they have not done what was done last year, while at others they have far surpassed. They strike for the banner again. We expect a good collection in this (the Montgomery) Circuit, say four to five hundred dollars. If you want a large collection, be certain to aim high, that is make large calculations."

DONATION.—The sum of $5 has been sent us by Rev. Z. Thompson, from Mrs. S. Chaney, to be forwarded to Rev. D. W. Lewis, to buy "Choctaw Testament." Our Indian brother has high claim upon us, and we shall be glad to forward other favors of this sort.

PRIMITIVE METHODISTS, ENGLAND.—The annual Conference of the Primitive Methodist Connection assembled in Sheffield, June 2d, and after devotional exercises, proceeded to the discharge of its important duties. The members of Conference represented the various districts at home and the missions abroad. By prayerful investigation it was ascertained that the state of the connection was on the whole satisfactory and encouraging. The number of members was reported at 109,984, and the increase for the year 1203. The number of traveling preachers was reported at 560; of local preachers, 0350; of class leaders, 6632; of connectional chapels, 1723; of rented chapels and rooms, etc., 3595; of Sabbath schools, 1463; of scholars, 118,468; and of gratuitous teachers, 22,398. The Great De Forest prize, the largest ever awarded in Yale College, has been assigned to Homer B. Sprague, of East Douglas. It is a massive gold medal, of the value of $100, given to the best writer and speaker of the senior class, which this year numbers ninety-three members.

A Scotch political economist being asked the meaning of metaphysics, explained it as follows: "When a party, who listens, dinna ken what the party who speaks means, and the party who speaks dinna ken what he means himself—that is metaphysics."

METHODIST PRESS.

STUDIES ON SLAVERY.—We noticed some months ago, favorably, this book, whose authorship is located in Louisiana. A writer in the Memphis Advocate says of the author:

"Mr. Fletcher is a native of New Hampshire. He was reared up and educated in the midst of the opponents of slavery, and it may fairly be presumed that his early prejudices were all on that side of the question. He has, however, studied the subject in the midst of slaves, and studied it like a Christian and philosopher. Throughout the whole work there are signs of a deep reverence for the Bible and Bible truth, which clearly shows that he is not a man to espouse doctrines which the Bible condemns. There is, moreover, abundant evidence that he has studied the Scriptures with a degree of industry and intelligence which would do credit to any professed theologian. He has studied them, too, in the languages in which they were originally written, and shows himself capable, from his thorough acquaintance with these languages, of giving to them a proper construction. By carefully connecting one portion of Scripture with another, and with other eminent writings, and thus showing the various shades of meaning in different words and phases, he gives the reader a full opportunity to judge of the correctness of his interpretations."

APOSTOLICAL SUCCESSION.—Our neighbor of the Banner says: "Bishop Odin, with a host of priests and nuns, is in the country to take it as by storm;" and assuming the succession dogma to be the foundation of all the errors of the Romish Church, he levels his editorial ordunnce against it. Giving his own experience, when he was blind, he says:

"The Church of Rome proves the apostolic succession in her communion, and in her communion alone, by the power of working miracles, which are as plenty as blackberries. Nearly every church on the continent has its miraculous relicts. We, many times in the church of St. Bartholomew, had to kiss the brain of that saint and patron of the church. This brain is confined in a glass capsule, and ornamented with gold and precious stones. Afterwards, the capsula was knocked against the forehead, and we were taught to believe it a sovereign remedy against headache. This ceremony is yearly performed on the twenty-fourth of August, but lately we always at every returning 24th of August, rather thought on the brains of Huguenots, that were blown out by authority of the pretended successor of a holy Peter."

BISHOP BASCOM'S BIOGRAPHY.—Mrs. Eliza Bascom, widow of the Bishop, publishes a card in the N. and L. Advocate, calling for materials for the biography of the Bishop. Of course any persons able to contribute, by original letters, or furnishing well authenticated interesting facts concerning the deceased, will forward them to facilitate the work, and in justice to the memory of the dead. Bishop Andrew is not the biographer, but Dr. Henkle, who will doubtless produce a volume creditably illustrating the life of a truly great man and quickening to the Church. Mrs. Bascom remarks:

"It is but justice to state that Dr. Henkle had been chosen by me, with the firm conviction that he would have been selected by Dr. Bascom had he ever expressed any wish on the subject—which he never did. The long intimacy and confidential intercourse for many years existing between Dr. Bascom and Dr. Henkle, (of which the correspondence now in my possession furnishes abundant proof,) place the latter in a position which, with the aid of journals, authenticated facts, etc., which I shall be able to furnish, will enable him to do justice to the memory of his deceased friend."

CITY COLDNESS VS. COUNTRY CHEER.—It is chilling even in dog days, and in winter it is quite freezing, this stiffness and distance and coyness of fellowship prevailing in our city churches. Why is it? It is an offence against religion—the extent to which in some places it is carried. A lady from the country, sojourning in Buffalo, thus complains to the Advocate there, but gets no comfort:

"Mr. Editor: Why is it that there is so little, so very little social feeling in the Methodist churches in this city? Is it because it is in the city? Why cant Christians—members of the same family of Christ—why cant they love each other as well in the city as in the country? I can see no reason, I'm sure. Why, in the dear old church at home I know we all LOVED one another; I mean LOVED; not the cold, unmeaning, unfeeling grasp of the hand we meet with here, but the real Christian shake, with a 'God bless you' in it. Why, I'm almost afraid to offer my hand to any of my brothers and sisters in the church here; they look as stern, faces long as an Old School Puritan, as if they were feeling so very bad, and hoped you were enjoying the same blessing. Out upon such religion as that! I dont like it; want none of it."

HARD TO PLEASE.—Our contemporary of Charleston, like all others, has some unreasonable subscribers. The controversy on Sunday preaching, in its nature or length, has displeased somebody. The editor says the paper "has been threatened with the loss of subscribers on account of this skirmish."

RELIEF OF A MISSIONARY'S WIFE.—A correspondent of the R. C. Advocate, alluding to Mrs. Taylor's return to the United States, on account of ill health, makes a reasonable and kind proposition, which we trust will awaken a response in the proper quarters:

"She is now in the United States, seeking a restoration of health in order that she may speedily return to her husband. He is now in Shanghai, thousands of miles distant, diligently and faithfully seeking 'the lost sheep of the house of Israel.' Mrs. Taylor's heavy expenses in coming to this country, obtaining and using health-restoring agencies, and returning to Shanghai—as she desires and intends—are to be paid out of her husband's salary as a missionary.

"Now, I submit the question to all who may read it, is this right? The unanimous response will doubtless be, no, no. Still the missionary fund proper is not large enough to be charged with this extra expense, although I believe the expense itself is emphatically missionary. What, then, is to be done? Shall our afflicted, self-sacrificing and faithful missionary brother be forced to pay these heavy exposses out of his small salary, the most, if not all of which is necessary to his own support in China? I answer, unhesitatingly, no. Then what is to be done? I answer, let each person in the bounds of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, who feels so disposed—and I am sure that hundreds such can be found—remit to you, or to Brother Schon, or to Brother Wightman, five dollars, to constitute a 'Mrs. Charles Taylor fund,' and to be presented to her for the purpose of defraying the expenses incident to her present bitter separation from her husband."

LUMPING THEM.—It seems, by the following note of the Secretary of the General Conference, North, in Western Advocate, that the Annual Conferences recently erected in the slaveholding States can not stand alone. Doubtless, at the rendezvous appointed, there would be room for several more such. However, the name may take well abroad: it counts one more Conference, sounds like extension, and will be entitled to dividends:

"Brother Elliott: Permit me, through the Western Christian Advocate, to correct an error somehow afloat among some of our preachers, and I can do it best in the words of the resolution of Dr. Cartwright:

"'Resolved, That the Cincinnati and Kentucky Conferences, and also the Arkansas and Missouri Conferences, meet together this year.'

"This is the notion of the Gen. Conference.

"Yours, affectionately,

"JOSEPH M. TRIMALE.

GERMAN MISSIONS.—The editor of the Ch. Advocate and Journal, reviewing the 33d annual report of the Missionary Society, thus comments on a portion of it:

"But of all the good news which this rich report contains, that which relates to the German missions, both at home and abroad, will most gladden the hearts of these who wait for the fulfilment of prophecy in the subjection of the nations to the dominion of Him whose right it is to reign; because both in its origin and progress, it affords the clearest manifestation of Divine interposition and direction. The calling, the preparation, and the thrusting out of Brother Nast, the immediate fruits of his labor in the awakenings and conversions among his countrymen, and the raising up of other men, willing and qualified to teach the way of salvation to the thousands who are continually coming to us from all parts of Europe where the German language is spoken, until having supplied the want in their adopted country, they recrossed the seas to diffuse the life and power of religion throughout the father-land; all this would seem sufficient to convince even an infidel that the work is of God.—Nor will the systematic arrangement into which this great work has fallen, assuming at once the vigor and efficiency of our itinerant plan of ministerial operation, strike the reader with less force, while he turns over the many pages of the 'Report' devoted to this subject. He will be ready to exclaim, 'What hath God wrought!'"

QUARTERLY REVIEW OF M. E. CHUACH, SOUTH.—Dr. Doggett apologises for the delay of a week in issuing the July number. CONTENTS:

I. Roman Literature: An elegant and scholarly contribution, by J. B. Cobb, Esq., of Columbus, Miss. We are ever pleased to see the editor successful in enlisting such a class of Southern writers as that represented by Mr. C.

II. Wesley and Methodism: The writer's name is not given; we should like to know it. Besides being more practical he possesses in common with Isaac Taylor some of his finest parts and presents the most satisfactory Review of his famous book that has come to our knowledge.

III. Grace Norman: Something that had almost been lost out of mind—that Mr. Wesley once had a love affair.

IV. Pulpit Hermeneutics: Dr. Lee continues, from January number, his directions for ascertaining the exact import of "the words which the Holy Ghost teacheth." It is a terse and lucid article, on a most important subject, in the writer's best style.

V. The Moral Power of the Press: We guess this, by the editor, is the life-like form of a skeleton that was in his pocket at the May anniversaries in New York. It was pronounced worthy of the Tuberuacle by the best judges. Our sentence is anticipated.

VI. Southern Methodist Publications: By Isaac Denton, Miss. Mr. D. calmly discusses a vexed subject with an evident appreciation of its difficulties. His suggestions about equalizing the prices of Church publications to convenient and remote purchasers are ingenious and original, but they strike us as impracticable. On one point we coincide entirely with him, which we notice more fully elsewhere.

VII. Remarks on 1 Cron. vi. 16–38. From Kitto's Journal of Sac. Lit.

VIII–IX. Excellent Notices of New Books and Literary Miscellany.

The earnest solicitation is repeated for the enlargement of the subscription. No work in the literary enterprises of our Church has better claims to liberal support than the Quarterly.

A GROWING CHURCH.—The New York Observer gives some items of the history of a Presbyterian Church in that city. The example is full of goodly provocation. Such Pastors and Church members do not live in vain. The occasion of writing up this history is the 34th Anniversary of the Church's organization. It had been served by two pastors—each 17 years:

"The whole number of persons who have been connected with the church from the beginning, is two thousand eight hundred and forty-seven; of which nine hundred and fifty-one were received on certificate, and one thousand eight hundred and ninety-six on examination. The annual average of additions to the church has been eighty-three; on certificate twenty-eight, and on examination more than fifty-five.

"During the ministry of Dr. B——, and in the infancy of the enterprise, when it had to struggle with great embarrassments, eight hundred and seventy-nine names were enrolled on the list of communicants, of whom three hundred and forty-one were received on certificate, and five hundred and thirty-eight on examination; making an annual average of fifty-two, or one for every week of the period; twenty on certificate, and thirty-two on examination.

The ministry of Dr. H—— has been attended with very few pecuniary embarrassments, and a large harvest has been gathered, in part, from seed previously sown. The number of persons received since July 1, 1835, when he commenced his ministry among them, has been one thousand nine hundred and sixty-eight; of whom six hundred and ten have been received on certificate, and one thousand three hundred and fifty-eight on examination. The annual average of additions has been one hundred and sixtoen, or more than two for every week of the period; thirty-six on certificate, and eighty on examination.

"The whole number of persons now in the communion of the church, is one thousand one hundred and eighteen.

The Case of Achilli vs. Newman.

The last foreign mails brought us full details of this loathsome affair. As a last resort and in keeping with their character the Romanist party in England attacked the character of the witness against them. Dr. Newman having published infamous charges against Dr. Achilli, the latter brought action against him for libel. The case begun 22d ult. To sustain charges against a man whose unpardonable sin is that he has renounced Rome and testified against her, the Romanist party were at no loss for witnesses. The Watchman of 23d June thus alludes to them:

"Newman said that Achilli had one argument against the Roman Church, and that was—himself. But these Italian females now produced in Westminster Hall, who have been debauched, as they declare, by a priest, in the sacristy or at the Confessional, each of these women whom the monks have sent over, is another argument against Rome. A British court and jury has, perhaps, never before been condemned to examine such a tissue of polluting evidence as these foreign females, some of them now old and married, have unblushingly deposed to, against their own womanly fame, in order to blast the character of the hated Dominican. * * Have these women any children, any daughters who will hear that their mothers have crossed sea and land, purposing to blot their own name, and brand all who inherit it with ineffaceable infamy, 'for the honor of the Holy Mother Church, and of God,' as Eleana Giustini was instructed by her curate."

The testimony showed that the persecution had been unrelenting and no means spared that could ruin its victim.

The same paper refering to the witnesses remarks:

"Whether they are true or false, it is almost appalling to learn how constantly the unsleeping eye of Romish jealousy and vengeance has been upon this man, in Italy, in the Ionian islands, in Malta, in England, both before and since his renunciation of Popery, upon his every movement, and all his paths, upon him in his family circle, at his board, or in his chamber. It is amazing, and fearful!"

Great legal ability was displayed in the defense and prosecution, and much excitement among the people. The records of the Court of Inquisition in a former prosecution were introduced into an English Court for the first time since the Reformation.

The jury, after a brief absence, rendered a verdict against Dr. Newman, on all the points save one—the 19th charge, a point comparatively unimportant. There was much cheering in the court room at the rendition of a verdict so fully vindicating Achilli.

Is Infant Baptism an Innovation?

"Cyprian was an advocate of infant baptism. This rite, like all innovations, had many things still unsettled, and one was the precise time when it should be administered." [Baptist paper.

Cyprian was Bishop of Carthage in A. D. 250. He suffered martyrdom in 258. In 253 a council of sixty-six Bishops was held in Carthage. It seems to have been convened for general objects of Christian interest. Among other matters the question whether, in case of necessity, an infant might be baptized before it was eight days old was brought under consideration. The question was started by Fidus, a country Bishop, who took the ground that they ought not to be baptized previous to the eighth day after birth. The Council decided differently. "We were all, in our assembly, of a contrary opinion." By their judgment, then, a child might be baptized at any time before the eighth day. These Bishops may be presumed to have known both the doctrine and practice of the Church, at that time; and the facts of the case form a strong link in the chain of testimony that unites infant baptism to the doctrines and practice of the Apostles. But omitting that for the present, we ask, was infant baptism an innovation? Our Baptist exchange affirms it to have been. It is then a question of fact. Those, therefore, who affirm it to be an innovation upon the doctrine and practice of the apostles, ought definitively to say when and by whom it was introduced. Surely since they are so confident of the fact, they ought to be very familiar with the time of its occurrence, and the author of the novelty. And they should speak to the point, "or else hereafter forever hold their peace." Was it an innovation? Let the assertion be proved. We should like to see the evidence on this subject. [R. C. Advocate.

Wm. H. Lord, not long since a Unitarian clergyman of Milwaukee, but late a merchant, later a lawyer, and latest an editor, has been appointed Government mail agent between New York and California.

By the year 2000, says an exchange paper, it is very probable that manual labor will have utterly ceased under the sun, and the occupation of the adjective "hard-fisted," will have gone forever. They have now, in Newhampshire, a potato-digging machine, which, drawn by horses down the rows, digs the potatoes, separates them from the dirt and loads them into the cart, while the farmer walks alongside, whistling "Hail Columbia," with his hands in his pockets.

NEW MISSIONARY CERTIFICATE.—Our brethren of the Church North have just issued a new one. The Board, in 1851, appointed a special committee, with power to cause one to be designed and engraved in the highest style of the art. The committee had several meetings for the purpose of suggesting and comparing designs. At length the committee adopted a design suggested by a member, having for its central and essential element the celebrated Italinn picture of the Transfiguration. The views of the committee were explained to P. F. Rothermel, Esq., a distinguished painter of Philadelphia, and he made the drawing from the suggestions of the committee. The elements agreed on by the committee were three, all Scriptural: 1. The Lord of glory just in the act of parting with the multitude as he begins to ascend to heaven from Mt. Olivet. 2. As he begins to rise from their midst he repeats the command, 'Go ye into all the world and preach my gospel to every creature;' and the words falling from his lips, engrave themselves on the rock beneath his feet. 3. The various impressions which the event made upon the multitude of disciples from whose midst the Saviour was beginning to rise into heaven, and to whom he uttered the words seen upon the rock.

Bossier Point—Destitution of Gospel—Need of Ministry.

Bossier Point is the southern portion of Bossier parish. It is in the form of a peninsula, formed by Lake Bisteneau on one side, and Lake Bodcau on the other. In the widest place these lakes are about fifteen miles apart. The Point proper is about thirty miles long. In this range is some of the richest upland of the parish, and it is inhabited by enterprising and wealthy planters. This is yet a new country. A few years ago the forest was unbroken, and scarcely a path to guide the pioneer. What a change in years have made! Now, in its length and breadth, we see luxuriant corn waiving in the breeze, and thousands of acres green with cotton, that mighty staple of the South. Many who came here comparatively poor have made for themselves independent fortunes. The only drawback they have is the want of navigation, or some mode to convey their cotton to market, and receive their supplies. Lake Bisteneau is their only dependence, and that is nearly dry a great part of the year. There is now some talk of having a railroad from Vicksburg to Shreveport. If that will ever be the case, and I hope it will, this will be among the most delightful, productive and convenient portions of our State.

A word of the moral condition of this point. The people are intelligent, and perhaps possess as much of what is called morality, as you will find anywhere; but real heartfelt religion is far too scarce and scattering. There is need of an overwhelming revival of religion. There are three Societies of the Methodist Church, and one of the Baptist. There are Church members enough, if they would go to work, to take the whole country. What we want is the arousing up of the Church, the attendance on private and family prayers. Home religion—every day religion, that keeps the heart right, and prepares for the worship of God and the reception of his blessings in the sanctuary.

Many of the colored people here have an opportunity to hear the Gospel, and are profited thereby; but many scarcely ever hear a sermon. I have looked upon them and asked what could be done, and was at a loss for an answer. It is impossible for one preacher to preach to white and colored on the area of this Circuit. If the whites would turn out on week days and hear preaching, and let us preach to the blacks on Sunday, it could be done; but this they will not do, so we must preach to them on Sabbaths, or not at all. Not only in this Point the blacks have but little preaching, but their destitution in some other portions of this parish is deplorable. There is no preaching by any denomination on Red River, from Loggy Bayou, the southern point of this parish, to the Arkansas line, that I know of. In this range are thousands of immortal souls—souls redeemed by Jesus Christ—who know very little of the blood that cleanses from sin. Many of them in the old States were members of the Church a few hold on their way, but far the most forget their Savior and are new in their sins. The question comes home to the heart of every lover of the Lord Jesus Christ, and more especially to the members of the Louisiana Conference. What can we do to save these immortal souls?

When will the time come when the voice of the living Ministry will be heard on our rich alluvial lands, in the lengths of our rivers and bayous. Fully to accomplish this task, and also to preach the Gospel to the whites in our Conference, it requires at least two hundred laborious Ministers. What are the handful of our Conference among so many? Truly the harvest is great, but the laborers are few. May the Lord of the harvest send forth laborers for this mighty and inviting field—a field in which the faithful Minister will be successful in wining souls to Christ, and in polishing immortal jewels to deck the coronet of him who shall wear many crowns.

ITINERA.

Bossier, La.

P. S. We have had fine rains here lately. The cotton looks quite promising, and the corn is splendid; a great deal will be made in this parish this year. Lake Bisteneau is yet navigable, but boats "are few and far between."

LIBERIA AGRICULTURAL AND EMIGRATION ASSOCIATION.—This association of free colored people, in New York, was organized for the purpose of promoting emigration to Liberia, and the establishment of the colored emigrants in agricultural pursuits, is meeting with great encouragement and success. The association is independent of the Colonization Society, though co-operating with it to the same end, and receiving from the latter its hearty sanction and support. President Roberts, of Liberia, has made a donation to the association of six hundred acres of land, situated on St. Paul's river, sixteen miles from Monrovia. Abraham Campbell, the agent of the association, is making arrangements to purchase a large tract lying between the two rivers, which is navigable for vessels of a large burden therein. The donation of Governor Roberts has been surveyed and laid out in farms of ten acres each, fronting the river, which is navigable for vessels of a large burden therein. The association has also purchased a large tract of land, and putting up a comfortable farm-house upon each farm, for the coming emigrants.

J. P. Smith, a colored man of Boston, who was under $3000 bonds to answer the charge of assisting in rescuing Shadrach, the fugitive slave, from the officers of the law, has sailed for California, and left his bondsmen to foot the bill. Previous to his leaving he hired a piano, and pawned it for a considerable sum.

Circular.

To the Preachers of the Southwestern Conferences.

DEAR BRETHREN: Although our sales, during the past winter and spring, have greatly exceeded our most sanguine expectations, we have, however, been able to keep up a full and ample supply of stock, consisting of standard Methodist books and valuable miscellaneous publications, and are now prepared to meet the entire demand of the Church for approved theological literature, in all its various departments, throughout the whole Southwestern range of this great field of evangelical operation. Your patronage is therefore respectfully invited. Should you find it convenient to accompany your orders with the cash, it will be a matter of special accommodation to the concern at this time; but if this should not be practicable, your orders will be promptly filled at four months, until the approaching sessions of your respective Conferences.

Yours, very truly and affectionately,

OBITUARY NOTICE.

Died, of consumption, in Hempstead county, Ark., on the 16th of June, 1852, JOSIAS ROSS. He joined the M. E. Church at 10 years of age, and lived a consistent member until death. The writer visited him and found him at all times enduring his affliction like a man of God. The morning before he died I asked him what his prospects were for heaven. He said that all guilt was gone, and laying his hand upon his breast said he was at peace with all men. He has left a wife and ten children to mourn their loss. We trust the Lord would bless and protect them. In him Mr. Rosser the Church has lost one of its best members. But our loss is his gain.

TROUBLE WITH THE NEGROES IN CANADA.—A regular fight between the black and white Multinazers—Demolition of the houses of the Blacks, etc.—It appears from the following article, extracted from the St. Catharines, C. W. Journal, of the last instant that the fugitive and other blacks in Canada, do not always meet with the "brotherly sympathy" with which they are greeted on their first arrival in the Colony. Here is the article:—

"We regret exceedingly that the day did not pass over without a serious riot. It seems that on the parade ground some insult was offered to the colored company, which was very properly restrained by Colonel Clark and others. If the affair had ended here it would have been fortunate; but the bad feeling exhibited on the parade ground was viewed by some evil-minded persons; and the colored population becoming roused to madness, they proceeded to wreak their vengeance on a company in Stinson's tavern, after which a general melee took place, in which several were wounded, and it is likely some will die of the injuries received. The colored village is in a ruin, and much more the place having been besieged by an enemy than anything else. This is the reward which the colored men have received for their loyalty, and the readiness with which they turned out to train, and no doubt would if the country required their services. This is a most painful occurrence, and must have originated with some very ignorant persons. How can any man possessing the common feelings of humanity, to say nothing of loyalty, coolly and deliberately offer insult to so many men, so cheerfully turning out in obedience to the laws of the country, exceeds belief. If it were not a matter of fact. Too much credit cannot be given to those worthy citizens who used their best efforts to restrain the excitement, and prevent any further bloodshedding. We suppose that in a few days these will have undergone an investigation, and that justice will be done to all parties. This occurrence will have one good result—it will open the eyes of the people to the importance of quite a different police arrangement from that now existing. We require a police magistrate who will always be on the spot, and have at his disposal a force ready and adequate to preserve the lifs and property on all possible circumstances. We are informed that the scenes exhibited on Monday were truly frightful, nor can we be hostile to say that compensation should be unde to those whose houses have been sacked and ruined."

It seems that the good people of St. Cathertnes require a better police magistrate, who will always be on the spot, and have under his command a large force of constables, to preserve order whenever their black brethren parade to show their loyalty.

PARIS THEATRICALS.—The French are a theatre-going people, more so than the people of any other European country. The number of theatres throughout France, according to some theatrical statistics lately published, is 361, which is a much larger proportion, compared with the population, than is exhibited in any other nation. Paris has 23, containing about 34,000 places, and the average number of spectators every night is estimated at 20,000. Besides theatres, there are 145 places of amusement open in the capital and its vicinity, principally during the summer season; public balls, such as Mullitte's and concerts, etc. These establishments are frequented by it is estimated, 24,000 persons per diem, thus carrying the number of pleasure seekers in Paris to 44,000 daily.

The number of persons employed in the Paris theatres, in addition to the actors, is upwards of 1500, and there are no less than 630 musicians, with the various orchestras. With regard to the performers at Paris, there are 1152 men and 861 women. Of these, 763 are artistes, and the remainder choristers and figurantes. The emoluments of this numerous personal average per annum, 3,534,990f.

Lord Wharncliffe, of England, was invited by the Boston authorities to participate with them on Monday last, in celebrating our national anniversary. He replied by letter, thanking them for the compliment, and added; "Lord Wharncliffe can fully appreciate the demonstration of the citizens of Boston in the celebration of so important an event of their national history, but the object of that celebration is essentially American, and one the commemoration of which it appears to him that he could not decorously pretend to take a part: and he trusts the Committee will consider it as no evidence of disrespect toward them if he expresses his regret that he cannot avail himself of the invitation with which they have honored him."

General Haynau, the Austrian butchar, spent the past winter at Grafenburg, where he was cured of dropsy in the feet, after taking thirty cold wet sheets a day in December, without fire in his room. He is said to be about 60 years of age, quite feeble, with white mustachios and beard. He has purchased an estate in Hungary, sold at 30,000 florins.

GENERAL INTELLIGENCE.

THE HEALTH OF THE CITY.—The Charity Hospital report for the last week shows a continued improvement in the health of the city. The whole number of deaths reported is 27, of which only seven were from cholera. There is not at this time a more healthy city in the Union than New Orleans.

NEWS FOR SANTA FE.—The St. Louis Signal of the 4th instant says: Six mules, we understand, of the Loretta Order came round on the Lady Franklin, on Friday, for the purpose of joining the Rev. Bishop of Santa Fe, who is at present in the city. They are to be taken out for the purpose of establishing a school in that distant region.

We learn likewise that the Bishop has applied to the Commander General in France, for the requisite number of Jesuit Fathers, and authority to establish a College in New Mexico.

THE SURVIVING MEMBER OF MADISON AND ADAMS' CABINET.—The death of Mr. Clay leaves but a single surviving member—the Hon. Richard Rush—of those who composed the cabinet of John Quincy Adams. The Philadelphia Enquirer says he is now living in the enjoyment of excellent health, and unusually active habits, at his country seat in that vicinity. Mr. Rush is also the only surviving member of Mr. Madison's administration, in whose cabinet he filled the post of Attorney General, at the age of thirty-three.

INTERESTING RELICS.—A publican at Cape May, named Barrett, it is said, possesses the identical pistols used by Gen. Lafayette at the battle of Brandywine. More beautiful and elaborate pieces of workmanship we learn, were never seen. Mr. Barrett is so often annoyed by visitors asking to look at the pistols, that he would rather not show them; yet, the word Lafayette, spoken in an undertone, will generally produce them. He had refused $200 offered by Barnum for the pair.

PANAMA RAILROAD STOCK.—The stock of the Panama railroad recently rose 20 per cent in three days in New York, viz: From 120 to 140. The reason assigned is, that the company by the last steamer were apprised that the fee simple of the entire island, upon which Aspinwall is situated, had been obtained from the Government of New Grenada, of which they had previously only held a lease. The island is capable of being made use of as a site for a large town, and the population is rapidly increasing. The road itself is of a great and permanent importance.

DIPLOMATIC SALARIES.—We published yesterday a statement made by Mr. Rives, of the diplomatic salaries paid by the French Government. It appears that minute statements have been made by nearly all our ministers abroad, and they go to show that at all points the salary is so low that a Minister or Charge must live in so miserly a manner as to excite criticism, and disable himself from effecting the objects of his mission or bankrupt himself if he have not a very liberal private fortune. Mr Lawrence says that $20,000 per annum is the lowest sum upon which a minister can live reputably in London. His own expenses, he says, are much larger. Mr. Rives puts the unavoidable expenses at Paris at $16,000 a year. Mr. Brown, at St. Petersburg, lives in a very secluded manner.

THE AMAZON RIVER.—Lieut. Wm. Lewis Herndon, U. S. Navy, arrived at New York, in the brig Dolphin, from his long and perilous exploration of the Amazon River. Lieut. H. has been occupied eleven months in exploring the waters of this noble river, and making a thorough examination of the vast resources of the country which it drains. The survey has been prosecuted under the auspices of the Navy Department, and in connection with the designs of Lieut. Maury, for the establishment of a steam communication between some Southern port and Para, at the mouth of the Amazon. The report of Lieut. Herndon is looked for with much anxiety

FROM NEWFOUNDLAND.—The latest advices from St. Johns, Newfoundland, report the existence of strong party feelings. Hon. L. Marchant prorogued the Legislature with an insulting and ill-timed speech, which excited the sneers and derision of the audience. The press generally manifest great indignation, and his Excellency's clique has been carried through the streets dangling by the neck, accompanied with the tunle of the Dead March.

EXTRAORDINARY FECUNDITY.—A Mrs. Anna Kirkland, residing in Hickman county, Tenn., was recently delivered of four living children at a birth, making five to whom she has given birth in eleven months. The children have all died, and the mother is in a critical condition. Mrs. K. is over forty years of age.

STEAMSHIPS TO IRELAND.—The Post Office Committee of the House of Representatives, it is stated, have made a unanimous report in favor of the proposals of Horace B. Tebbets and others, for a contract to carry the mails between Jersey City and the port of Galway, Ireland, by the establishment of a line of steamships.

ELECTRICITY VS. WHALES.—The New Bedford Mercury publishes extracts of a letter from the Captain of a Bremen whale-ship, dated at New Zealand, in which he states that he had tried the experiment of applying electricity to catching whales, with the most complete success. The whale, on being struck, made one dash forward, when he turned on his side perfectly powerless.

SENTENCED.—Nathan H. Crist, convicted at Mobile of the murder of Nye, has been sentenced to be hanged on the 2d of September next. A bill of exceptions has been plead in the Supreme Court with the hope of obtaining a new trial. It is said that Crist was strongly affected while the Judge was addressing him, and hung his head in humiliation.

FROM BUENOS AYRES.—Buenos Ayre dates to May 18 have been received. The Legislature has elected Don Lopez Governor of the Province of Buenos Ayres, supported by Urquisa.

Produce was arriving freely and prices were unchanged.

A STORM.—A storm of wind, rain and hail passed over Montgomery, Alabama, on Friday last, and did much damage. Many buildings were prostrated, others unroofed, and a large number of shade trees torn up. The journal says that much damage was done to the corn crop in the vicinity.

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.—The one hundreth Anniversary of the opening of St. George's church New York, was celebrated on the 1st inst. The church, which is in Beekman street, was way out of town when it was built, but is now in the very heart of the business portion of the city.

CAN BE SEAT.—The editor of the Macon (Ala.) Republican, has been presented with a beef grown in that vicinity, weighing ten pounds. The editor expresses a willingness to part with his new "tho" if any body can beat that beef.

THE SECRETARYSHIP OF THE NAVY.—Mr. Crittenden.—The New York Herald publishes the following dispatch from Washington:

Mr. Bell having declined, as I telegraphed you on Sunday, Colonel Chambers, of Md., (for many years United States Senator) it is said, has been offered the Navy Department. I learn, from a source which ought to be well informed, that Mr. Crittenden, Attorney General, is going to England in October, in place of Mr. Lawrence, who has resigned.

CHEAP POSTAGE.—The House of Representatives on the 9th inst. took up the bill ammendatory of the law passed March 3, 1851, to reduce and modify the rates of postage, and adopted the emendments of the Committee on the Postoffice. The bill as passed enacts a uniform mode in levying newspeper postage.

THE ELECTRO-MAGNETIC TELEGRAPH.—Mr. Alexander Jones, of New York, has published a full history of the Magnetic Telegraph which contains many of the valuable suggestions and interesting facts. He thinks the project of connecting this country with all the cities of Europe by means of the telegraph, is perfectly feasible, by extending the lines to the Pacific, and thence north across Behring's Straits into Russia. This Strait is only thirty miles wide with an average depth of six fathoms water.

FLORIDA CROPS.—The Tallahasse Floridian says the crops in Middle Florida, of all kinds, are more than ordinarily promising.

ABROUND.—On the 5th inst. the steamer Tuscumbia was still aground at Ilet Island.

DROUTH.—The streams in Minnesota are said to be nearly dry. The upper Mississippi is falling rapidly, and the St. Louis papers anticipate a season of very low water at that point.

THE GREAT FIRE IN MONTREAL.—A dispatch to the Charlestou Courier gives some further particulars of the terrible conflagration which commenced in Montreal on the 9th instant. It commenced at the corner of St. Lawrence and St. Catharine streets, and advices up to Friday morning, the 10th, say it was still raging. Coruwall's Terrace, the Bishop's Church and Palace, the Market, Cattle Market, Hospital, Military Barracks, Bonucgan's Hotel, the Hospital, Theatre, and Balhoula Square, comprising about three hundred buildings more, were all in ashes.

THE RED WLEVIE.—The Ohio Statesman says that this insect is making sad havoc among the wheat fields in that vicinity. In some instances, entire fields have been destroyed.

PASSENGERS IN THE NIAGARA.—Among the passengers who sailed for Boston for Liverpool, on the 7th inst., in the steamship Niagara, were Lord and Lady Wharncliffe and daughter, and Miss Stuart Wortley.

THE HEAT.—The heat was so excessive in St. Louis on the 7th inst., that a number of the brickmyers, masons, etc., who were at work on buildings, were compelled to suspend operations.

THE KAFFIR WAR.—By arrivals at New Bedford, we have accounts from the Cape of Good Hope to May 7. The sixth regiment had had a sharp encounter with a large force of the enemy, in which the latter were finally routed, with a large number killed. Andrea Hottania, a leading Hottentot, has been indicted, and is to be tried, for high treason.

Gov. Cathcart had been thrown from his horse and badly injured, but was recovering, and intended to lead a force of 1000 men in the enemy's country

Sandilki, the chief Kaffir rebel, had again sued for peace; but Governor Cathcart replied that he would make no peace with the Kaffirs this side of the river Kei, and there appears to be no doubt that it is the intention to drive the Kaffirs into Central Africa, and annex their lands to the English colony.

GROWTH OF WISCONSIN.—This thrifty young State was first known (as a territory) to the United States census in 1841, when it had 80,000 inhabitants; in 1850 they had swelled to 300,000—a ten fold increase in ten years. Now they do not fall short of 400,000, and are increasing at the rate of at least 50,000 per annum. No other State in the Union has grown with equal rapidity.

MR. CABET.—This celebrated French communist is now in New York, on his way to join the community at Nauvoo. A large number of his friends and democratic socialists have invited him to a public banquet at the Shakespeare Hotel. The price of tickets is three shillings.

THE FRENCH MINISTER.—The National Intelligencer which started the report that the French Minister, M. de Sartiges had been recalled, positively contradicts the rumor.

MORE RAILROAD LOANS IN EUROPE.—The Central Michigan Railroad Company have borrowed, at par, $500,000 on their bonds having twenty years to run, and bearing 6 per cent. interest, the interest and principal both payable in London in sterling. Its amount is $2,500,000 on the bonds of the Company, having fifteen years to run, and bearing 6 per cent. interest; which, with the principal, is payable in sterling at London. This loan was taken at 97 to 98 per cent.

A COLLAPSE.—Mons. Petin, who was to make a balloon ascension at Bridgeport, Connecticut, on the 5th inst., met with a mishap, which spoiled the whole affair. The balloon, after being loosed from its moorings, was carried over by the wind and came in contact with the eaves of a house, by which the fabric was split from top to bottom. It is said that ten thousand persons assembled to witness the ascent, and their disappointment was immense.

A FAILURE.—At Wilmington, Del., on the 5th instant a Mr. Pusney made an attempt to go up with a balloon, but it was a clear case of no go. He was too heavy, and the balloon refused to budge. The crowd became indignant, and threatened violence, when Capt. J. F. Robinson, of Wilmington, volunteered to make the ascension. He was lashed to the balloon with cords and went up, dangling in the air. He descended about three miles from the place, uninjured.

Edward Quincy, Wendell Phillips, Theodore Parker, Abbey Kelly, and others, than went to work, demolished the constitution, killed off Daniel Webster, Kossuth, and a large number of other distinguished individuals, without the least show of mercy. Edward Quincy said that the Fourth of July, 'tis was a glorious idea, but that it was a great humbug now, and that we would have been much better off under the British sceptre.

THE FIFTH OF JULY.—Our northern exchanges are mostly made up of descriptions of the celebrations of the 5th—the accidents, incidents, etc. The display in most of the northern cities was on a graed scale. The St. Tammany Society of New York had a spirited celebration. An oration was delivered by John C. Mather, Esq. John Van Buren made an eloquent and happy speech, and was followed by Gov. Cobb, of Georgia, Col. Crockett, (a son of David Crockett,) of Tennessee, Senator Bowns, of Louisiana, and Mr. Wells, of New Hampshire.

He was apporently uninjured, and swam ashore.

A long series of resolutions were adopted, approving of the National Convention to be held at Pittsburgh; declaring Mr. Hale the first, and Senator Chase the second choice for the Presidency; adopting Kossuth's intervention doctrines; in favor of internal improvements by Congress; the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and an immediate repeal of the fugitive slave law; denouncing slavery, and the democratic and whig parties; declaring the free-soil party as the party of the Union, constitutional law, of freedom and progress, and opposed to sectionalism, secession or disunion. FOURTH OF JULY AT SING SING.—The 4th of July was celebrated by the prisoners in the Sing Sing (N. Y.) State prison, in a spirited manner. At 6 o'clock in the morning the males were let out of their cells, and allowed the luxury of a bath in the Hudson. Seven hundred and ninety prisoners in the water at one time—jumping, splashing and shouting, and enjoying full freedom. At the call they hastently came to order and marched back to their cells with the regularity of an army. On Monday the 5th, they were allowed full liberty of speech. Songs were sung, toasts given and speeches made, and the hilarity of the occasion was only marred by the arrival of nine o'clock, at which all were locked up. The females got up a dance, and also passed the day in a merry manner.

THE ORLEANS PROPERTY.—Recently several parcels of land, part of the confiscated Orleans property, were put up for sale at Nenilly. The first lot was put up by the auctioneer at 400f. No bidders presented themselves. The auctioneer made a speech to assure the company that they would have a perfectly good title to every lot that might be bought. He gradually put the price down to 120f., at which sum the lot was knocked down. The agent for the Orleans family at once protested publicly against the sale. Upon this the lot was put up a second time, and another person bought it for 60f. only. The agent formally protested again. Upon this the auctioneer withdrew in a fury, and the sale proceeded no further.

THE RIVERS.—The Upper Trinity is said to be in fine navigable condition. Most of the other rivers are also said to be full.

MAIL RIDER ATTACKED BY INDIANS.—The Victoria Advocate learns that the mail rider between San Patricio and Refugio and a man who was with him, were recently attacked by about a dozen Indians, and that they barely escaped with their lives. They were watering their horses, when they heard a peculiar kind of whistle, and at a glance satisfied them that some ten or twelve Camanches were within fifty yards of them. They mounted and made off, when the Indians gave chase. One of them, mounted on an American horse, was able to come up with the men, and within about thirty feet of them he was shot by the mail rider. Four of the Indians were dressed in Mexican clothes. The mail rider was compelled to throw away the mail, and it fell into the hands of the Indians.

IMMIGRANTS.—The bark Creole, from Bremen, arrived at Galveston on the 8th instant, with 90 passengers.

INDIAN DEPREDATIONS NEAR LAREDO.—The San Antonio Ledger publishes a letter from Laredo, dated June 10, which says:

On Friday, the 4th inst., a Mexican citizen of this town, named Refugio Huete, was attacked and killed by three Indians, within less than a league from this town, and about two miles above the military post we have here called Fort McIntosh. The Indians escaped harmless, without being followed down the country, and on Sunday morning, about dawn, succeeded in driving off eleven horses and mules, belonging to a party of men from this town, encamped twenty miles from here, on the Juanita. The mail rider from Corpus Christi, on the 7th inst., passed by a camp just abandoned by a large party of Indians (he counted ten fires, and calculated about eighty were in the party), at a place called the Realitos, about midway between this and Corpus. Some Americans met the mail rider just before he arrived at the Realitos, and advised him of the presence of the Indians. By the latest arrival from below, we learn that a very large body of Indians had passed close to Mr. Redmond's house, on this side of the Rio Grande, in front of Guerrero.

"PRINTS OF STOCK RAISING.—The Galveston Gazette says: In 1842 a gentleman in Brazoria county, who does not like to see his name in print, but for whose entire credibility we will vouch, gave half a league of land worth not over $1 000 for one thousand head of neat cattle. Since that time he has supported his family and improved a farm worth four or five thousand dollars from the sale of the increase of the herd; which has now—besides the number sold—increased to seven thousand head. Of this number he has just sold 4000, at four dollars each, or $16,000 in all. He estimates that the number previously sold brought $10,000. The three thousand remaining are worth $12,000. Readers abroad must understand that cattle have no food in this country, save what is furnished by natural pastures.

COLORADO NAVIGATION COMPANY.—The Austin State Gazette says that the Colorado Navigation Company are ready until the 4th of September next, for receiving proposals to clean out the raft at the mouth of the Colorado river. The Gazette learns that the company has ample means on hand to pay for the work promptly.

FROM EL PASO.—The El Paso mail arrived at San Antonio on the 27th ult., bringing Santa Fe papers of the 29th May. The mail left El Paso on June 10, but brought no news of importance. We extract the following from the correspondence of the San Antonio Ledger, dated El Paso, June 8:

"The United States Boundary Commission, or perhaps more correctly speaking, the Scientific Corps, under the superintendence of Col Emory, have extended their line of operations so far down the Rio Grande, that it becomes necessary to remove the headquarters to some more convenient point, and in a few days the Colonel will proceed with the entire party to Presidio del Norte."

Some changes are to take place in the military at El Paso. It is said that Lieut. Wilkins has only a command of twenty men to protect the frontier from New Mexico to Eagle Pass, a distance of nearly 500 miles.

MURDER BY A MADMAN.—The Maniac Killed.—A correspondent of the Detroit Tribune gives the details of a terrible tragedy which occurred at Almont, Michigan. A man named Hulbert, who had been confined in the county jail in consequence of insanity, and attacks upon different persons, soon after his release threatened to shoot several of his neighbors, and on a warrant being issued for his arrest, he armed himself and took refuge in a log house. When the Constable and posse arrived, and summoned Hulbert to surrender, he immediately shot a man named Mills dead on the spot. The citizens assembled, fired the house, and when Hulbert made his appearance at a window he was shot, one ball striking him in the head, and another taking effect in the body. He had fired a great many shots at the crowd before the flames drove him from his hiding place. The body of Mills could not be taken away until it was considerably burned, as Hulbert, though mortally wounded, was still armed, and he threatened to kill any one who approached.

FIRE AT THE ATLANTIC DOCK.—A fire broke out in the store houses of the Atlantic Dock, Brooklyn, on the morning of the 9th inst. which destroyed property to the amount of ten or twelve thousand dollars. Most of the loss falls on Captain Nye, of the Pacific.

The capital to be £600,000 sterling. Also, that the agents who went out in the Africa to negotiate for the sale of half the Nicaragua canal right, were progressing favorably with their plans.

The French funds have become affected by the continued manifestations of opposition to the dictation of the President.

DIPLOMATIC SALARIES.—A report on diplomatic salaries, laid before the United States Senate, on Friday last, contains a copy of the circular addressed by the Secretary of State on the subject, to all the representatives of the United States, in foreign countries, and their replies. Nearly every one of them complains of the utter insufficiency of the allowance, and suggests a large increase. The American minister in Paris sends a table of salaries supposed to be allowed by the French Government to their Embassadors for the year 1853. The following are the principal in pounds sterling: To Berlin £4000, Brussels £2200, (reduction of £400,) Constantinople £4000, (increase of £900,) St. Petersburg £8000, (increase of £2200,) London £10,000, (increase of £4000, though in 1847 it was £12,000,) Madrid £4800, Rome £4400, Naples £3200, Turin £2400, Washington £3200, (a reduction of £200, though in 1847 it was £3200.) The Secretary of State communicates the correspondence without comment or recommendation.

DIFFERENCE BETWEEN REPUBLICANISM AND ROYALTY.—The editor of the New York Courrier des Etats-Unis says of the national mourning for Mr. Clay:

"In our youth we attended the funeral solemnities of a King of France. The mourning preparations were not undeniably more costly; every thing was conducted with that pomp, expensiveness and magnificence, which monarchies alone can give to a public ceremony; but the spectacle which we have now before our eyes surpasses far the occasion which our memory recalls. There, the people gathered from curiosity; here, it is true grief that assembles them. There it was only an official mourning; here, it is a national sorrow."

The tax on four-wheel pleasure carriages in Paris, is to be $42 per annum.

A land sail-boat has been constructed at Southport, which can run along the beach at the rate of fifteen miles the hour.

THE DOORWAY OF BEREAVEMENT.

It was not all that mournful hour
Bore thy spirit fled,
And life's most visible veil on thy brow,
I felt that thou wert dead.

But oh! those weary days were past,
And there away were gone,
And I, in silent wretchedness,
Had wept and prayed alone;

When lighter friends toward coldly on,
Or fathomed from me fled,
Or strove to heal, and wounded more,
I felt that thou wert dead.

And when I passed along the walks,
Where thou with me had'st been,
And stood alone where both had stood,
In every gentle scene;

And saw the glorious sun and sky,
And felt the balmy air,
And heard a thousand happy sounds,
And knew thou wert not there—

Oh! then I felt that all the charm
That made it bright was fled,
I turned away in bitterness,
And wept that thou wert dead.

And when I hear the silvery sounds
We both have loved to hear,
And think that all their sweetness now
Will forever reach thine ear;

Or read the books we both have loved,
Of verse, or learned lore,
And miss the eye, the voice, the smile,
That made it sweet before;

Or when, through sad and lonely hours,
I long thy face to see,
And think that all this bitter grief
Is nothing new to thee—

Oh! then I feel from earth from me,
For ever thou art fled,
And so too lonely then I feel
That one so loved is dead.

REMINISCENCES OF AN ATTORNEY.

Etelia al Ignaraure.

I knew James Dutton, as I shall call him, at an early period of life, when my present scanty locks of iron-gray were thick and dark, my now pale and furrowed cheeks were fresh and ruddy, like his own. Time, circumstance, and natural bent of mind have done their work on both of us; and if his course of life has been less equable than mine, it has been chiefly so because the original impulse, the first start on the great journey, upon which so much depends, was directed by wiser heads in my case than in his. We were school-fellows for a considerable time; and if I acquired—as I certainly did—a larger stock of knowledge than he, it was by no means from any superior capacity on my part, but that his mind was bent on other pursuits. He was a born Nimrod, and his father encouraged this propensity from the earliest moment that his darling and only son could sit a pony or handle a light fowling-piece. James Dutton was decidedly nothing—not even the luxury of neglecting his own education; and he availed himself of the lamentable privilege to a great extent. It was, however, a remarkable feature in the lad's character, that whatever he himself deemed essential should be done, no amount of indulgence, be it in sport or dissipation, could divert him from thoroughly accomplishing. Thus he saw clearly, that even in the life—that of a sportsman-farmer—he had chalked out for himself, it indispensably necessary that a certain amount of educational power should be attained; and so he really acquired a knowledge of reading, writing and spelling, and then withdrew from school to more congenial avocations.

I frequently met James Dutton in after-years; but some nine or ten months had passed since I had last seen him, when I was directed by the chief partner in the firm to which Flint and I subsequently succeeded, to take coach for Romford, Essex, in order to ascertain from a witness there what kind of evidence we might expect him to give in a trial to come off in the then Hilary term, at Westminster Hall.

It was the first week in January; the weather was extremely cold; and I experienced an intense satisfaction, when, after dispatching the business I had come upon, I found myself in the long dining-room of the chief market-inn, where two blazing fires shed a ruddy, cheerful light over the snow-white damask table-cloth, bright glasses, decanters, and other preparations for the farmer's market-dinner. Prices had ruled high that day; wheat had reached £80 a load; and the numerous groups of hearty, stalwart yeomen present were in high glee, crowing and cackling alike over their full pockets and the news—of which the papers were just then full—of the burning of Moscow, and the flight and ruin of Napoleon's army. James Dutton was in the room, but not, I observed, in his usual flow of animal spirits. The crape round his hat might, I thought, account for that; and as he did not see me, I accosted him with an inquiry after his health, and the reason of his being in mourning. He received me very cordially, and in an instant was off the abstracted manner I had noticed. His father, he informed me, was gone—had died about seven months previously, and he was living alone at Ash Farm—and asked why I did not run down there to see him sometimes. Our conversation was interrupted by a summons to dinner, very cheerfully complied with; and we both—at least I can answer for myself—did ample justice to a more than usually substantial dinner, even in these capital old market-dinner times. We were very jolly afterwards, and amazing triumphant over the frost-bitten soldiers—beautiful that had so long lorded it over Europe. Dutton did not participate in the general hilarity. There was a sneer upon his face during the whole time, which, however, had no expression in words.

"How quiet you are, James Dutton!" cried a loud voice from out the dense smoke-cloud that by this time completely enveloped us. On looking towards the spot from whence the ringing tones came, a jolly, round face—like the sun as seen through a London fog—gleamed redly dull from the thick and choking atmosphere.

"Everybody," rejoined Dutton, "hasn't the luck to sell two hundred quarters of wheat at to-day's price, as you have, Tom Southall."

"That's true, my boy," returned Master Southall, sending, in the plenitude of his satisfaction, a jet of smoke towards us with astonishing force. "And, I say, Jem, I'll tell 'ee what I'll do; I'll clap on ten guineas more upon what I offered for the brown mare."

"Done! She's yours, Tom, then, for ninety guineas!"

"Gie's your hand upon it!" cried Tom Southall, jumping up from his chair, and stretching a fist as big as a leg of mutton—well, say lamb—over the table. "And here—there," he added, with an exuberant chuckle, as he extricated a million canvas-bag from his pocket—"here's the dibs at once."

This transaction excited a good deal of surprise at our part of the table, and Dutton was vigorously even questioned as to his reason for parting with his favorite hunting mare.

"The truth is, friends," said Dutton, at last, "I mean to give up farming, and——"

"Give up farmin'!" broke in half a dozen voices.

"Yes; I don't like it. I shall buy a commission in the army. There'll be a chance against Boney, now; and it's a life I'm fit for."

The farmers looked completely agape at this announcement; but making nothing of it, after silently staring at Dutton and each other, with their pipes in their hands and not in their mouths, till they had gone out, stretched their heads simultaneously across the table towards the candles, relit their pipes, and smoked on as before.

"Then, perhaps, Mr. Dutton," said a young man in a smartly cut velveteen coat with mother-of-pearl buttons, who had hastily left his seat further down the table—"perhaps you will sell the double Mandon, and Fanny and Slut?"

"You set a price."

Prices were named; I forget now the exact sums, but enormous prices, I thought, for the gun and the dogs, Fanny and Slut. The bargains were eagerly concluded, and the money paid down. Possibly the buyer had a vague notion that a portion of the vendor's skill might come to him with his purchases.

"You be in 'arnest, then, in this fool's business, James Dutton," observed a farmer gravely.

"I be sorry for thee; but as I 'spose the lease of Ash Farm will be parted with; why—John, maister, tell Mr. Hurst at the top of the table to-day, to come this way."

"Maister Hurst, a well to-do, highly respectable looking, and rather elderly man, came in obedience to the summons, and after a few words in an under-tone with the friend that had been sent for him, said—"Is this true, James Dutton?"

"It is true that the lease and stock of Ash Farm are to be sold—at a price. You, I believe, are in want of such a concern for the young couple, just married."

"Well; I don't say I might not be a customer, if the price was reasonable."

"Let us step into a private room, then," said Dutton curting. "This is not a place for business of this kind. Sharp," he added, sotto voce, "stand with me; I may want you."

I had listened to all this with a kind of stupid wonderment, and I now, mechanically as it were, got up and accompanied the party to another room.

The matter was soon settled. Five hundred pounds for the lease—ten years unexpired—of Ash Farm, about eleven hundred acres, and the stock, implements, the ploughing, sowing, etc.; already performed, to be paid for at a valuation based on present prices. I drew out the agreement in form, it was signed in the duplicate, a large sum was paid down as deposit, and Mr. Hurst and his friend withdrew.

"Well," said I, taking a glass of port from a bottle Dutton had just ordered in, "here's fortune to your new career; but as I am a living man, I can't understand what you can be thinking about."

"You haven't read the newspapers?"

"O yes, I have! Victory! Glory! March to Paris! and all that sort of thing. Very fine, I dare say; but rubbish, moonshine, I call it, if purchased by the abandonment of the useful, comfortable, joyous life of a prosperous yeoman."

"Is that all you have seen in the papers?"

"Not much else. What, besides, have you found in them?"

"Wheat, at ten or eleven pounds a load—less perhaps—other produce in proportion."

"Ha!"

"I see further, Sharp, than you bookmen do, in some matters. Boney's done for; that to me is quite plain, and earlier than I thought likely; although I, of course, as well as every other man with a head instead of a turnip on his shoulders, knew such a raw-head-and-bloody-bones as that must sooner or later come to the dogs. And as I also knew what agricultural prices were before the war, I can calculate without the aid of vulgar fractions, which, by the by, I never reached, what they'll be when its over. In two or three weeks people generally will get a dim notion of all this; and I sell, therefore, whilst I can, at top-prices."

The shrewdness of the calculation struck me at once. "You will take another farm when one can be had on easier terms than now, I suppose?"

"Yes, if I can manage it. And I will manage it. Between ourselves, after the old man's debts are paid, I shall only have nine or ten hundred pounds to this good, even by selling at the present tremendous rates; so it was time, you see, I pulled up, and rubbed the fog out of my eyes a bit. And, hark ye, Master Sharp," he added, as we rose and shook hands with each other—"I have now done playing with the world—it's a place of work and business, and I'll do my share of it so effectually, that my children, if I have any, shall, if I do not, reach the class of landed gentry; and this you'll find, for all your sneering, will come about all the more easily that neither they nor their father will be encumbered with much educational lumber. Good-by."

I did not again see my old school-fellow till the change he had predicted had thoroughly come to pass. Farms were everywhere to be let, and a general cry to parliament for aid rang through the land. Dutton called at the office upon business, accompanied by a young woman of remarkable personal comeliness, but, as a very few sentences betrayed, little or no education in the conventional sense of the word. She was the daughter of a farmer whom—it was no fault of hers—a change of the times had not found in a better condition for weathering them. Anne Mosely, in fact, was a thoroughly industrious, clever farm economist. The instant Dutton had secured an eligible farm, at his own price and conditions, he married her; and now, on the third day after the wedding, he had brought me a draft of the lease for examination.

"You are not afraid, then," I remarked, "of taking a farm in these bad times?"

"Not I—at a price. We mean to rough it, Mr. Sharp," he added gaily. "And, let me tell you, that those who will stoop to do that—I mean, take their coats off, tuck up their sleeves, and fling appearances to the winds—may, and will, if they understand their business, and have got their heads screwed on right, do better here than in any of the uncleared countries they talk so much about. You know what I told you down at Romford. Well, we'll manage that before our hair is gray, depend upon it, bad as the times may be—won't we, Nance?"

"We'll try, Jem," was the smiling response.

They left the draft for examination. It was found to be correctly drawn. Two or three days afterwards the deeds were executed, and James Dutton was placed in possession. The farm, in capital one, was in Essex.

His hopes were fully realized as to money-making, at all events. He and his wife rose early, eat up late, ate the bread of carefulness, and altogether displayed such persevering energy, that only about six or seven years had passed before the Duttons were accounted a rich and prosperous family. They had one child only—a daughter. The mother, Mrs. Dutton, died when this child was about twelve years of age; and Anne Dutton became more than ever the apple of her father's eye. The business of the farm went steadily on in its accustomed track; each succeeding year found James Dutton growing in wealth and importance; and his daughter in sparkling, catching comeliness—although certainly not in the refinement of manner which gives a quickening life and grace to personal symmetry and beauty. James Dutton remained firm in his theory of the worthlessness of education beyond what, in a narrow acceptation of the term, was absolutely "necessary;" and Anne Dutton, although now heiress to very considerable wealth, knew only how to read, write, spell, cast accounts, and superintend the home business of the farm. I saw a good deal of the Duttons about this time, my brother-in-law, Elsworthy, and his wife having taken up their abode within about half a mile of James Dutton's dwelling house; and I ventured once or twice to remonstrate with the prosperous farmer upon the positive danger, with reference to his ambitious views, of not at least so far cultivating the intellect and taste of so attractive a maiden as his daughter, that sympathy on her part with the rude, unlettered clowns, with whom she necessarily came so much in contact, should be impossible. He laughed my hints to scorn.

"It is idleness—idleness alone," he said, "that puts love fancies into girls' heads. Novel reading, jingling at a piano forte—merely other names for idleness—these are the parents of such follies. Anne Dutton, as mistress of this establishment, has her time fully and usefully occupied; and when the time comes, not far distant now, to establish her in marriage, she will wed into a family I wot of; and the Romford prophecy, of which you remind me, will be realized, in great part at least."

He found, too late, his error. He hastily entered the office one morning, and, although it was only five or six weeks since I had last seen him, the change in his then florid, prideful features, was so striking and painful, as to cause me to fairly leap upon my feet with surprise.

"Good heavens, Dutton!" I exclaimed, "what is the matter? What has happened?"

"Nothing has happened, Mr. Sharp," he replied, "but what you predicted, and which, had I not been the most conceited dolt in existence, I too, must have foreseen. You know that good looking, idle, and, I fear, irreclaimable young fellow, George Hamblin?"

"I have seen him once or twice. Has he not brought his father to the very verge of a workhouse by low dissipation and extravagance?"

"Yes. Well, he is an accepted suitor for Anne Dutton's hand. No wonder that you start. She fancies herself hopelessly in love with him——. Nay, Sharp, hear me out. I have tried expostulation, threats, entreaties, locking her up; but it's useless. I shall kill the silly fool, if I persist; and I have at length consented to the marriage; for I cannot see her die."

I began remonstrating upon the folly of yielding consent to so ruinous a marriage, on account of a few tears and hysterics, but Dutton stopped me peremptorily.

"It is useless talking," he said. "The die is cast; I have given my word. You would hardly recognize her, she is so altered. I did not know before," added the strong, stern man, with trembling voice and glistening eyes, "that she was so inextricably twined about my heart—my life!"

It is difficult to estimate the bitterness of such a disappointment to a proud, aspiring man like Dutton. I pitied him sincerely, mistaken, if not blameworthy, as he had been.

"I have only myself to blame," he presently resumed. "A girl of cultivated taste and mind could not have bestowed a single thought on George Hamblin. But let's to business. I wish the marriage settlement and my will to be so drawn that every farthing received from me during my life, and after my death, shall be hers, and hers only; and so strictly and entirely secured that she shall be without power to yield control over the slightest portion of it, should she be so minded." I took down his instructions, and the necessary deeds were drawn in accordance with them. The marriage was shortly afterwards solemnized, but I did not wait to witness the ceremony.

The husband's good behavior did not long endure; ere two months of wedded life were past he had fallen again into his old habits; and the wife, bitterly repentant of her folly, was fain to confess that nothing but dread of her father's vengeance saved her from positive ill usage. It was altogether a wretched, unfortunate affair, and the intelligence, sad in itself, which reached me about a twelvemonth after the marriage, that the mother had died in childbirth of her first-born, a girl, appeared to me rather a matter of rejoicing than of sorrow or regret. The shock to poor Dutton was, I understood, overwhelming for a time, and fears were entertained for his intellects. He recovered, however, and took charge of his grandchild, the father very willingly resigning the onerous burden.

My brother-in-law left James Dutton's neighborhood for a distant part of the country about this period, and I saw nothing of the bereaved father for about five years, save only at two business interviews. The business upon which I had seen him was the alteration of his will, by which all he might die possessed of was bequeathed to his darling Annie. His health, I was glad to find, was quite restored; and although now fifty years of age, the bright light of his young days sparkled once more in his keen glance. His youth was, he said, renewed in little Annie. He could even bear to speak, though still with remorseful emotion, of his own lost child.

"No fear, Sharp," he said, "that I make that terrible mistake again. Annie will fall in love, please God, with no unlettered, soulless booby! Her mind shall be elevated, beautiful and pure as her person. You must come and see her." I promised to do so; and he went his way. At one of these interviews—the first it must have been—I made a chance inquiry for his son-in-law, Hamblin. As the name passed my lips, a look of hate and rage flashed out of his burning eyes. I did not utter another word, nor did he, and we separated in silence.

It was evening, and I was returning in a gig from a rather long journey into the country, when I called, in redemption of my promise, upon James Dutton. Annie was really, I found, an engaging, pretty, blue-eyed, golden-haired child; and I was not so much surprised at her grandfather's doting fondness—a fondness entirely reciprocated, it seemed, by the little girl. It struck me, albeit, that it was a perilous thing for a man of Dutton's vehement, fiery nature to stake again, as he evidently had done, his all of life and happiness upon one frail existence. An illustration of my thought or fear occurred just after we had finished tea. A knock was heard at the outer door, and presently a man's voice, in quarrelling, drunken remonstrance, with the servant who opened it. The same deadly scowl I had seen sweep over Dutton's countenance upon the mention of Hamblin's name, again gleamed darkly there; and finding, after a moment or two, that the intruder would not be denied, the master of the house gently removed Annie from his knee and strode out of the room.

"Follow grandpapa," whispered Mrs. Rivers, a highly respectable widow of about forty years of age, whom Mr. Duttton had engaged, at a high salary, to superintend Annie's education. The child went out, and Mrs. Rivers, addressing me, said in a low voice, "Her presence will prevent violence; but it is a sad affair."

She then informed me that Hamblin, to whom Mr. Dutton allowed a hundred a year, having become aware of the father's fondness for Annie, systematically worked that knowledge for his own sordid ends, and preluded every fresh attack upon Mr. Dutton's purse by a threat to reclaim the child. "It is not the money," remarked Mrs. Rivers, in conclusion, "that Mr. Dutton cares so much for, but the thought that he holds Annie by the sufferance of that wretched man goads him at times almost to insanity."

"Would not the fellow waive his claim for a settled increase of his annuity?"

"No; that has been offered to the extent of three hundred a year; but Hamblin refuses, partly from the pleasure of keeping such a man as Mr. Dutton in his power, partly because he knows that the last shilling would be parted with rather than the child. It is a very unfortunate business, and I often fear will terminate badly." The loud, but indistinct wrangling without ceased after awhile, and I heard a key turn stiffly in the lock.

"The usual conclusion of these scenes," said Mrs. Rivers. "Another draft upon his strong box will purchase Mr. Dutton a respite as long as the money lasts."

I could hardly look at James Dutton when he re-entered the room. There was that in his countenance which I do not like to read in the faces of my friends. He was silent for several minutes; at last he said, quickly, sternly:

"Is there no instrument, Mr. Sharp, in all the enginery of law, that can defeat a worthless villain's legal claim to his child?"

"None; except, perhaps, a commission of lunacy, or——"

"Tush! tush!" interrupted Dutton; "this fellow has no wits to lose. That being so—but let us talk of something else." We did so, but on his part very incoherently; and I soon bade him good night.

This was in December, and it was in February, the following year, that Dutton again called at our place of business. There was a strange, stern, iron meaning in his face.

"I am in a great hurry," he said, "and I have only called to say, that I shall be glad if you will run over to the farm to-morrow, on a matter of business. You have seen, perhaps, in the paper, that my dwelling-house took fire the night before last. Have you not? Well, it is upon that I would consult you. Will you come?"

I agreed to do so, and he withdrew. The fire had not, I found, done much injury. It had commenced in a kind of miscellaneous store-room; but the origin of the fire appeared to me, as it did to the police officers that had been summoned, perfectly unaccountable.

"Had it not been discovered in time, and extinguished," I observed to Mrs. Rivers, "you would all have been burned in your beds."

"Why, no," replied that lady, with some strangeness of manner. "On the night of the fire, Annie and I slept at Mr. Elsworthy's," (I have omitted to notice, that my brother-in-law and family had returned to their old residence,) "and Mr. Dutton remained in London, whither he had gone to see the play."

"But the servants might have perished?"

"No. A whim, apparently, has lately seized Mr. Dutton, that no servant or laborer shall sleep under the same roof with himself; and those new outhouses, where their bedrooms are placed, are, you see, completely detached, and are indeed, as regards this dwelling, made fire-proof."

At this moment Mr. Dutton appeared, and interrupted our conversation. He took me aside.

"Well," he said, "to what conclusion have you come? The work of an incendiary, is it not? Somebody, too, that knows I am not insured"——

"Not insured?"

"No; not for this dwelling-house. I did not renew the policy some months ago."

"Then," I jestingly remarked, "you, at all events, are safe from any accusation of having set fire to your premises with the intent to defraud the insurers."

"To be sure I am," he rejoined with quick earnestness, as if taking my remark seriously. "That is quite certain. Some one, I am pretty sure it must be," he presently added, "that owes me a grudge—with whom I have quarreled, eh?"

"It may be so, certainly."

"It must be so. And what, Mr. Sharp, is the highest penalty for the crime of incendiarism?"

"By the recent change in the law, transportation only; unless, indeed, loss of human life occur in consequence of the felonious act; in which case, the English law construes the offence to be willful murder, although the incendiary may not have intended the death or injury of any person."

"I see. But here there could have been no loss of life."

"There might have been, had not you, Mrs. Rivers, and Annie, chanced to sleep out of the house."

"True, true; a diabolical villain no doubt. But we'll ferret him out yet. You are a keen hand Mr. Sharp, and will assist, I know. Yes, yes; it's some fellow that hates me—that I perhaps hate and loathe," he added, with sudden, gnashing fierceness, and striking his hand with furious violence on the table—"as I do a spotted toad!"

I hardly recognized James Dutton in this fitful, disjointed talk, and as there was really nothing to be done or to be inquired into, I soon went away.

"Only one week's interval," I hastily remarked to Mr. Flint one morning, after glancing at the newspaper, "and another fire at Dutton's farmhouse!"

"The deuce! He is in the luck of it, apparently," replied Flint, without looking up from his employment. "My partner knew Dutton only by sight."

The following morning I received a note from Mrs. Rivers. She wished to see me immediately on a matter of great importance. I hastened to Mr. Dutton's, and found, on arriving there, that George Hamblin was in custody, and undergoing an examination, before two county magistrates, on the charge of having fired Mr. Dutton's premises. The chief evidence was, that Hamblin had been seen lurking about the place just before the flames broke out, and that near the window where an incendiary might have entered, were found portions of several lucifer matches, of a particular make, and corresponding to a number found in Hamblin's bed room. To this Hamblin replied, that he had come to the house by Mr. Dutton's invitation, but found nobody there. This, however, was vehemently denied by Mr. Dutton. He had made no appointment with Hamblin to meet him at his, Dutton's house. How should he, purposing as he did to be in London at the time? With respect to the lucifer matches, Hamblin said he had purchased them of a mendicant, and that Mr. Dutton saw him do so. This also was denied. It was further proved that Hamblin, when in drink, had often said he would ruin Dutton before he died. Finally, the magistrates, though with some hesitation, decided that there was hardly sufficient evidence to warrant them in committing the prisoner for trial, and he was discharged, much to the rage and indignation of the prosecutor.

Subsequently, Mrs. Rivers and I had a long private conference. She and the child had again slept at Elsworthy's, on the night of the fire, and Dutton in London. "His excuse is," said Mrs. Rivers, "that he cannot permit us to sleep here unprotected by his presence." We both arrived at the same conclusion, and at last agreed upon what should be done, attempted rather, and that without delay.

Just before taking leave of Mr. Dutton, who was in an exceedingly excited state, I said: "By the bye Dutton, you have promised to dine with me on some early day. Let it be next Tuesday. I shall have one or two bachelor friends, and we can give you a shako-down for the night."

"Next Tuesday!" said he quickly. "At what hour do you dine?"

"At six. Not a half-moment later."

"Good! I will be with you." We then shook hands, and parted.

The dinner would have been without interest to me, had not a note previously arrived from Mrs. Rivers, stating that she and Annie were again to sleep that night at Elsworthy's. This promised results.

James Dutton, who rode into town, was punctual, and, as always of late, flurried, excited, nervous—not, in fact, it appeared to me, precisely in his right mind. The dinner passed off as dinners usually do, and the after proceedings went on very comfortably till about half-past nine o'clock, when Dutton's perturbation, increased perhaps by the considerable quantity of wine he had swallowed, not drunk, became, it was apparent to everybody, almost uncontrollable. He rose—purposely it seemed—sat down again—drew out his watch almost every minute, and answered remarks addressed to him in the wildest manner. The decisive moment was, I saw, arrived, and at a gesture of mine, Elsworthy, who in my confidence, addressed Dutton.

"By the way, Dutton, about Mrs. Rivers and Annie. I forgot to tell you of it before."

The restless man was on his feet in an instant, and glaring with fiery eagerness at the speaker.

"What! what!" he cried, with explosive quickness, "what about Annie? Death and fury! speak, will you!"

"Don't alarm yourself, my good fellow. It's nothing of consequence. You brought Annie and her governess, about an hour before I started, to sleep at our house——"

"Yes—yes," gasped Dutton, white as death, and every fibre of his body shaking with terrible dread. "Yes—well, well, go on! Thunder and lightning! out with it, will you?"

"Unfortunately, two female cousins arrived soon after you went away, and I was obliged to escort Annie and Mrs. Rivers home again."

A wild shriek—yell is perhaps the more appropriate expression—burst from the conscience and fear-stricken man. Another instant and he had torn his watch from the fob, glanced at it with dilated eyes, dashed it on the table, and was rushing madly towards the door, vainly withstood by Elsworthy, who feared we had gone too far.

"Out of the way!" screamed the madman. "Let go, or I'll dash you to atoms!" Suiting the action to the threat, he hurled my brother-in-law against the wall with stunning force, and rushed on, shouting incoherently—"My horse! There is time yet! Tom Edwards, my horse!"

Tom Edwards was luckily at hand, and although mightily surprised at the sudden uproar, which he attributed to Mr. Dutton being in drink, mechanically assisted to saddle, bridle, and bring out the roan mare; and before I could reach the stables, Dutton's foot was in the stirrup. I shouted "stop," as loudly as I could, but the excited horseman did not heed, perhaps not hear me; and away he went, at a tremendous speed, hatless, and his long gray-tinted hair streaming in the wind. It was absolutely necessary to follow. I therefore directed Elsworthy's horse, a much swifter and more peaceful animal than Dutton's, to be brought out; and as soon as I got into the high country road, I too dashed along at a rate much too headlong to be altogether pleasant. The evening was clear and bright, and I now and then caught a distant sight of Dutton, who was going at a frantic pace across the country, and putting his horse at leaps that no man in his senses would have attempted. I kept the high road, and we had thus ridden about half an hour, perhaps, when a bright flame about a mile distant, as the crow flies, shot suddenly forth, strongly relieved against a mass of dark wood just beyond it. I knew it to be Dutton's house, even without the confirmation given by the frenzied shout which at the same moment arose on my left hand. It was from Dutton. His horse had been staked, in an effort to clear a high fence, as he was hurrying desperately along on foot. I tried to make him hear me, or to reach him, but found I could do neither; his own wild cries and imprecations drowned my voice, and there were impassable fences between the high road and the fields across which he madly hasted.

The flames were swift this time, and defied the efforts of the servants and husbandmen who had come to the rescue, to stay, much less to quell them. Eagerly as I rode, Dutton arrived before the blazing pile at nearly the same moment as myself, and even as he fiercely struggled with two or three men, who strove by main force to prevent him from rushing into the flames, only to meet with certain death, the roof and floor of the building fell in with a sudden crash. He believed that all was over with the child, and again hurling forth the wild despairing cry I had twice before heard that evening, he fell down, as if smitten by lightning, upon the hard frosty road.

It was many days ere the unhappy, sinful man recovered his senses, many weeks before he was restored to his accustomed health. Very cautiously had the intelligence been communicated to him that Annie had not met the terrible fate, the image of which had incessantly pursued him through his fevered dreams. He was a deeply grateful, and, I believe, a penitent and altogether changed man.

He purchased, through my agency, a valuable farm in a distant county, in order to be out of the way, not only of Hamblin, on whom he settled two hundred a year, but of others, myself included, who knew or suspected him of the foul intention he had conceived against his son-in-law, and which, but for Mrs. Rivers, would, on the last occasion, have been, in all probability, successful, so cunningly had the evidences of circumstances been devised. "I have been," said James Dutton to me at the last interview I had with him, "all my life an overweening self-confident fool. At Romford, I boasted to you that my children should ally themselves with the landed gentry of the country, and see the result! The future, please God, shall find me in my duty—mindful only of that, and content, while so acting, with whatever shall befall me or mine."

Dutton continues to prosper in the world; Hamblin died several years ago of delirium tremens; and Annie, I hear, will, in all probability, marry into the squirearchy of the country. All this is not, perhaps, what is called poetical justice, but my experience has been with the actual, not the ideal world.

A VETERAN OF THE REVOLUTION.—The N. Y. Tribune was recently honored by a visit from Daniel Spencer, of Canajoharie, N. Y., who was born in 1762, and is, consequently, now ninety years old. He was born in Connecticut, and was a shoemaker's apprentice when he enlisted in the continental army, and thus legally canceled his indentures. He served over five years in a regiment of light dragoons, which was stationed for a good part of the time on the debatable ground between the lines of the two main armies, mainly in Westchester county, New York. He often acted as escort to Washington; once when the latter, with a staff of French and American officers, reconnoitered, from the high grounds north of Harlem, the British forces near Fort Washington, in contemplation of an attack on the City of New York. The reconnoissance was made under a heavy fire of round and chain-shot from the British lines, which riddled some trees around the General and staff, and caused some involuntary ducking of heads, but killed none. Once Mr. Spencer was one of a guard of six men on board a sloop from Albany loaded with bread for the American army, which was cut out by British boats while lying near Torrytown, and a sergeant killed, and the captain badly wounded—all but the sergeant escaping by jumping overboard and swimming or wading to the shore. At another time he made one of a squadron drawn from his regiment, which escorted John Adams and Thomas Jefferson from the American headquarters above New York to the seat of government, (Philadelphia,) and were on their way back when they met the great body of the American and French troops marching quietly and rapidly southward to fix Cornwallis in Virginia. He served to the end of the Revolution, and has for some years enjoyed a small pension, which, his aged wife being prostrated with lingering disease, and he near the end of his capacity to labor, he needs and gratefully accepts, though he has children living who would not see him suffer from want.

HENRY CLAY AND HIS CONTEMPORARIES.—At the time of Henry Clay's second election or appointment to the U. S. Senate, on the 4th of January, 1810, there were only seventeen States in the Union. George Clinton was Vice President of the United States; Samuel Smith, of Maryland, President pro tem. of the Senate, and Samuel A. Otis, of Massachusetts, Secretary. Of all the distinguished body which composed the Senate at that time, Henry Clay has been for some time the only living representative.

Of the contemporary statesmen and others, Jefferson, then President; Nathaniel Macon, Speaker of the House of Representatives; Chief Justice Marshall; Judges Chase, of Maryland; Washington, of Virginia; Johnson, of South Carolina; Livingston, of New York; Cushing, of Massachusetts, of the Supreme Court; James Madison, then Secretary of State; Albert Gallatin, of the Treasury; Henry Dearborn, of War; Jacob Crowninshield, of the Navy; Gideon Granger, Postmaster General; Attorney-General Breckenridge—not one remains.

CLAY AND RANDOLPH.—The Boston Journal thus alludes to the duel which took place between John Randolph and Mr. Clay:

"The particulars of the duel are well known. The eccentric descendant of Pocahontas appeared on the ground in a huge morning gown. This garment constituted such a vast circumference that the locality of the swarthy Senator was at least a matter of very vague conjecture. The parties exchanged shots, and the ball of Mr. Clay hit the centre of the visible object, but Mr. Randolph was not there! The latter had fired in the air, and immediately after the exchange of shots he walked up to Mr. Clay, parted the folds of his gown, pointed to the hole where the ball of the former had pierced his coat, and, in the shrillest tones of his piercing voice exclaimed," Mr. Clay, you owe me a coat—you owe me a coat!" to which Mr. Clay replied in a voice of slow and solemn emphasis, at the same time pointing directly at Mr. Randolph's heart, "Mr. Randolph, I thank God that I am no deeper in your debt!"

LOUISIANA STATE CONVENTION.—Baton Rouge, July 13.—Yesterday the Convention passed without alteration, article 38 of the constitution, defining in whom the executive power shall rest, and how the Governor and Lieutenant Governor shall be elected.

Article 39 defining the qualities required to make a person eligible for these offices, was made the order of the day for to-day.

Article 40 and 41, describing the term of Gubernatorial office and the occupant's ineligibility for a certain time after one term were passed without alteration.

Article 42, making ineligible to the office of Governor or Lieutenant Governor certain persons, was amended by striking out "or minister of any religious society," and was passed.

Articles 43, 44, 45 and 46, referring particularly to the Lieutenant Governor's powers and duties, were passed without alteration.

A. D. Hughes, of New Orleans, was appointed Postmaster to the Convention.

To-day, at half-past 12 o'clock, after the reading of the Journal, Mr. J. E. Layet resigned his office as Secretary.

Col. J. B. Walton was elected in his place, without opposition.

A resolution to create a committee on internal improvements gave rise to much discussion, and was referred to the Committee on General Provisions.

Article 47, touching the Governor's power to reprieve and pardon, was passed without alteration.

Article 39 then came up. Mr. C. A. Bullard offered an amendment, making electors of twenty-five years of age and five years residence in the State eligible as Governor or Lieutenant Governor.

Mr. N. R. Jennings offered a sub-amendment, substituting "thirty years of age" and "six years residence." Lost by 41 yeas and 63 nays.

Mr. Bullard's amendment was taken up: Yeas 58, nays 57. The Chair voted in the negative, and the amendment was lost.

J. P. Waddell offered an amendment, making qualified electors eligible. Yeas 57, nays 60. Lost.

Mr. Carter offered a substitute, "five years residence" the point of eligibility.

Mr. Richardson, of Ouachita, offered an amendment, inserting "thirty years of age."

This was laid on the table by 79 yeas and 34 nays.

The vote is now being taken on Carter's substitute.—[Evening Picayune.]

B. H. FAHNESTOCK'S VERMIFUGE!

The Safest and Most Effective

THAT has ever been discovered. This preparation has now stood the test of twenty-two years' trial, and is confidently recommended as a safe and effectual medicine for expelling worms from the system.

The proprietor has made it a point to ascertain the result of its use in such cases as came within his knowledge and observation, and he invariably found it to produce the most salutary effects; not unfrequently, after nearly all the ordinary preparations for worms, had been previously resorted to without any permanent advantage. This fact is attested by the certificates and statements of hundreds of respectable persons in different parts of the country, and should induce families always to keep a vial of the preparation in their possession. It is mild in its operation and may be administered with perfect safety to the most delicate infant. ☞ Sold by all Druggists in New Orleans, and by nearly all Druggists and country merchants in the United States. may22-1y

ROBBING PETER TO PAY PAUL.—In the time of Edward VI., much of the lands of St. Peter, at Westminster, were seized by the Majesty's ministers and courtiers; but in order to reconcile the people to that robbery, they allowed a portion of the lands to be appropriated toward the repairs of St. Paul's Church. Hence the phrase, "robbing Peter to pay Paul."

THE WEEDING AND WEDDING,

Or, the Man for a New Settlement.

BY GEORGE W. BUNDAY.

Parson Truman was a modest, unassuming person, who disliked mere outside display. He was a plain, practical man, a ripe scholar, a profound logician, an earnest preacher. His knowledge was not bounded by the limits of his library; his labors were not confined to the pulpit; his influence extended beyond the parish where he expounded the Scriptures.

He belonged to a class of Christians who believed the itinerant system superior to any other. At the annual conference he made no pretty speeches, no platform harangues; and was never invited to preach the yearly sermons. Year after year, he uncomplainingly received his appointment to toil on in some remote settlement in the backwoods; while men of more confidence, but less intellect, more zeal, but less knowledge, more words, but fewer deeds, were sent to large towns and larger cities, where they secured greater audiences, received better compensation, had more favorable opportunities to improve their minds and win golden opinions of appreciating people.

Parson Truman had to serve as a lawyer, physician, teacher, priest, and confidential friend, in new settlements, where professional gentlemen are few and far between. At the time of which I write, he lived in a log house. When at home, he spent a part of his leisure time in cultivating a little patch of ground which belonged to the parsonage. Sometimes his little farm, as he called it, would be overrun with weeds, for his circuit extended several miles, and frequently kept him from home more than a week at a time.

One day, he returned and saw the weeds standing among the vegetables, like Philistines among the Israelites, and he determined to uproot them, and remove them from the land.

"Wife," said he, "I must go to work in the garden to-day. If any person calls to see me, tell them that I am engaged. No person can see me while I am weeding behind that regiment of corn-stalks."

He pulled off his best coat, which had been black, rolled up his sleeves, and commenced the task before him. Spear-grass, pig-weeds, sour-plant, and the whole tribe of weeds had taken possession of the little strip of land, and looked down contemptuously upon the stunted plants beneath them.

It was washing-day, and Mrs. Truman was hanging her clothes upon the linen line, when a sun-browned woodman, with an honest face, inquired if brother Truman was at home.

"Yes, but he is engaged," replied the dear little woman, with a smile, for she could be good natured even on Monday, while at work over the washtub. Think of that, ye Xantipes, who fret, spout, and thump away at such times and under such circumstances.

"If he is at home, I must see him a few moments."

"He left positive orders with me to allow no one to disturb him."

"I won't detain him from his studies but a short time."

"He is at work in the garden—"

The man did not stop to hear the conclusion of what she said, but unceremoniously walked through the gateway, and found the good man pulling up weeds as though they were unpardonable sins.

"Well, brother, I have found you at last. My horse is lame, and as you are something of a doctor, I thought I would ask your advice."

"Is he unable to walk or work?" inquired the doctor.

"He limps about on three legs a little. I wish you would step up to our place and see him."

"Well, I have agreed to marry a couple a short distance beyond your house, and I will call on my way to the wedding."

In order to make up lost time, the minister now worked harder than he did before he had been interrupted.

The first caller had not got out of sight, when a woman in dishabille, with her dishevelled hair streaming over her white face, came to the door, and asked if the Rev. Mr. Truman was at home.

"He is at home, but his engagements are such that he can not be interrupted just now," observed his wife.

"Oh, dear me, what shall I do?" exclaimed the woman, wringing her hands, and weeping as though her sufferings were intense, and the minister was the only one who could alleviate them.

"Wait a moment," said Mrs. Truman, "I will ask him if he can be seen."

"Husband!"

"Well, my dear, what do you want now?"

"Here is a woman—"

"I can not help it."

"Hear what I have to say. Here is a woman in great distress; she is anxious to see you immediately."

The parson threw down a handfull of wicked weeds so suddenly, a stranger might have supposed he was angry; but he was only a little excited. Perhaps he thought the transgressors he was driving from his piece of land ought to be cast into outer darkness, where they would be burned.

"What do you want, my good woman!" he asked, somewhat impatiently.

"Oh, sir! we have had such a row in our settlement. Mrs. Jinkins' child threw a stone, which broke Mrs. Sparkins' window, and Mrs. Sparkins told the child to clear out; and when Mrs. Jinkins heard of it, she came to Mrs. Sparkins' house, and told her she was no better than she ought to be; and Mrs. Sparkins declared she was; and then Mrs. Jenkins said she was a liar; then Mrs. Sparkins spat in her face; and then Mrs. Jinkins pulled her hair; and then Mrs. Sparkins tore the dress of her back; and Mrs. Jackins cried murder, and I run after you."

"What were they doing when you came away?"

"Pulling hair, sir, and screaming murder!"

"What do you expect I can do in such a case?"

"Why, preach to them, and bleed them, sir, and stop them from going to law," said the frightened woman, who evidently had more faith in the minister than she had in the gospel.

"How far is your settlement from where the wedding is to be this evening?"

"About a mile, sir."

"I will call about seven o'clock."

The good man returned to his garden, where he had made but little progress; but as soon as he had got hold of the enemy, a teamster climbed over the fence, and asked him if he could be so kind as to put his shoulder to the wheel, and give him a lift through a mudhole at the foot of the hill.

He could not put that off until he went to the marriage, so he went to work, and while they were jerking and pulling the load about, the wagon broke.

Mr. Truman had a box of tools, and knew how to use them. The wagon was soon repaired, and the teamster went whistling and singing on his way, and the minister returned to his garden once more.

Just as he kneeled down before a bed of onions, as though he intended to copy the example of the Egyptians, and worship them, a loud rap was heard at the door. The minister could have wept without rubbing his eyes with the onions that stood unweeded there; but he resolved to be angry, and sin not.

The door was opened, and there stood the class-leader's son, anxious to see Mr. Truman.

Mr. Truman was called into the house.

"What do you want, my son?" inquired the minister.

"Father wants to borrow the Commentary on Luke, and the last newspaper."

"Wife, get them," said he; then turning to the boy, he remarked: "The next time you want anything of that nature, ask Mrs. Truman; she can get the books for you as well as I can."

It was now twelve o'clock, so the minister thought it best to take a "bite" of victuals. He sat down with his wife and child to a "picked-up dinner." Before he rose from the table an Irishman made his appearance, and modestly asked if the preacher lived there.

"Yes," was the answer.

"Will yer be so kind as to write a letther for me to the ould counthry?"

"By-and-by."

"May the blissid Virgin protict ye!"

"Take a chair."

"Will ye be aither doing it soon?"

"Right away after dinner."

The writing of the letter occupied at least an hour, and before he concluded it, a pretty little boy came to the house, and asked for that "shot" he (the preacher) had recommended to his sick mother.

"Powder, you mean," said Mr. Truman, with a smile.

"Yes, sir, I meant to say powder," replied the lad, blushing to his temples.

"Now, husband," said the good natured wife, "let me persuade you not to go into the garden again this afternoon. Stay in the house and mend the children's shoes, so that they can go to school to-morrow."

He finally made up his mind that it was better to sit there in the shade, than to stoop out-doors in the sun; so the shoes were repaired and the weeds left undisturbed.

When that job was finished it was time to prepare for the wedding. After performing the duties of barber and boot-black, he turned hostler and saddled his pony, departed in peace, and went on his way rejoicing. He halted at Blake's barn, and examined the "lame mare."

"She has a nail in her foot," said he; "hand me a pair of nippers, and I will remove the shoe. Now," continued the preacher, while he stood there with the pincers in one hand, and the shoe in the other, "bathe the foot with salt and vinegar, keep her shut up in the stable, and she will be well in a fortnight."

After marrying the couple, he mounted his pony, turned his face toward the new settlement, and put up at the house of a Christian brother. He gave directions for Mrs. Jenkins, Mrs. Sparkins, and their friends, to meet him there. The house was crowded with the parties and their acquaintances.

"Mrs. Jenkins, did your boy break Mrs. Sparkins' window?"

"Yes, sir."

"Well, Mrs. Jenkins, of course you are willing to pay for the window, are you not?"

"Certainly I am."

"Mrs. Sparkins, did you spit in Mrs. Jenkins' face?"

"Yes, I did so when I was angry."

"You are sorry for it now, are you not?"

"Yes, sir, I am," she said, and then rubbed her eyes with one corner of her apron.

"Do you hear that, Mrs. Jenkins?"

"I do."

"Will you forgive her?"

"With all my heart."

"Now shake hands. God bless you. Good night!"

Mr. Truman returned home another way, in order to see the sick woman and give further directions respecting the powders. He found the medicine curing the patient, and had the good fortune to meet the class-leader there, who handed him the paper, and promised to return the Commentary in a few days.

When this useful, practical, accommodating man reached home, he was quite fatigued, but happy to think the day had not been spent in vain. One reason why he was anxious to weed the garden was, because there was to be a donation party at his house the next day, and he did not wish to have his premises look as though he was slothful and lazy. After a delicious sleep and pleasant dreams, the donation day arrived. Parson Truman helped his wife to provide for a large number of guests. He made the fire, pared the potatoes, churned the butter, watched the oven, scoured the knives and forks, and made himself generally useful.

Soon after sunset, the neighbors of the denominations began to arrive. Blake came with one horse hitched to the wagon; the mare that mated the noble animal he drove was too lame to travel yet. He brought with him a new cheese, a quarter of veal, and three or four bushels of corn. The sick woman sent her boy with a new dress for Mrs. Truman. The class-leader brought a side of bacon and a dollar in money. Mrs. Sparkins, Mrs. Jenkins and the young window smasher came together, and brought a beautiful quilt, the result of the united labors of the ladies in the settlement. The sewing was neatly executed. It was originally designed for the missionaries of Liberia; but some one suggested that the climate of Africa was warm enough without quilts, so the sewing circle concluded to present it to Mr. Truman. By-and-by the teamster came with a wagon-load of people from his settlement. They came quite a distance, and brought money. Their united donations amounted to fifteen dollars.

The Irishman was on hand. He said he had not much to give, but he would make himself useful by taking care of the horses of other visitors.

It was a pleasant evening; the moon sailed like a ship of light through the calm heavens. When tea was over, some of the company began to joke with the minister respecting the unweeded garden:

"Sure an' we might weed the garden by moonlight," said Pat.

The company took the hint and went to work most cheerfully. Many hands made light work. When the party separated, the garden was in good trim, and every guest went home with a glad heart.

The Rev. Mr. Truman remained on that circuit two years; at the expiration of that time, a petition was sent to the Conference, praying that he might be returned; but it was contrary to the usages of that body to continue a minister more than two years at a time on the same circuit.

Joe Hewel, the teamster, and Mary Simpson, who ran after the minister when the row happened in her settlement, became acquainted with each other at the donation party; ever after that they attended meeting when Mr. Truman preached in Sparkins' school house. Just before the good man, who was a universal favorite, left that circuit, he married this couple. Mr. Truman got up into notice by degrees, and has charge of one of the best stations within the jurisdiction of the Conference.

He has not forgotten how to mend a pair of shoes, repair a broken wagon, dispense medicine to the sick, help his wife about the house, and act as peace-maker when the hasty in spirit are disposed to quarrel. He is just "the man for a new settlement," or any other situation.

BEAR WITH ONE ANOTHER.—Rev. Dr. Boardman, in his excellent book, "The Bible in the Family," well remarks:

"That house will be kept in a turmoil where there is no tolerance of each other's secrets, no lenity shown to failings, no meek submission to injuries, no soft answers to turn away wrath. If you lay a single stick of wood upon the andirons, and apply fire to it, it will go out: put on another stick and they will burn; add a half dozen, and you will have a grand conflagration. There are other fires subject to the same conditions. If one member of a family gets into a passion and is let alone, he will cool down, and possibly be ashamed and repent. But oppose temper to temper; pile on the fuel; draw in the other members of the group, and let one harsh answer be followed by another, and there will soon be a blaze which will enwrap them all in its lurid splendors. The venerable Philip Henry understood this well, and when his son Matthew, the Commentator, was married, he sent these lines to the wedded pair:

"Love one another, pray oft together; and see
You never both together angry be:
If one speak fire, t'other with water come;
Is one provoked? be t'other soft or dumb."

"OUT, OF THE MOUTHS OF BABES," ETC.—A physician of high standing, an opposer of religion, was about to start for California, when his little child came to him and handed him a Testament, saying, "Pa, you must take this read on the road." He pushed away the child in a passion, saying, that he did not want to be encumbered with any such thing. His wife persuaded him to take it to please the child. On his way to the gold regions he was taken dangerously sick, and his companions were obliged to leave him, as they thought, to die. He became alarmed for his sins, and was about to give up in despair, when he thought of the Testament. He commenced reading it, and his mind was led to take hold of the promises, and to accept of Christ as his Savior. He recovered from his sickness, went to the gold regions, and a few days since returned home rich, not in the treasures of Egypt, but in that more durable substance that fadeth not away, eternal in the heavens. AVOID CONTENTION.—Let us not trouble ourselves and our neighbors with unprofitable disputations, but all agree to spread to the uttermost of our power the quiet and peaceable gospel of Christ. Near fifty years ago, a great and good man, Dr. Potter, then Archbishop of Canterbury, gave me an advice, for which I have ever since had occasion to bless God. "If you desire to be extensively useful, do not spend your time or strength in contending for or against such things as are of a disputable nature, but in testifying against open, notorious, vice, and in promoting real essential holiness." Let us keep to this; leaving a thousand disputable points to those that have no better business than to toss the ball of controversy to and fro, let us keep to our point. Let us bear a faithful testimony in our several stations against all ungodliness, and with all our might recommend that inward and outward holiness "without which no man shall see the Lord." THE VILLAGE SLANDER.

BY WM. COMSTOCK.

When Mr. Blasset, a worthy old inhabitant of our village was going to mill, some two or three weeks ago, he met Mr. Samuel Gore, and after exchanging the customary salutations with each other, the two gentlemen held a short conversation.

"Do tell me, neighbor Gore, what sort of a man is that Windham, who has lately taken a house near you?"

"I don't like to speak ill of my neighbors," replied Gore, "but I am afraid he is not such a man as you could approve or esteem."

"Indeed! why so?"

"I fear he is a man of very high temper—a very dangerous man in fact," said the other.

"That is bad—very bad," cried Blasset shaking his head. "The worst is his own, for I had intended to offer him a prime situation, and a profitable one—but if he is a man of violent temper he would not answer our purpose. It is a pity, but it cannot be helped."

Mr. Blasset rode on, and Mr. Gore also went about his business.

Two days afterward, there were a party of young people at Squire Blackwell's house, and during the evening a couple of young ladies present, discoursed as follows:

"Have you seen Miss Jones lately?"

"No, I have not. I understood she is very melancholy."

"That is not strange. It was cruel in her parents to break up the match."

"Not altogether cruel, when everything is considered. I am certain that if I were in their situation, I should not want to marry a daughter of mine to such a man as Mr. Windham."

"But perhaps it is not so bad as they have been led to suppose."

"Yet, only think of it! To attack a poor old man in that way! Really, I must defend the conduct of Mr. and Mrs. James. I think they would have proved wanting in their duty to their daughter, if they had permitted the marriage to take place."

"But will he not sue for a breach of promise?"

"That admits not of a doubt. A man of so malleleus and fiery a disposition will leave no stone unturned. He will make trouble for them if he can."

"Well, it is a sad affair. How much mischief is done in this world, and how many innocent persons are made to suffer by the ungovernable passions of an individual!"

On the day after the above conversation had taken place, there was a number of persons gathered together in the village tavern, talking politics, discoursing about the news of the day, and playing at checkers. The Post-office was kept at the tavern, and occasionally some person was obliged to run the gauntlet through clouds of tobacco smoke, projecting legs, and obtrusive elbows, before he could win his way to the bar, and make the necessary inquiry. Not much notice was taken, however, of those applicants, until a young man of modest bearing, and apparently with some hesitation, entered the room, and pressed through the crowd for the purpose of obtaining a letter. All eyes were immediately turned upon him, and his countenance betrayed considerable anxiety and agitation, when he overheard the remarks which were made about him, some of which were obviously intended for his ear.

After leaving the tavern this young man passed quickly up the main road for about the distance of a quarter of a mile, when he turned off into a path leading into a piece of woods, and then he slacked his pace. He went slowly forward, muttering to himself, while his features worked with strong emotion, and an occasional tear glistened in his eyes. When he had reached the middle of the wood he became sensible that some person was approaching him from the opposite direction. He would fain have turned aside, but it was too late, and suddenly the minister of the village church stood before him.

"Good day, Mr. Windham," was the sudden address of that gentleman; "I have been to your house, but you were not at home. I have desired to see you for several days. Nay, be not dismayed, I come on a friendly errand. I have heard of your misfortunes, and desire to alleviate if not wholly remove them. There seems to be a strong prejudice against you in this place, and I suspect that it is ill-founded."

"Indeed it is," replied Windham; "I know not what it means. I have some enemy, here who has crossed me at every turn. Strange stories are reported concerning me, and I know not from what source they have taken their rise. Even now I went to the post-office for a letter; every one stared at me as if I had been the great giraffe from Africa, and when they whispered to one another, I could hear them say, 'He has the gallows written on his forehead!' 'What a haag-dog countenance!' 'See how his eyes glare!' I am certain I do not know what it means."

"I believe you," said the minister, taking his hand, "and I am persuaded that the people of this village labor under some mistake respecting you. It is said that you are hasty and passionate, and, I understand, it was on that score that the parents of"—

Perceiving that Windham was becoming much agitated, the speaker paused. He resumed in a few moments—"No matter. I wish to put you in a way to remove the imputations which have been cast upon you. If you are innocent you have nothing to fear. Fix upon some one person who has evinced dislike toward you. Go to him in a frank and manly way. See him alone, and persuade him to give you the name of the individual from whom he derived his information respecting you. Then go to the individual named, and require the authority by which he has spoken ill of you. When the foundation of these reports is once laid bare, you may annihilate it with a single breath."

"You impose upon me an arduous and painful task," replied the young man.

"There is but one right way to do anything," said the minister. "It is the part of virture to show its head. Vice skulks in dens and caves. You must put on the armor of faith, and believe that victory, sooner or later, crowns the right. Confidence in the power of justice and truth, gives moral courage. I beg that you will play the man in this matter."

Windham seemed to catch the spirit of his adviser, and promised to follow his directions. He bade the Rev. Mr. Rogers good bye, and walked directly back to the tavern. He stood at the door of the bar-room and looked in. A general sneer was the consequence. There were frowns and mutterings, whisperings and threatening gestures. For a moment Windham's heart misgave him. In another instant he was at the side of one of his persecutors. "Mr. Jones, I desire to speak to you in private," said he. Now Mr. Jones was a professor of religion, and a member of the church; yet he had suffered himself to become violently prejudiced against the young man. This sudden challenge to a personal interview was as unexpected to him as to the other individuals present. He blushed and looked about him as if doubtful what course to take. He saw that the eyes of all present were upon him, and he thought best to grant the request of the youth. They walked out together, and stood upon the green in front of the church.

"Mr. Jones," said Windham, "you appear to have heard some slanderous report respecting me. Will you be so kind as to give the name of my traducer?"

"Well, sir," said the other, "you have some assurance, seeing that I am a stranger to you. What if I should say that you had no right to demand such a thing of me? It's not my way, to make trouble between other folks. I've heard enough to convince me that you ought not to be tolerated in this town."

"What was the story that you heard, sir?"

"What did I hear? Ask your own conscience. Your countenance shows it now. A person that wasn't guilty, would not tremble and turn pale as you do. I suppose you will deny that you attempted your uncle's life?"

"I, sir! I don't understand you. Here is some mistake. I beg you—I beseech you to give me the name of the person who told you so."

"In order that you may go and attempt his life too, I suppose. No—no—young man; you don't carry on such business in this village, I warrant you."

"Then you will not give up the name of your informer."

"I tell you I will not, for every body knows." Here Mr. Jones suddenly paused, and betrayed some emotion. Windham followed the direction of his eyes, and turning his head, saw Mr. Rogers looking over his shoulder, upon the countenance of Jones, with a steady but stern aspect.

"Ahem! this young man has been telling me"—commenced Mr. Jones.

"I beg you will continue your conversation with me," said Mr. Rogers. "As I am privy to the subject of your discourse, I suppose you can have no objection to my presence."

"Certainly not, Mr. Rogers," returned the other. "He is a very dangerous young man, as you have heard, no doubt. He wants me to give up the name of the person who told me his true character. But that would make mischief, you know."

"Have you reported the story to any other individual?" inquired the minister.

"I can't deny but what I have," answered the other.

"Were you not afraid that you should make mischief by so doing?" asked Mr. Rogers. Surely a man who evinces so much tenderness of conscience, ought to be careful how he gives currency to idle rumors.

"Idle rumors, sir! Would Mr. Gore report a falsehood?"

"I will see Mr. Gore immediately," said the youth with some eagerness.

"Do so," said the minister, as he turned to go home, and left Mr. Jones alone upon the green, in a state of bewilderment.

Windham hastened to the farm-house, and found Mr. Gore smoking his pipe in the corner of his antiquated fire-place.

"Good-day, sir," said the young man.

Gore was in no haste to reply to the unexpected salutation; but suffering the smoke to clear away from before his vision, and half-shutting his eyes, he peered earnestly through his knitted brows, as if doubting the identity of his visitor.

The youth felt as if he had no time to lose.

"Sir," said he, "I have been shunned by my acquaintances, denied admittance to the house of Mr. James, and stared at like a wild beast in a menagerie, for several days past."

"For your bad conduct—oh, young man!"

"No, sir—but because you have reported that I tried to kill my uncle."

"I did not say exactly so," returned Mr. Gore. "But I heard that you made a murderous assault upon your uncle with an axe."

"Who said so?"

"I heard it from Mr. Smith, and he says he will not eat his own words."

"Thank you, sir!" cried Windham; and he ran to the store kept by Smith.

"Good afternoon, Mr. Smith," said he hastily.

"Well, sir," returned Smith coldly.

"Did you report that I attacked my uncle with an axe?" said the young man.

"Certainly I did," responded the store-keeper.

"Did you not confess this crime to me yourself?"

"Never!" exclaimed Windham.

"What!" cried Smith; "did I not meet you in the road the other day, with a staff in your hand, and did I not ask you how you did, and—"

"I remember it all—how strange!" exclaimed Wyndham. "Now, all who are present will be good enough to listen to me. I met Mr Smith in the road the other day. I had a staff in my hand, for I was lame. He asked me how I did, and I replied that I had hurt my ANKLE with an axe."

"Did you not say that you hurt your UNCLE with an axe?" cried the store-keeper, blushing as red as scarlet.

"By no means," cried Windham; and he immediately stripped down his stocking and laid bare a scar upon his ankle; which had evidently been the result of a blow from an axe.

"The young man is right—it was my mistake!" said the storekeeper. Give me your hand. I beg your pardon."

Windham reached his hand to Smith, and all who were in the store walked up and shook hands with the young man, expressing their regret, for the mistake into which they had fallen.

Before the sun went down, there was not a man, woman, or child in the village who had not heard the triumphant refutation of the foolish slander. A reaction took place, and every villager was desirous of doing Windham a kindness. But he did not see Mr. Rogers again until he was obliged to secure the services of that gentleman in a delicate affair, which concerned Miss James equally with himself. He then thanked the clergyman for his timely advice and assistance, and added—"Hereafter, when a false imputation rests upon me, I will meet it boldly, prove its source, and look it down at once."

Letter of John Wesley.

Several years since, the following original letter of the Rev. John Wesley was presented to me by a lady of this city; a granddaughter, I believe of the lady to whom it was written. It is near a hundred years old, but in a fine state of preservation. The lady who presented it to me has several others from that most extraordinary and holy man of God; and also some from several of Mr. Wesley's first preachers, all of which, I had the privilege to examine, some years, since. Like all that proceeded from his pen, it is Multum in Parvo. I am not aware it has ever been published, and is among the very few letters in his hand writing in existence, certainly in this country:

"My Dear Sister Bennis: Some years since I was inclined to think that one who had once enjoyed and lost the pure love of God, must never look to enjoy it again, till they were just stepping into Eternity. But experience has taught me better things. We have now numerous instances, of those who had cast away that unspeakable blessing, and now enjoy it in a larger measure than ever, and why should not this be your case? Because you are unworthy? So were they. Because you have been an unfaithful steward? So they had been also, yet God healed them free, and so he will you. Only do no reason against him. Look for nothing in yourself but sin and unworthiness. Forget yourself. Worthy is the Lamb, and he has prevailed for you. You shall not die, but live! Live all the life of heaven on earth. You need nothing in order to this but faith; and who gives this? He that standeth at the door.

I hope to see you at Limerick on Monday evening; probably we shall be at Brough soon after 1 o'clock, and I pray, let there never more be any reserve between you and

My dear sister,

Your affectionate brother,

J. WESLEY.

The letter is dated Cork, May 30, 17C7.

WHAT A REVIVAL IN COLLEGE DOES.—At the revival in Princeton College, in 1815, says the Sabbath Recorder, there were thirteen converts; M'Ilvaine, Bishop of Ohio; Jones, Bishop of Virginia; M'Lean and Hodge, Professors of Princeton; and Armstrong, late Secretary of the American Board, were among the number.

The Widow's God.

"Thou refuge of my soul,
On Thee, when sorrows rise—
On Thee, when waves of trouble roll,
My fainting hope relies.

"To Thee I tell my grief,
Thou alone can'st heal;
Thy word can bring a sweet relief
For every pain I feel."

"LET THE WIDOWS TRUST IN ME," is the encouraging language of the widow's God. This you should consider as addressed to you. He is YOUR GOD! You may therefore trust him confidently. His attributes all bear the character of holiness. And this holiness lives in the light of infinite goodness. "He is good to all, and his tender mercies are over all his works." His tender mercies then will be ever thine. He cares for thee. He will watch over thee for good.

If he were not infinitely good, you might hesitate in placing your confidence in him; but he is—"He is good to all."

He is not only infinitely good, but he is also infinite in power and wisdom. He is able to do you good. And he best knows how to do it. And then, he is eternal—he ever lives. Your husband, your children, your parents, your brothers and sisters, your friends and acquaintances, may all die around you, and leave you desolate and lonely; but God, your God, lives forever. Time and space are equally filled with him. His hand will be ever ready to supply you wants; and you may ever look up to him as your unfailing friend. He will always be ready to welcome you to the mercy-seat. When you come to the throne of grace, you need never anticipate that he will be absent. He ever lives to receive you. When you pour out your heart before him, his ear will never be heavy to your cry. When you come to him for consolation, he will be every ready to grant it. Let not your heart be troubled, therefore, neither let it be afraid. God has made especial promises, and manifests a special regard, to the widow. His especial providence has frequently been displayed in their defence and their welfare. For one, he multiplied meal; for another, oil; for another, he raised a dead son to life; and for you the same compassionate God will provide.

Relative Strength of Popery and Protestantism.

Protestantism reckons as its followers nearly one-half of the number that Popery claims as its adherents. And although numerically one-half less, in all the great elements of character and progress, it is vastly its superior. In wealth, in enterprise, in rational liberty, in literature, in commerce, in all the elements of political and moral power, Protestant are to Papal nations as the sun and moon in the heavens are to the fixed stars.

That your may see this, blot from the map of Europe all that it owes to Protestantism, and what is left for the people to desire? Blot from these nations all that they owe to Popery, and it would be like Moses lifting up his wonder-working rod heavenward, and rolling back the darkness that enshrouded Egypt. If this does not picture our idea, stop for a month or a year, all that Protestantism is doing to civilize, enlighten, and bless the earth, and the world is moved and astounded, from its centre to its circumference; even old Austria, the Sleepy Hollow of the world, would spring to her feet and ask, What is the matter? Stop for the same time all that Popery is doing for the same ends, and it would be no more missed than is the light of the lost pleiad from the sky. [Kirwan.

THE CHILD OF JUDGMENT.—I heard a story the other day, (writes a friend and correspondent of the Knickerbocker) which amused me. An old lady said—

"When my father moved into the new country, one of us children once told a lie. My mother could not ascertain the culprit, but a lie lay between us.

"'Well,' said she, 'you may escape now, but you may be sure that I will know it some day which of you has told a lie.'

"Weeks passed on, and nothing more was said on the subject. My father lived in a log house, which contained one room below and one above. The children slept in the chamber. One night a tremendous wind arose, and at night blew off the entire roof of the house. My mother alarmed at the crash, ran up the ladder, and putting her head into the roofless chamber, cried—

"'Children are you all there?'

"'Yes, mother!' piped a small and terrified voice; 'yes, mother, we are all here, and if the day of judgment has come, it was me that told that lie!'"

To how many "children of larger growth," does a similar repentance come, even from similar causes; the "still small voice" amid the storm!

CHEERFULNESS OF CHRISTIANS.—Religion is mistaken by the worldling for a system of rigor and austerity, marking its votaries with melancholy, and supplanting every genial affection and innocent enjoyment. Let those who possess it, be careful to rectify this error by their own example. In their deportment let them evince neither moroseness nor want of courtesy, but the graceful serenity of a hopeful, patient, and loving spirit. Let them cultivate the smile that can shine through sorrow, and speak those sweet words that heal as a medicine; and not sink or repine as other, when "the desire of their eyes are taken away with a stroke." [illegible] has such a right to be always [illegible] whom are such obligations laid [illegible] cheerful, as those who "have the promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come?" [American Messenger.

REDEEM THE TIME.—This morning, upon waking, the thought suddenly occurred to me—what, if I should pass this day better than I have ever passed before! what, if I should be able to look back at night, and to thank God for the most profitable and best spent day of my whole life! The very idea seemed [illegible] beyond expression. And why should not this be the first thought which presents itself to us every morning?

NEW ORLEANS:

Saturday Morning, July 24.

TO THE MEMBERS OF THE ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

Brethren: When there seems to be an occasion for somebody to speak, upon a given subject, and the "Fathers" neglect to do so, a "junior" may be pardoned for venturing forward. I perceive by an official communication to the papers, that the session of our Conference is to come on this year more than a month earlier than usual. All must see that it will be important for all our financial interests, that the members of the Conference bear this in mind. Our several collections must be commenced that much earlier, or we shall fall sadly behind former years, especially the last. There was danger, that, under any circumstances we should fall behind last years Missionary collection. And now that to ordinary hindrances there is added the abbreviation of our Conference year by more than a month—and that month the best of the year, for making collections—it will require extraordinary exertions on our part to prevent our deficiency being a great one. I was gratified to learn during a recent trip West and North, that our example is exerting its influence upon the Church in different parts of the country—stirring it up to greater effort in the Missionary work. It will be unfortunate both for our reputation and influence, if from any inaction on our part, we recede from the high position we have taken. But it is not in view of any influence it may have upon our reputation and influence, that I mainly desire we may come up to, nye even go beyond, what we have ever accomplished before, but in view of the wants of the Master's work. There are open doors, and inviting fields before us, which we ought to occupy to ourselves and the world, and in duty to God, to enter and occupy at once—and for entering which, I hope we shall soon hear the word from those entrusted with the management of our Mission work.

Let us raise the money, and pray God to furnish the men. J. HAMILTON.

Mobile, July 19.

SEVENTH ANNUAL REPORT.—The Seventh Annual Report of the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, South, has reached us. Next week we design reviewing it at some length.

CONFERENCE SESSIONS.—We have received a letter from Bishop Andrew, announcing the following change as to the time of holding the session of the Memphis and Mississippi Conferences, to which we call the attention of those concerned. The time appointed for the meeting of the Memphis Conference at Brownsville, Tenn., will be the 1st day of December, and the Mississippi Conference the 14th December. [Mem. Adv.

JACKSON, Miss.—It is very seldom that we hear any news from the Methodism or the Universities at this place. The professors, teachers and people seem wrapped up in themselves, not caring for the rest of the world. We did, for a while, get the "Cadet Star," but that has withdrawn its light from our editorial firmament—the editors have sold out type and quit. Our contemporary of Richmond has been favored by a correspondent there, from whom we extract:

"First, then, in regard to the prospect of the University. I would say it is quite flattering. Brothers Harris and Roberts (our preachers) have commenced the plan of holding two preaching meetings at every appointment, and if circumstances justify them in doing so, I have no doubt but some of these meetings will continue for two weeks. Such was the case last year on this circuit, under the ministration of Bro. Wells, at which from ten to forty souls were sometimes happily converted to God; and I have no doubt from the present indications, but what this year will be one as memorable for revivals as any one that has prevailed during the past twenty. A glorious revival just closed at Grenada, in Yalobusha county—about fifty conversions. That talent in the religious world, Bro. C. K. Marshall was there, and assisted Bro. Wells during the revival. Bro. A. H. Kennedy, who holds the Brunswick (or Greensville) circuit, Virginia Conference, about twenty years ago, when I was a little boy, was also present and assisted in the services.

"We have two plain, unassuming, practical, useful, praying preachers on the Oxford circuit this year; men who are calculated to and will do good. I believe I could sit and hear Bro. Harris preach twenty-four hours without growing sleepy. He is not one of those sky scrapers, but a well informed Bible preacher. By the bye, there is too much imagination in some of our latter day sermons, too many lofty soarings, too many studied efforts to please the world, and at the same time leave no lasting impression.

"Bro. A. B. Longstreet, L. L. D., President of the State University, located at Oxford, although touching quite old, preaches about once a month in Oxford, and sometimes when he can contain himself no longer, he leaves the University and puts for the country to preach. And then for it, if you are not a Methodist, and that a good one, you can't sit under his preaching. I know this by experience and observation. He too is a plain spoken man. Certainly he is every way the plainest great man I ever saw, but sometimes he rises in master flights of eloquence, just to let his hearers know that he could if he would.

"Judge Longstreet is certainly a great man, and has given more character to our University than almost any other man could have done. The students all admire him, and rightly so, for a better fellow never met.

"Taking all things into consideration, we are getting under good headway."

Alabama Conference Schools.

Those in the East of the State have concluded the scholastic year, much to the satisfaction of the Church and the friends of Christian education. We have had no official report from the Visiting Committee of Oak Bowery, but learn from several sources that the exercises of Commencement gave eminent satisfaction. Four young ladies—constituting the first class ever graduated from the Oak Bowery Female College—received diplomas, after an examination which it was said, by competent judges, "could not be beaten."

Such commendation must be cheering to the worthy operatives. For the Centenary Institute our readers are referred to the communication of the Conference Visiting Committee in another column. We understand that Dr. Mitchell, with an able corps of teachers, has assumed the management of the Institute for the three years following.

As for the "appointee" to preach the annual sermon being absent, we are sorry for our own but glad for their sakes that it was so; for our good friend Dr. Neely was there, and made the most excellent use of the occasion. He is au fait on such occasions, and very properly the Colleges make him pay a large annual tribute by way of penalty for his popularity.

We assure those who extended the kind invitation, that the expectation of a reunion with them and many other friends, and the hope of being at all serviceable to their good cause, was reluctantly given up, and not until necessity forced.

MINERAL SPRINGS.—Among the pine hills of Jackson county, Miss., and about 5 miles from Biloxi, Springs have been discovered possessing mineral properties in valuable quantity and proportions. The original proprietor discovered them like all nature's treasures are discovered, in search for something else: excavating a mill seat. A medical friend, Dr. Austin, furnishes us a neat descriptive pamphlet written by himself: he first had them brought to his notice in 1851.

Dr. Smith, of the La. University, concludes a thorough analysis with this opinion:

"The medicinal virtue of these waters is to be looked for more particularly in the oxide of Iron, and Sulphuretted Hydrogen, both of which exists in notable quantities; and it is therefore apparent that many chronic diseases might be cured, or receive important alleviation from these waters: as a bath, it could be applied with much advantage."

The location is favorable to New Orleans and Mobile—being nearly equi-distant. On this the writer remarks:

"Had the citizens of this great city met in Convention, and duly delegated some of its citizens to select the site of a watering place, adapted by its locality to the wants of New Orleans, one better located could not have been found, even had heaven vouchsafed to them, as to one of old, the power to force the healing stream to flow."

Improvements have already been made and accommodations provided for about 20 invalids.

Panama is the most important city of New Grenada. It contains about 10,000 inhabitants, of whom 500 are resident Americans. It was laid out in 1670, and entirely surrounded with walls, it extended in time far beyond. Here Catholicism reigns supreme. They have no less than nine churches. A Protestant mission has recently been established, and there is now regular Sabbath service by the Rev. Mr. Rovell, of the Congregational church, and Rev. Mr. Bigham, of the Methodist Episcopal Church South.

A VALUABLE THUMB.—The Boston Post tells of a man in Maine who kept a grocery store, and when he sold a pint or a half pint of rum, always put his thumb into the measure—an enormous large thumb—and at the end of twenty years' practice he estimated that he had sold his thumb for at least $5000, and had it left after all. What an old soaker it must be.

We learn from the Presbyterian, that the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions has decided to establish a mission amongst the Chinese in California.

Letter from Africa.

[Our friend Edmund has favored us with another letter from his "Ebony home," which we are sure will be nobody in its reading. ED.]

GREENVILLE, Sinoe, Liberia,
March 29, 1852.

BRO. MCTYEIRE: The brig Julia Ford arrived on the 19th ult.; 38 passengers, all well and hearty; and whilst pening to you these few lines, the Liberia Packet is coming to an anchor, after a long passage of 60 days; 90 passengers, all well and hearty.

I was up at Monrovia in January, at the Conference, and was very well pleased with that country; and I had the pleasure of being up the Saint Paul's river which is the garden spot of Liberia, and seeing of the industrious husbandry on both sides of the river.

In the space of four years that section of the country will be wealthy from this fact: the people's eyes are become opened as to the planting of coffee, and even at this time they are making beautiful brown sugar, as you would wish to behold in any new country; and some farmers are gathering coffee. This staple when it begins to bear gives a man employment all the time. I would like to give you a description of the coffee. When it begins to bear, it is so closely connected together that an ant can not get through, and as soon as the coffee is plucked off, a most beautiful white flower immediately buds out, and the leaves remind one of an evergreen, and the blossom like a jessamine, and the fume has the same delicious flavor.

Religion is in a flourishing condition all along the Coast, from Millsburg to Monrovia, which is some twenty-five miles from the Cape. I have the honor to be,

Yours, in Christ,
E. D. TAYLOR.

Bishop Doane, of NewJersey, has been acquitted of the charges brought against him by the Committee of Investigation.

METHODIST PRESS.

REVIVAL AMONG THE GERMANS.—With particular pleasure we note the work of God among this people whose presence and position in our country opens a great door for the Gospel. Rev. N. A. Cravens writes on 13th inst. to the Banner, giving an account of the German Church in Galveston, under charge of Rev. P. Moelling. Bro. M. went from this city a year ago to Texas. His friends will be glad to hear of the late protracted meeting in his charge:

"A much larger congregation than has heretofore attended that church attended from night to night under the powerful appeals from their preacher. The congregation was often in tears; penitents were invited to the altar for prayer every night, and scarcely a night passed without our hearts having been cheered with evidences of converting power. The 8th day of the meeting, the Lord's Supper was administered to the entire membership, after which three were baptized. Then followed the reception of members on probation; seventeen presented themselves for admission; most of whom were over twenty years of age. The meeting was protracted through the following week, and several who had joined the church as seekers professed religion during that time. Bro. Moelling reckons fifteen clear conversions, and no man is more particular in ascertaining the grounds of hope relied upon by the young convert, and none perhaps more truly scriptural in their views on this subject. Many of the American brethren, with your correspondent attended the meeting and took a deep interest in its success; all distinction was lost in the oneness of discipleship; and the unity of the faith, in the bond of perfectness, was attained."

LACK OF PREACHERS.—The Editor of Z. Herald, after remarking that never in the history of the Church was there so great a demand, from all quarters, for an increased number of efficient Ministers, and lamenting the slackness of supply adds:

"Yet is there a bright side to this fact. This scarcity is not the result of a diminution in the actual number of the ministry. It proceeds from an increased demand for ministerial labor. The world is lifting up its voice and asking for a larger ministry. Is not this a matter of gladness? Does not this longing of the soul of humanity for the Gospel betoken the hour of Gospel triumph? Is it nothing that men are crying to the Church of Christ, Give us a more numerous ministry? O, it is a delightful thought—one of the brightest signs of the times, and should inspire a purpose to meet the demand."

PROSPERITY—HONOR TO THE AGENTS.—The St. Louis Advocate approaching the close of its first volume holds words which much gratify us:

"We are fully warranted by the facts in the case, in saying, that no General Conference paper in the Methodist E. Church, North or South, ever closed the first year of its existence under more favorable circumstances, or with more flattering prospects. Since the 1st of last January about one thousand names have been added to our subscription list, and new subscribers come in nearly as fast as at any period since that time, and the prospects are that we will begin the next volume with a list largely above what it is at present. For the success of the paper and favorableness of its present prospects, the credit is due mostly to a few active, efficient agents."

FOR PEACE.—The Buffalo Advocate, referring to the desire manifested in some parts of the Northwest for a M. E. Church paper to be established in St. Louis, says:

"St. Louis has now a better Advocate than can be started in opposition to it. Should a new paper be started, the object of which is only agitation and strife, we hope it may die in its infancy. The day of fight in the Church should have ended long ago."

This paper quoting the remarks of the N. and L. Advocate, in which it is charged that under the liberal view of it "Methodist Episcopacy in the North will soon become mere moderatorship, which no man of self-respect would accept with its toils and responsibilities," thus owns up to its own radical doctrine on the subject:

"That is exactly what we would contend for. A moderatorship, elected once in four years, would comport better with the dignity and simplicity of the original Church, than either bishops, right reverends, archbishops, or anything else of the kind."

A NEW-BOOK.—The Editor of the Nashville Advocate informs his readers that the recent numbers which have appeared in that paper, on church government, have been brought to a close. They were written by Dr. Henkle, and will be published in book form, and will make a volume of nearly 200 pages, 18mo. The type is large and clear, and the impression will be distinct and he thinks beautiful. The paper good, and the binding neat and substantial. The work will be ready for distribution in, say twenty days from this date, and will be sold on reasonable terms. As to the merits of the production, we have heard but one opinion by those who have carefully read the numbers. Moreover, the work is one for the times.

METHODISM IN CHARLESTON.—Dr. Summers delivered a happy address on 29th June, at the laying of the corner stone of the Bethel Church, in Charleston, S. C., which by request was published in the S. C. Advocate, from which we extract a few historical items:

"Let us, as Charleston Methodists, glance at the past.

"From a half century to a century had elapsed after the organization of the principal religious denominations of Charlestons before a society of "the people called Methodists" was formed in this city.

"So far as I can learn, the first recognition of Charleston Methodism bears date 1785, when John Tunnell was sent here as a pioneer. The next year there were reported 35 white and 23 colored members, the fruit, we suppose, of his faithful labors. Never since, it would seem, has the white membership exceeded the colored in numerical strength. Henry Willis and Isaac Smith were sent here in 1786; and in 1787 there were reported 34 white and 53 colored members. There were many in those times that despised the day of small things; but God did not; nor did those whom he sent to labor here.

"In 1794, prompted by the generous impulses of Bishop Asbury, the little band of Charleston Methodists, numbering 60 white and 220 colored members, incorporated that year by the Legislature of the State, resolved to build a Church in Cumberland street—the noble-hearted and sagacious Bishop lending them five guineas—a considerable sum in those days—towards paying for the lot, and afterwards to be given to help build the house. The Cumberland street Church was forthwith erected.

"In 1797, when the membership numbered 65 white and 409 colored persons, they resolved to build a Church at this place—a most eligible site, the lot being generously donated to the Methodist Episcopal Church by his Excellency Governor Bennett. They determined, weak as they were, to erect a house of the same dimensions as the old Cumberland street Church, viz: 50 feet by 40—the probable cost of which would be £700, Bishop Asbury promising them a loan of £100 to aid them in the undertaking. The venerable Bishop was present at the meeting, and in all likelihood suggested the resolution then adopted, "That the name of the house shall be Bethel, the Hebrew name of the house of God." That sacred, though unsightly, old pile is the Bethel then erected. It has never been ornamented according to the approved style of ecclesiology, whether primitive, mediæval, or modern, but it seems for several years after it was built, it lacked a good deal more than it now lacks of being a beautiful edifice. In the Records for August 6, 1806, we find this minute, which is highly creditable to the parties concerned, and we cite it to their honor: "Forasmuch as the black members of the Church have promised to contribute liberally towards finishing the Bethel Church, Therefore, Resolved, That said Church shall be lathed and plastered as soon as possible, and in the most reasonable manner, and also workmanship-like." So our fathers phrased the entry; and let those who please sneer at the action or the terms in which it is chronicled."

CHURCH SUIT.—Dr. Smith, writing from Columbus, O., to R. C. Advocate, while the case was on trial, says:

"The testimony submitted on each side is the same as that relied on in the New York case, with the addition of only a few points, not very material to the issue. The ground taken by our counsel, in support of our bill, does not differ essentially from that occupied by our counsel in New York. Messrs. Ewing, Lane and Riddle, counsel for the defendants, take ground somewhat different from that occupied by their counsel in the New York case; or rather, the same ground, more clearly stated. Mr. Ewing was present during the discussion in New York, and I incline to think was not satisfied with the defence, and is quite sanguine that he can better it. This confidence, on his part, is probably the chief cause why the case has not been abandoned since the decision in New York. Mr. Ewing is unquestionably a strong man, and will, no doubt, present the cause of the North in its most favorable and promising aspects; still we have no fear for the final result. It is idle to think we shall not gain this cause."

Judge McLans declined setting on the case, in consequence of his relation to the parties and certain opinions he had expressed.

THE CALIFORNIA PRESS.—The Observer and C. C. Ad. have had a pretty sharp exchange of editorials on the subject of slaveholders being in the membership and ministry of the Church, North. The confession of the fact being made, with qualifications, the Observer says:

"It was not our purpose, on the one hand, to disown slavery, nor upon the other, to condemn the Northern Church for holding the same interest; but to elicit the fact, as disclosed by the "Advocate" and its correspondents, and which we knew existed, viz: that the only difference between us on this subject, is, that while we hold on to slavery and make no fuss about it, they do the same and keep up the cry against us of "pro-slavery," "men-stealers," etc., etc.

"The confession is full. We are content. We have no complaint to make because of the fact confessed, nor that we are charged with having slaves and slaveholders in our Church, but that they should claim to be our superiors as Christians touching this question. We claim, we desire no exemption from the charge, but we did protest against the use made of it.

"And now that the truth is out, we must confess our incapacity to see how it is that that is a flagrant, crying sin in us, which is an amiable virtue in them. We are "sinners above all men," because we have "thousands of slaveholders in our communion," while they are most excellent Christians for the reason that they do the self-same thing! This is a system of Christian ethics which we did not study in the benighted regions from whence we came."

Under the head of Spanish Department, our readers, if they care to make it out, have an item of political news in California, on May 20th:

"El Senor General Scott, que era comandante general en el tiempo de la guerra do los Estados Unidos contra Mejico, es candidato preeminente para Presidente general de los Estados Unidos. Y el Senor Don Santiago Buchannan, del Estado de Pensilvania, es otro candidato para Presidente."

SIGNIFICANT ALLUSION.—The great "official," at New York, in writing an editorial suitable to the North, South, East and West, on slavery, makes the remark:

"The Churches of this country have endured a terrible "Eastern storm;" and the M. E. Church has felt its full force. The good ship has been beaten by the tempest, and every timber has been tried. Some of her crew took to the long boat, and left their brethren to shift for themselves."

COLLEGE BURNED.—The Catholic College at Worcester, Massachusetts, was nearly destroyed by fire on Wednesday evening, the 14th inst. The loss is estimated at $50,000. There was no insurance.

The following statement comprises the deaths in some of the Atlantic cities for the week ending July 10, and their proportion to the population:

Centenary Institute of the Alabama Conference at Summerfield.

The Committee appointed by Conference to attend the annual examination at this institution, have performed the duty assigned them, and offer the result of their observations to the public.

The exercises were conducted through a period of five days, and closed on the 14th instant.

On Friday and Saturday nights, compositions, from the junior class of young ladies, were read, and original speeches from the the male department were delivered. The subjects of the young ladies were well selected, and were treated with great propriety, both in matter and style, and with promise of future attainment. The themes of the young gentlemen were interesting, and their speeches were written and delivered in a highly creditable manner.

It is delightful to be able to utter words of commendation to those who deserve them, and it is doubly agreeable and felicitious to do so. Where merit is of high and undoubted character, where all have done well—exceedingly well—discriminations might seem invidious; if the committee, however, should refer particularly to any, they desire to be understood as not depreciating those who are not mentioned. Once for all, they would say that they were well satisfied with the proficiency exhibited in all the departments. The students gave evidence that they had not passed in vain the season for study. High honor is due to their intelligent and laborious instructors, without the assistance of their faithful preceptors, the students could have made but comparatively little progress, these laborers have done their duty with no common degree of efficiency, they showed that no effort had been spared, within their power, to train the young minds committed to their care, in the process of a rigid analysis in all their studies, and in imparting to them the appropriate information on the several branches. Faithfully and well have they performed their parts, and a debt is due them, not payable in dollars and cents. They deserve the gratitude and hearty support of the patrons of the school, and of the Church at large.

In the Primary Department the committee were particularly pleased with a Geography class, of six bright little boys. They are evidently children of fine promise, and the committee trust they will fulfil the indications of future attainment. Quite as pleasing was a corresponding class (much larger in number) of little girls. It is hoped that they will be equally successful, with the little boys in their future advancement.

The classes in languages of the male department, and the Mathematical classes of both departments, gave evidence of thorough instructions and proficiency. The class in Botany was well instructed, and in their spotless dresses and blue sashes, holding in their hands, lillies and other flowers, for analysis, they made a beautiful appearance, quite in consonance with their subject of study. The classes in Chemistry, Political Economy and Evidences of Christianity were highly creditable: the committee feel that they can hardly say too much for them. Especially was it delightful to observe the intelligent grasp of the argument, shown by the graduating class, on the great subject of the truth of our holy religion. Of the graduating class, indeed, the committee have none but words of the highest commendation to utter.

The French classes gave the highest satisfaction, particularly the one the most advanced.

There were two concerts by the Musical Department, highly entertaining, and every way evincing the progress and skill of the pupils.

In consequence of the absence of the Rev. H. N. McTyeire, the regular appointee, the commencement sermon was preached by the Rev. P. P. Neely, D. D., it was a very eloquent and appropriate discourse. On Tuesday at 11 o'clock, the same gentleman delivered to the two literary societies of the institute, at their first anniversary, a literary address, on the subject of American Literature. This was an address of no common type, and was delivered by its author in his characteristic vein of good taste, who held his audience in wrapt attention, and by turns excited them to the highest ethusiasm.

On Wednesday the commencement exercises came off, in the most gratifying manner. The graduating class, five in number, were brightly worthy of the occasion. The committee could not help thinking of the "five Wise Virgins," whilst they contemplated them in their maiden loveliness and pious intelligence. Each has given her heart to Christ—may their lamps never go out, nor their oil of religious fidelity ever fail.

The address of the Honored President, Dr. Mitchell to the graduating class, was a master-piece. It breathed the highest tone of intelligence and christian morality, and abounded with the most useful practical advice. Dr. Mitchell was succeeded upon the rostrum by the Rev. President Russell of the Oak Bowery College, who presented the audience with the most thoughtful address that we have listened to for many a day. His theme was "The Sublime and the Beautiful" in the discussion of which he presented Mental Philosophy in its most interesting phase, with more of the religious element evolved than heretofore, Somewhat after the style of Job, but with a different motive, we exclaimed, "Oh, that our friend would publish a book," the want of the age is Philosophy by Spiritual men—men who are willing to have "God in all their thoughts." We have taken President Russell's address as the promise of a book, and would hail its publication with very great pleasure.

In conclusion we commend the Summerfield Institute to the public with the utmost confidence. And to the members of the Church, we say without hesitation, it is your duty to patronize it, and pray for it. May God prosper it until multitudes shall be made pious and intelligent by its influence.

WOOL TRADE.—The Albany Journal says the great bulk of the new clip, particularly in Michigan, Ohio and Wisconsin, is now in second hands. The stock clip is estimated to be rather larger than last year, but of this all is conjecture, and nothing can be known for some weeks yet. From Milwaukee about 50,000 lbs. have been shipped this season, and there are nearly 100,000 lbs. in warehouse, waiting shipment.

EGYPT.—A telegraphic dispatch, via Paris, states that the affair of the inheritance of Mehemet Ali has been arranged in Egypt between the Viceroy and the Porte. The former is to pay the heirs twenty-three millions of francs.

LONDON CORRESPONDENCE.

The Parliament, in a few weeks, will die a natural death. The decreed term of its existence expires. The dissolution of course involves a general election. Indeed, for months past the preparatory notes have been sounding, and now the din is growing daily louder, soon it will be universal and overpowering, and the excitement will indeed be "fast and furious."

It is likely that the new Parliament will see many new faces. Old party tests and distinctions are to a great extent abolished or superseded. It is impossible, indeed, to say of what precise color in politics the present Government is. The only likeness wherewith I can compare it, so far as color is concerned, is a "shot silk" or a "sheeny". Some of its members are one thing, some another, some again are neither one thing nor another, but veritable political camelions. D'Israeli passed a year or two since for a protectionist; such he appeared to be whilst in the "pupa" or "chrysalis" stage, but when he unfolded himself gradually, even before taking office, the species seemed to be doubtful and anomalous, and lo! at length, in his famous speech on the budget, he came out almost a full-blown free-trader. The display he made was certainly striking and attractive, but how beautiful soever may be the colors, and however novel and curious the stripes and shades, there are few farmers or land owners who will ever look pleasantly on a free-trader. In his late election manifesto Mr. D'Israeli sinks protection, but talks of a compensatory re-arrangement of taxation and tariffs for the benefit of the farmer. But how can the agriculturists believe the Chancellor when he has so flagrantly and so recently deceived and disappointed them? Then, there is Lord Derby. He talks vaguely, largely, philosophically at public dinners about these matters; but, so far as the oracle can be interpreted, it promise little satisfaction, though it professes much regard, for the agriculturists. Others of the ministry may be decidedly protectionist in their views and wishes; but even these see plainly that the fates are against them, whilst others again seem to be no more protectionist than their leader in the Commons. Still, if it should so happen that a fair protectionist majority should be returned to the House of Commons—though, even then, a real return to protection would not take place, for such a return would bring after it a revolution, yet some stunted and abortive protectionist measure would probably be passed, which, whilst it could do no real good to any, would create much dissatisfaction in the country, and seriously throw back that process of adjustment to the principles of free-trade, which must in the end take place in all the national interests. Such a result as this would be very unfortunate; and the fear of it on the part of some will certainly give the question of free-trade a certain prominency in the coming election. There is not, however, so serious a probability of anything like a protectionist majority in the ensuing session, as to excite much intensity of feeling on this account. Free-trade, then, will scarcely be the predominant question at the elections.

And the old party war cries are worn out. Who cares now for the Whigs, as such! Or who for the Tories, who, indeed, in the true, old fashioned sense of the word, are a race as completely extinct as the Jacobins or—"the Capulets"? Lord John has still a handful of true adherents in the House, and there are not a few beyond the walls of Parliament who have much general respect for him as a statesman and patriot; but as the leader of the great and ancient Whig party he is, in the eyes of the country, nothing. Nor have his tactics and his conduct during the present session been such as to add to his influence or reputation.

It can not be said either that the Derby Cabinet on the whole have given any such earnest to the country of wise, able and right principled statesmanship as much to add to their hold upon the public confidence. They have, indeed, got on much better than was expected—a result which is in a great measure due to the foolish and undignified tactics of their parliamentary opponents. But it can not be said that they have done well. Sir J. Parkington, indeed, shines by contrast with his predecessor, Earl Grey, and may be said really to have managed well. Nor can a like meed of praise be withholden from his able and pleasing colleague, Mr. Walpole. But Earl Malmesbury is, to the full, as unpopular as ever Lord Palmerston, in the same office, was popular. A personal friend, it is said, (and was absurdly boasted by some of his friends,) of Louis Napoleon—you may be sure nobody here trusts or likes him the better for that. Then his miserable buckstering with Tuscany, and truckling to Austria in the case of Mr. Mather; his diplomatic and literary blunders and apparent incapacity in an office held last by such accomplished Ministers as Palmerston and Granville; last of all, his "Convention with France" for the mutual surrender of criminals, ratified by the Queen first, and suspended afterwards on presentation to Parliament, because of the blundering and (in fact) unconditional concessions to French authority which it embodied, and the forgotfulness which it evinced of the rights of British law and justice; these things have brought upon Lord Malmesbury the dislike and even contempt of British patriots. It appears too that this same unfortunate Minister has been dabbling, after the example of Lord Aberdeen and Lord Palmerston, in diplomatic coquetry with Rome, and, as might be expected, has been defeated and humiliated for his pains. This excites the religious indignation of the hearty Protestants of Britain. Then, again, some members of the Cabinet are even ultra High-Church men. The Lord President, (the Earl of Lonsdale,) is suspected so to be. Lord J. Manners is known to be little other than a Papist. It is said that Lord Derby is sufficiently High Church. It is certain that the Privy Council has, without consulting Parliament, made an alteration in the management Clauses regulating the grants in aid of religious denominational education by the State, the effect of which will be to give the Tractarian party in effect what they have so long been contending for, an exclusively clerical direction of funds derived, in part, from the subscriptions of the laity, and, in part, from the subsidy of Government. This has much alarmed all Non-conformist bodies, and all truly Evangelical Church men. Fortunately, however, this is not done past recall. Lord Derby has been called to account, and been obliged to promise that the question shall be submitted to Parliament before the alteration in the minute is carried into effect. The Tractarians, first, set up schools which they call national; secondly, refuse admission to these national schools to any who do not, will not for the future, attend at the Episcopal Church; thirdly, they support the schools, in great part, by means of the voluntary subscriptions of the laity, and yet claim the laity the slightest control or voice as to the moral or religious instruction of the scholars, the clergy claiming the right to include whatever books they please, on moral or religious grounds, and to prescribe, on the same grounds, whatever they think proper as to the substance, standard, and method of teaching, the teachers being liable to dismission at the pleasure of the [illegible] on any "moral or religious" ground, and to dismissal with the concurrence of the Bishop; fourthly, they have the audacity to ask Government to endow from national sources such exclusive and sectarian schools as these. And, it seems, the present Government, probably for political purposes in part, have consented to give them, as to the principle, in substance what they demand. As might be expected, Mr. Denison, now an Archdeacon, and the Tractarians connected with the National School Society express their dissatisfaction with what has been done; while the Evangelical Clergy are preparing to petition in counter National Society of their own, which they will claim, in certain proportion, for the benefit of the Queen's triennial bounty latter, and of the Government grants.

Then, as to Maynooth, the present Government seem to be playing a two-faced game. Some of them, indeed, are pledged anti-Maynooth men, and led on that side in the last session—Mr. Walpole, and Sir Frederick Thesiger, to wit. But the Government, as a whole, are either too High-Church, or too Latitudinarian, to be thorough Protestants; and hence, whilst they have professedly favored Mr. Spooner's motion for inquiry into the matter of Maynooth—a course which pledged them to nothing—they have notwithstanding suffered the motion to perish by [illegible] secure "a House." The Queen's recent proclamation against Romanist processions may indeed by some be deemed very anti-Popish; but thoughtful people look it as a matter of small moment. So long Maynooth continues to be supported by Government endowment all such proclamations must be little worth.

This Maynooth question occupies very much the attention of the religious part of the public, and in many cases the decision will turn upon this. Pro-Maynooth and anti-Maynooth will be the test. With the leading secular journals, however, the anti-Maynooth movement finds little favor.

You see, notwithstanding the promises of the Ministry, and the expectations of the public, the session has dragged on almost to its ordinary length; and the next Parliament will be summoned, not to meet in autumn but in winter. It is to be hoped that a proportion of God fearing men in the House will be considerably augmented.

In Ireland conversions from Popery continue to be announced. Dr. Newman recently went over to Dublin to lecture in favor of Popery. Notwithstanding his fame, his rare abilities, his mission is said to have been a complete failure; his audiences constantly diminished; the counter-lectures held in the same building (the Rotunda) have been more and more largely attended, and sixteen of the attendants on the two series of lectures have professed their conversion from Popery. In this Island, however, things are far otherwise. I fear that a part of the clergy and not a few of the nominal Episcopalian Protestants of the Western Diocese (Exeter) are substantially Popish, only wanting the name. A strong reaction, however, is being organized, which seems likely to lead to something like a Free Episcopal Church of England. Several of the clergymen engaged for the "Free Churches" are American Episcopalians. The Popish dogma of the "indelible character" being still, I believe, recognized as canonical law, renders seceding Anglican clergymen liable to ecclesiastical interference and vexation. It is indeed true that some part of the law under which Mr. Shore suffered imprisonment is repealed or altered, but still I believe the unscrupulous Bishop of Exeter would have it in his power vexatiously to harass any seceding clergyman in his Diocese. Mr. Gladstone, however, of London, (one of the ex-Minister,) who has so stoutly maintained the Protestant fight against the Puseyite Diocesan of London, is reported to have recently accepted the charge of one of the new "Free Churches" in the West province.

The Kaffir war still "drags its slow length along." Every body is tired of a war which neither profit nor glory is to be obtained. Yet it is clear that the colonists, assisted by the frontier, pursuant to the direction of the Government, and, if I remember right, by act of Parliament, have an indefeasible right to rescue and protection. Sir Harry Smith, however, is received here with "all the honors." But this is quite as much due to the unpopularity of Earl Grey who unfairly superseded and recalled him, as to the merit of his military conduct or colonial government. Sir Harry is an able general, a brave soldier, a brilliant soldier—fair opportunity being given—but certainly he is not a consummate governor or a great conqueror. Yet he will never be forgotten, that he was the hero of "Alibal."

The tone of feeling in this country and the French ruler has in no degree altered. It is not so loud in its expression as some months ago, but is yet more deep and settled. The threat to the Parisian correspondents of London journals can scarcely be said to have taken the country by surprise, for nothing can surprise us now that Louis Napoleon may do, but it is considered that the execution of such a threat would be his veritable [illegible] Every body would begin seriously to think of war.

So much for politics and things in general. A few words I must add in reference to Methodism. The returns of numbers from the various Districts have been obtained, and published in the Watchman. It appears that in this year, ending last Lady-Day, there has been in Great Britain a decrease of [illegible] But more than 18,000 of this total decrease belonged to the three quarters between March, 1851, and Christmas, 1852, the decrease in the last quarter having been 9000 or [illegible] less. Besides which, the number on trial in March was 13,112. Taking the whole

The violence of the general storm is now nerly over, though a few plaoes still suffer verely, sed vegetation has again begun to ring in apparent health and vigor, and with promise of an averagn harvest. The ac nts from the various District meetings, as the harmony of the Ministere and lay tlemen attending, nnd as to the astonish gly liberal manner in which the coancc cal funds and institutions have benn sup rted in this time of heavy trial, aro most ratifying and furnish good reason for be ving that the Lord will bring great good t of this sore evil. To Buy "Choctaw Testament."

CANTON, Miss., July 15, 1852.

Bro. McTYEIRE—Whea Bro. D. W. Lewis' paper appeared in the N. O. Advocate, I read in the Sunday School of this place, and suggested that the scholars and others would bring their mites for Choctaw Testament to be distributed amoag the Sunday Schools of Rev. Lewis' charge. You will find in this $2 50 as the result.

I think that if his letter was read to a few Sunday Schools and coagregations, money enough to buy Choctaw Testamsats for all the Sunday Schools might soon be procured. Who will try?

Yours truly,

The Liquor Triumph.

MR. EDITOR: Already you have heard of the liquor triumph in D——, and could you have been present, you would have been satisfied about the "big gun." But I can assure you that the "big gun" was the small end of the celebration.

On the appointed day, Captain Whisky, (with all of his associates) mustered his men and came forth to defend the "license." Temperance brought up his little band, led by the hand of Respectability; but as the Captain paraded some two to one, his contest was quite easy and completo.

The news of victory was shouted from the Court House, so clamorous as to excito attention from several directioas. This was followed by illuminating the coffee-houses at early twilight, by meaas of which the lovers of strong drink were distinctly seea and heard singing and congratulating their leader. And when they had "raised their spirits up by firing spirits down," the triumph was signalized by burning Temperaace in effigy. Empty barrels were the representativee of Temperance, a number of which were set out in the street, partially filled with some dry combustible and set on fire.

By this they intended to say, "consign Temperance to the flames—burn you empty barrels, and give us barrels filled with wine and strong drink—down with Temperance and give us Drunkenness."

The little band of Temperaace advocates, some thirty-three in aumber, were willing for the majority to rule; and though their number was diminished by some desorters at the ballot box, they were aot the less insensible to the evil of the people's choice. But it was even so when Pilate left it to the people whether they would spare Jesus, their Savior, and choose Barrabbas, they said, "Give us the murderer and murderer."

While the barrels woro burning, a burly looking fellow, a devotee and pillar in the Roman Catholic Church, distinguished himself as a kind of "fifth-lead" in the celebration. While the barrels were burning, a number of diminutive rockets were thrown up amid the shouts of men, rattliag of tin cans, the popping of crackers, and the tooting of horns. Indeed, it was litterally, the bold- ones glorying in their shame.

The little boys, the hope of Church and State, were gathered in crowds, and acted a very conspicuous part in this celebration of the liquor triumph. This part of the scene struck me with great force. Thought I, let it be that the fathers of all these boys have, by their vote, opened a door to drunkenness and disgrace before their children, and with a parent's hand sealed the eternal destruction of the child. How fearful the responsibility! But there was one palliating thought: Perhaps the boys might be influenced by their mothers, all of whom are friends to TEMPERANCE.

ANTIPATHY TO METALS.—'It will be hard for the gold and silver grabbers who abound at this day to realise the sensations of a man who not long since resided in Western New York. He had an antipathy to all metalllo substances, and a child upward, whloh nothing could overcome. He could headle no iron or etost tools, or use implements, nor eat with a common knife and fork, or spoon, but had to uss woodea onss. When a boy at school, would always disturb his nervous system, and throw him into fidgets; the touch of metals of any kind, purposely or accidentally brought in contact with his flesh, would make him leap as from the touch of a rattlesnake. When speclo was to be paid out or received in any of his trades, he always employed a friend and when he had been to market with a load of produce, and unexpectedly received some money in payment, he was knowu, instead of letting the money he deposited in a beg in a corner of the sleigh or wagon, to hire a man to carry it in a separate vehiole, or on horseback, who, though required to be in sight, was by boys made to keep at a respectable distance.

OBITUARY.

DEPARTED THIS LIFE on the 11th inst., at Valley Green, Holmes county, Miss., THOMAS H. WADE, aged 21 years 2 months and 22 days, in sure and certain hope of a blissful immortality. The disease whinh terminated his mortal existence, was congestive typhoid fever. His sufferings were severe but not long, which he bore with Christian fortitude and pious resignation. He was the only son of fond parents, by whom he was early taught the fear of God. He connected himself with the M. E. Church about six years since, and subsequently professed religion. Extraordinary care was observed in his literary instruction: endowed with a fine mind, and furnished with amplo facilities for its successful development, his mind was well matured. He was a student of medicine, and his prospects were bright in the future. Of an amiable disposition, well refined manaers, aad fine personal appearance, he was loved by all—

"None knew him but to love him,
None named him but to praise."

The parting scene was the most solemn the writer ever witnessed. Seasihle of his fast approaching end, he called his father and mother, kissed them, gave them his Bible and wept—kissed hie eisters and gave them some precious mementos: his anut and cousins he kissed, seat messages to absent relatives, prayed fervently for the mercy of God upon his soul, upon his relatives, for his friends in the room, bade them farewell, and exhorted them to meet him in heaven. The servants were called in, whom he bade farewell, and exhorted them to meet him in heaven, and in possession of peace with God, and love to "alls he passed from "his home on earth to his home in heaven."

If the tears und prayers, nad unweuried attention of foad pareats, affecticaate sisters, and faithful physiciaas, could have prolonged his life, thea he had not died.

"But we sought to stay an angel on the earth.
A spirit ripe for heaven,
And mercy in her love refused."

GENERAL INTELLIGENCE.

LOUISIANA STATE CONVENTION—Baton Rouge, July 23, 12:30 P.M.—The Convention was opened this morning with prayer by the Rev. Mr. Crenshaw.

The report of the Committee on a French translation of a new constitution was received, and was amended by nllowiag the translator $250.

Artiols 81 of the Title on the Judiciary, as reported by the special committee, was amended by empowering the Lsgislature to inorease the number of Sheriffs in any parish, and was then passed.

Mr. Hunt, on the Judiciary Committee, reported an additional artiels, 82, making the Judges of inferior courts elective by the qualified electors of their respective districts; nrticle 83, making it the duty of the Legislature to fix this time for electing Judges different from that of all other slections; article 84, making the Attoraey Gaaeral elective by the qualified electors of the whole State, and District Attorneys by electors of districts; and nrticle 85, giving to the Legislature the power of determining the mode of vnoancies in all offices not otherwise provided for.

All other articles were passed. [Eve. Pic.

THE NEW MODE OF EMBALMING.—The New York Journal of Commerce says that the body of Mr. Barnum, the unfortunate individual who committed suicide by jumping out of a window at the Washington Hotel, about a week since, has been embalmed by Dr. Pilate, at the City Hospital. The doctor merely opened the carotid artery and injected a substance, known only to himself, into it. The effect was wonderful; the body commenced deily to grow harder and harder, and is now in a condition which the doctor assures neither time nor climate can affect.

DIPLOMATIC SALARIES.—The following are the salaries paid to their Ministers at several points by Great Britain, France and the United States:

	Great Britain.	France.	U. States.
London	$	$28,500	$9,000
Paris	37,700		9,000
Washington	21,800	11,400
St. Petersburg	29 000	22,800	9,000
Vienne	24,200	17,100	4,500
Madrid	24,200	15,200	9,000
Berlin	24,200	13,300	9,000

TEMPERANCE IN GEORGIA.—The State Temperance Convention recently held at Newnaup, passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, Thnt the traffio in intoxicntiug drinks is an immortality and a publio grisvance.

Resolved, That to suppress the traffio it is not only a wiss, but a jact exercise of Legislative power.

Resolved, That it is the duty of every lover of his oouutry and friend to humanity, to endeuvor to awaken a publio interest in this question.

THE SECOND CABLE.—The Mobile Register says: "The beautiful little new boat, now building in the North by our mail line company, and intended for the Lake or Illioi trade, is believed to be already launched, and has had this popular and pretty name given to her. The original Creole is now plying in the British provinces, away down east. This old favorite is the maternal ancestor of a long tow pressure line, at present extent. The Creole began James L. Dey—the Dey sired the Oregon—the Oregon produced California—California brought forth Florida; and returning to first principles, the family name comes round again to 'Creole.'"

THE BOSTON FIRE.—The fire in Boston on Saturday, the 10th inst., was the most destructive which has occurred in that city for twenty years, and it is pretty well ascertained that several lives were lost. It is reported that a daughter of Mr. E. G. Alden, aged 14 years, perished in the flames. At the falling of a portion of the walls of the Home, Mr. Clark, one of the assistant engineers, was much injured.

The fire was raging at its height when a women was brought from the third story of a house in Purchase street. She was almost unconscious from fright. She had hardly reached the street when she gave birth to a fine boy. The novel incident produced quite a "sensation." It cannot be said that the little shaver was not born in times that tried men's souls, and their bodies, too. At last accounts, the mother and child were doing well.

The Sailors' Home and the Mariners' Church were consumed. The total loss is estimated at $300,000.

THE MONTREAL FIRE.—A dispatch from Beauhegton] Vt. dated the 12th inst., says:

"The total number of buildings destroyed by the conflagration at Montreal, is from 1200 to 1800, including chiefly those occupied by the poor classes in the suburbs of the city.

"The Quebec suburbs were almost entirely destroyed.

"It is estimated that nearly 5000 persons have been rendered houseless by this calamity.

"The loss is variously estimated at from $3,000,000 to $4,000,000.

"The fire originated in a baker's shop."

The Great Riot in England.

From the European Times, of July 3, we take the following detailed account of the lamentable and fatal riot at Stockport, England, on the 29th ult., between Catholics and Protestants, growing out, it would seem, of the non-exclusion of true and equal religions liberty to all its subjects, by the British Government, in connection with its bloated "Church and State" policy:

DREADFUL RIOT AT STOCKPORT—A Chapel Sacked—Exciting Scenes!—On Tuesday night a dreadful riot occurred in Stockport, between the lower class of Irish Catholics and English Protestants, embittered by party spirit and quarrels; rising out of constant discussions as to the right of the former to continue their processions. The third edition of the Manchester Guardian, of Wednesday, gives a semi-official account of its origin, from which we extract the following particulars:

"Sunday was the anniversary of the usual procession of all the Roman Catholic scholars connected with the three chapels in Stockport. The recent royal proclamation against Roman Catholic processions had been much discussed, and the Irish Orangemen and other Protestants, English and Irish, contended that the procession ought not to be allowed.

"Various respectable residents of Stockport, apprehensive that if the procession took place, it would lead to some serious breach of the peace, applied to Mr. Sadler, chief constable, to know whether the authorities meant to prohibit it, under the powers of the proclamation. The subject, we believe, was also brought under the notice of the Mayor and the borough magistrates: but, from whatever cause, no orders were given to forbid the procession, and it took place. Previously, however, the Rev. Randolph Frith, of the Catholic Chapel, Edgeley, senior priest in Stockport, waited on Mr. Sadler, and gave the most solemn assurances that no symbols or garb should appear in the procession, beyond what had been usual on former anniversaries; or anything that could be deemed a defiance of the proclamation.

"When it became known that the procession would not be prevented, party feeling among the lower classes ran high; the Catholics boasting they would not be stopped, and the Protestants declaring that their procession ought to be put down. The procession, however, did take place on Sunday afternoon, and, on the whole, passed off quietly. It started about 2 o'clock from the Catholic Chapel at Edgeley, a suburb of the town, near the railway station, and proceeded down Edward street, across the Waterloo road, down Churchgate and Park street, up Heaton lane, up the Wellington road, south, and so returning again to the Roman Catholic Chapel, Edgeley. It was headed by the priests, and a number of Irish laborers, walking six abreast. There were no banners.

"The priests did not wear the canonical vestments, but appeared in ordinary attire. Even the girls' handkerchiefs or veils, which they usually wore on these occasions, were set aside, and they only wore white frocks and little crosses suspended round the neck by ribbons. The only badges or symbols that might be supposed to contravene the proclamation, were a ball and cross, and a gilt dove. No breach of the peace occurred, and even Sunday evening, which is often disturbed in Stockport by noisy brawls among the Irish population, (who are said to exceed 14,000 in the borough,) passed over with more than usual tranquillity.

"On Monday afternoon, information reached the police office that an Englishman and Irishman, both of them in liquor, had been fighting in the liquor vaults of the Bishop Blaize public house, and that expressions had been used having relation to the procession of the previous day, and to Popery and Protestantism. There were reports also of other disturbances, particularly in the Hillgate, sent in to the police authorities, though, on their arrival at the spots indicated, the mob had separated.

"During the whole of Tuesday everything remained tranquil; but the Rev. Mr. Forster, priest of St. Michael's Roman Catholic Chapel, in the Park, called on Mr. Sadler, intimated that there was considerable angry feeling on the part of the Irish Catholics, and that he was apprehensive of their assembling in the evening in Bombers-brow, (or Garnett street.) As Mr. Sadler was popular among them, Mr. Forster proposed to meet him at 8 o'clock, and that they should go together to the spot in order to prevent any disturbance. Mr. Forster, however, being unable to keep the appointment, Mr. Sadler proceeded to take such precautions as he thought advisable. He sent three or four of his officers into the Hillgate, and matters being quiet, he conceived himself will sending a few more officers there. Shortly afterwards he received a message that, very suddenly, considerable numbers of English and Irish had simultaneously made their appearance in Hillgate, and had commenced fighting with sticks and other weapons.

"Which party commenced this fray Mr. Sadler was unable, either then or subsequently, to ascertain. He immediately got together some assistant constables, and was proceeding with them to the spot, when information reached him that the rioters had been driven back by the police and others from Hillgate, and that a considerable number of Irish had gone in the direction of High street, which leads to a neighborhood principally inhabited by them, and known as Rock-row, Petty-carr, Carr-green, etc. Making for Rock-row, he saw a number of people collected at the upper end of the row (which, with only one or two exceptions, is inhabited wholly by Irish), and extending into a field, adjoining St. Peter's Church. They appeared to be in conflict, and, as he was proceeding towards them with his men, they were met by a considerable body of the Irish, who assailed the police with stones, brickbats and other missiles, while various sorts of projectiles were cast from the houses, and even women were seen on the roofs of the cottages, hurling slates, bricks, etc., on the police.

"However, the small force under Mr. Sadler's command succeeded in driving back and dispersing their assailants, some of whom were captured and conveyed to the police-office; and ultimately, comparative quiet being restored, Mr. Sadler left a number of men on the ground, and dispatched a messenger for the Mayor, and Mr. Boothroyd, Attorney, who resides about a mile from the court-house. The Mayor, with several magistrates, shortly arrived, and a detachment of the 4th Infantry (60 rank and file) were also soon upon the spot. The troops proceeded down Chestergate to Rock-row and Petty-carr. There they found a considerable assemblage, and this riot act was immediately read; on which, aided by the efforts of the police, and special constables, the mob speedily dispersed.

"The civil and military authorities and force then proceeded by St. Peter's square, through High street and Hillgate, to Edgeley, where they found the large Catholic chapel and the priest's house completely sacked and gutted, and the rioters fierce and brought the furniture, etc., out of the chapel and the residence, piled it in the road, and set fire to it. The mob had now dispersed.

"Receiving an intimation that a similar attack had been made on St. Michael's Roman Catholic Chapel, (near the Court-house,) the posse went thither, and found that the furniture had been dragged out, broken up, and some of it set fire to. The rioters had also attempted to force open a large iron safe, supposed to contain various articles of silver used in the service of the chapel. Some portions of a paten, a pyx cover, etc., all of silver, were picked up inside the chapel. These were lodged in safety at the police-office.

"The police arrived in time to apprehend several men in the very act of breaking and destroying furniture in the chapel. Quiet was speedily restored, and a number of men and youths, who were known to have taken part in some of these proceedings, apprehended. Many of these were severely wounded, and from four o'clock in the morning till noon, four medical men were more or less engaged in dressing their wounds and hurts."

Proceeding to narrate what the reporters have gleaned from other than the police authorities, the Guardian continues:

"After the police had dispersed the mob in the Hillgate, the Irish, in a tolerably compact body, retreated towards Rook-row, the lower end of which opens upon St. Peter's square. At the corner of Rock-row and the square stands a large house, the residence of Mr. Grnham, surgeon, who, we believe, has in some way incurred the hatred of the Roman Catholics. They assailed this house with volleys of stones and brickbats, smashed many of the lower windows, and the servantman received a severe wound in the forehead from a stone. In this attack, the next house, belonging to Mr. White's factory, also suffered considerable injury. The mob then turned their attack upon the Sunday-school connected with St. James's church, which stands opposite to Mr. Graham's house, and they had broken some of the windows in the building when they were overtaken by the English, who attacked and drove them up Rock-row, and then seem to have proceeded in retaliation to Edgeley, gutted the Roman Catholic chapel and priest's house there, and thence to St. Michael's Catholic chapel in the Park, which they also sacked, as already stated.

"Fights between small bodies of both factions continued for some hours afterwards. In these fights one life has been taken, and it is not improbable that other very severe injuries may terminate fatally. Between 11 and 12 o'clock, a party of police succeeded in capturing a stout, athletic young Irishman, Darby Scales, about twenty-four or twenty-five years of age, who was said to have wounded three or four men with a pitchfork. When apprehended, however, he had received a severe fracture of the skull, and other injuries; and, as he was evidently dying, he was removed from the other prisoners, and expired about a quarter before 2 o'clock, on Wednesday morning.

"The scene that presented itself on Wednesday morning in the large room of the Court-house, cannot easily be described. Within a rail separating the lower end of the court from that where justice is administered, were penned together some eighty or ninety ruffianly looking fellows, most of whom had bandages and plasters on their heads, faces, hands, arms and legs. One, with a dislocated shoulder, was yelling in pain under the manipulation of the surgeon, and another young man lying on the floor was also shrieking under the pain caused by handling a dislocated ankle. Others were moaning and bleeding, and the whole formed a scene not unlike that of a military hospital after a battle."

Appended to the account in the Guardian, is a list of the names of the prisoners who have been arrested, most of whom are wounded, some of them desperately. The number is 66.

The Manchester Examiner also publishes an extra edition, and gives the name of the dead man as Harney McCarl. The Examiner goes on to say: "On Monday it is stated that preparations were made to get up a sham procession, in ridicule of the Catholic schools, and the effigy of Mr. Frith was actually made and exhibited. From several persons we heard that members of the Protestant Association were seen taking part in these disgraceful acts."

Several of the special constables took an active part in the destruction of property.

During Wednesday the military remained under arms. Organized bands of English have gone to the houses of poor Irish Catholics during the night, and destroyed their doors and furniture, but have evaded the police.

The total number of persons now in custody is 114.

The latest dispatch from London, night of July 2, says:

"The brutal and disgusting riots at Stokport have attracted much attention, but as yet the results of the official inquiry have not been communicated. Whether the Irish were the originators of the fray or not, it is certain the English mob retaliated with relentless ferocity: and there is too much reason to believe they were glad of an opportunity of wreaking their vengeance on those who offended them—not more by their religious differences than by their competition in the labor market."

From California.

By the steamer Illinois, at New York, we have received dates from San Francisco to the 18th ult.

From February 19 to June 6, 1852, there arrived at San Francisco 6779 Chinamen.

There are upwards of a hundred clothing stores now established on Long Wharf, San Francisco.

Several Indians on the Sacramento road, in a state of intoxication, lately, killed a Chinese. One of them was arrested by Americans, handed over to the Chinese, and by them hung. The Chinamen expressed a desire to hang the white man who sold the Indians rum.

Snow from the mountains is selling at Shasta for fifty-five cents per pound.

The number of passengers landed at San Francisco during the month of May, was 10,641. The departures for the same time did not exceed 1500.

Several teams with numbers of Chinamen, in passing the mines in Eldorado county, have recently been stopped, and ordered back to Sacramento. Indeed, so excited have some people become, that tents, merchandise, rockers, etc. have been burnt.

A man named Alexander McAllister was shot in a saloon at Sacramento on the 15th ult., by a man named Thomas Moore. McAllister died and Moore was taken into custody.

On the 13th of June an unknown man was murdered by some Indians, between Bridgeport and Deer Creek. He was shot and bent to death. The Indians were arrested and hung.

The body of Mr. D. Comstock, who has been missing for nearly a month, was found between Deer Creek and Bridgeport. Arrows were shot through the body, and he had been scalped.

An election for supervisors, on the 15th June, in Sacramento, resulted in a whig victory.

A correspondent informs the Sacramento Union that a Mexican named Chevarino was hung by a mob at Jackson, Calaveras county. He was supposed to be one of those who murdered a couple of Frenchman, recently, whilst sleeping in their tents.

Among the hundreds of Chinese immigrants, recently arrived from Hong Kong, are eighteen females, doubtless induced to come over by the glowing accounts of the country given by the few of their countrywomen who have preceded them.

The startling intelligence reached San Diego on the 10th instant, of the murder on the Desert, of Col. Craig, Third Infantry, and Sergeant Bales, First Artillery, by two desserters from Major Illentzelman's command at Camp Yuma. They were arrested.

The 4th of July was celebrated with much spirit by the Americans resident in Panamn. The natives and resident foreigners heartily joining in the ceremonies, which consisted of an oration, procession, ball, etc. The oration was delivered by Edmond B. Green, editor of the Panama Herald.

On the 14th of June a fire occurred at Yankee Jim's, in Placer county, by which property to the amount of $40,000 was destroyed.

MINING NEWS.—It is said that a party of Germans have recently discovered a very rich gold placer on the Sacramento route to Vreka. They called it Back Bone Creek. The earth in many places yielded from three to five dollars to the panful.

Many persons who left Shasta Valley for the mines on Rogue river, are said to be returning. The mines on Rogue river are exceedingly rich, but not of sufficient extent to afford claims to all.

The mines on Dead Wood Creek, near Yreka, are proving to be exceedingly rich.

A correspondent, writing from Rich Bar, says: "All who do not wish to try their luck at digging on their own hook, find plenty of opportunity for $6 per diem."

The Weber and Coon Hollow Canal cost $20,000, is fourteen and a half miles long, and pays monthly $7000—27 per cent. interest on its first cost.

The Gold Hill Canal cost $9265, is ten and a half miles in length, and pays monthly $4442, or 47 per cent. on its first cost.

The Bradley, Berden & Co. Canal, at Diamond Springs, cost $12,000, is ten and a half miles in length, and pays monthly $2197, or 18¼ per cent. on its first cost.

The Rock Creek Canal, at Nevada, is six miles long, cost $10,000, and pays monthly $4000, or 40 per cent. on its original cost.

The Coyote Ditch, at Nevada, is six miles long, cost $10,000, and paye monthly $6000, or 37½ per cent. on its cost.

And lastly, the Deer Creek Canal, at Nevada, is eight miles long, cost $20,000, and pays monthly $5573, or 27½ per cent. on its first cost.

The mines about Weaverville have, it is said, proved to be among the richest in the State.

New and very rich diggings have been discovered at a point near Pleasant Bar, on the Middle Fork of the American river. On Sunday a man paid $500 for a claim in the new placers, and on Monday he took out a pan of pure gold weighing fourteen pounds. A deposit of $677 was made in Hunter & Co.'s office, the product of one man's labor for one day.

FROM SOUTH AMERICA AND THE ISTHMUS.

The British steamer Lima arrived at Panama on the 21 from Valparaiso. She brings news that the Peruvian Ministry had been changed. The new Cabinet were opposed to Flores and would give him no protection. Flores has but 950 men with him, but still maintains a menacing attitude. The steamer Quiloktep had joined him with a number of troops said to be Americans. He has also received a remittance of $80,000 from Lima. The U. S. ship Portsmouth was lying at Guayaquil on the 10th ult. The American Charge there had protested against her leaving, should Flores hold his present warlike attitude. Captain Downie had concluded to await orders from the Commodore.

Business at Valparaiso was brisk.

LATER FROM THE SALT LAKE.

The Salt Lake mails, with advices to the 1st ult. from Utah, arrived in Sacramento on Thursday morning, under the direction of Mr. J. H. Smith, who attended them through. The tidings of the murder of Capt. Woodward and his party by the Indians are confirmed.

The Indians are said to be exceedingly troublesome on Mary's River, causing travelers much annoyance and alarm. Mr. Smith's party was constantly on the alert against them in the mountain passes, and necessarily so, meeting with one or two formidable attempts on the part of their savage foes to steal their animals and destroy the lives of the party. The following items are from the Union's summary:

Two small parties, well stocked with provisions, were met by Mr. Smith on the other side of Carson Valley. They are on the look out for the trains from the East.

No emigrants as yet have arrived at Salt Lake from the eastern side of the Rocky Mountains, but trains were expected in daily on the 1st May.

By the letter of our correspondent, it will be seen that Gov. Young has gone on a tour of exploration. Mr. Smith was at the city when he left, and says that he took with him his High Priest, Kimball, and forty picked dragoons.

There is great difficulty existing among the Mormons, and a large party, which promises soon to be in the majority, are dissatisfied with the tyrannical government of Young, and say they will not have him to rule over them. They are admirers of Kimball, and are endeavoring to supplant Young, and put the former on the throne.

Provisions of some kinds have been very dear at Salt Lake City this spring. Sugar and coffee are worth 40c per pound, bacon 25c., beef commands 8c., and flour 21 a 3c. Whisky has been selling at sixteen dollars per gallon, but there is little demand for it.

The crops in the Salt Lake Valley are looking beautifully. An unusually large amount of grain had been sown, and vegetables planted to supply the army of emigrants from the East. Green peas were out of the ground by the latter end of March.

Additional Foreign Items.

The telegraph cable between Dublin and Holyhead does not work, and a surveying party is engaged in searching for the injury. Only five miles more of cable was used than would cover the distance in a straight line.

ITALY.

The Giornale di Roma gives an account of the Pope's visit to the exonvations now in progress, by his orders, along the Via Appia. These excavations have now reached some ancient burial places of the primitive Christians, near the farm of Torre Marancia, where, it is said, Saints Nereus, Achilleus and Domitilla are buried. Here a wide staircase of the fourth century has been laid, leading to the crypte below, which are to be completely repaired by M. Fontana, the architect.

The Pope descended the staircase, and followed a long corridor giving access to a crypt, where there still are some ancient paintings. In another crypt, of the time of the early pontiffs, there are still some vestiges of beautiful frescoes, designed by the celebrated Antonio Rosi. There are several subterranean churches, or rather chapels, on this spot, some of which had been seen by Bosio, but had since become inaccessible; they are now cleared, and contain several large paintings, besides many inscriptions by the first Christians, and some Pagan bas-reliefs, which have been used by the former to cover up their tombs.

His Holiness particularly remarked a copper plate, on which is an inscription concerning a donation made to Mark Antony, the triumver, a highly interesting document. The Pope afterwards visited the Cemetery of Calixtus, the staircase of which has been repaired, and new leads to a sepulchral crypt, containing paintings and inscriptions showing that St. Cornelius, Pope and Martyr, had been buried there.

The Pope has sent a messenger to Vienna to remonstrate against the heavy demande made on the Papal treasury by Austria, for the maintenance of troops.

A letter from Naples dated June 24, says: "The U. S. war steamer Sen Jnointo anchored in the bay of Naples yesterday, and will immediately leave with important dispatches for the East, respecting the case of the American missionary imprisoned in Greece. The Cabinet at Washington has taken up the case with great spirit. The U. S. frigate Cumberland is to follow, if necessary. Mr. Morgan, the American Minister at Naples, has just returned from the East, having, no doubt, investigated the pending question."

TURKEY.

Louis Napoleon sent the Charlemagne, of ninety guns, to Constantinople, as a courteous act to the Sultan, and to show the Turkish shipbuilders to what degree of perfection the French had brought their war screw-steamers. The Turks would not, however, allow the steamer to pass the Dardanelles. A serious misunderstanding ensued. Embeseadors have been set to work, and at last, under a threat of suspending diplomatic relations, the steamer is allowed to pase through the Dardanelles.

GREECE.

The monk Christophoros is causing unheard-of trouble to the government by his incendiary addresses. He appears, disappears and re-appears with astonishing rapidity in various parts of the kingdom; and, having raised the population of the Magne by his discourses, is now ruining the Peloponessus.

At first he restricted himself to disclaiming against the English, against the Bible, against the Lancastrian schools—which he stigmatized as the works of the devil—and in calling the people to more devotion and superstitious worship. But subsequently he came out openly against the King as a foreigner and anti-Christian, and even against the Synod as corrupt.

ALGIERS.

The French papers contain accounts of another sanguinary insurrection in their African colony, which occurred in June. The revolt was very general, and numerous battles had taken place, attended with considerable losses on both sides.

THE ENGLISH NUNNERIES.—The ladies of England manifest considerable alarm on the subject of the Catholic Nunneries, which have increased, are increasing, and as they think, ought to be diminished. The ladies of Gravesend have sent a petition to the Queen, praying for the official inspection of the obnoxious establishments. A similar petition has been forwarded from the ladies of Chatham, the signatures to both numbering nearly 7000.

J. H. Hind, the London Astronomer, announces the discovery of a new planet, eight of 24th ult., on the borders of the constellations Aquila and Serpens, about 5 degrees east of the star Tau in Ophiuchus. It shines as a fine star of between the eighth and ninth magnitudes, and has a very steady yellow light.

THE NEW LINE OF STEAMERS.—The line of steamers projected between Havre and New York, to be established by a French company, at the head of which are Messrs. Dollfus and Caudin Legendre, is nearly completed, and will soon enter into operation. The leaders of this company were received the other day by the President, and it is said their plans were fully appreciated by Louis Napoleon. The Paris correspondent of the N. Y. Herald is inclined to think that the French trans-atlantic steamers will soon take their revenge of the unfortunate experiment made in 1845, by the company of Herond and de Bussolet.

A SUBSTANTIAL PRESENT TO ROYALTY.—Mr. Watson Stagg, a large provision dealer in Cincinnati, has recently packed in an elaborately finished black walnut cask, glittering on either head with heavy silver plates, secured by solid silver nails, a lot of very choice sugar-cured hams, carefully canvassed in fine cloth, designed as a present to Queen Victoria.

THE MONTREAL FIRE.—The Provincial Government has placed at the disposal of the Relief Committee in Montreal, the sum of £2 500.

A meeting was held in New York on the 14th ult., for the purpose of obtaining relief for the sufferers. In 1835 Montreal contributed over $3000 for the relief of the sufferers by the great fire in New York.

The Japanese Expedition has called out a memorial from the Protestant Alliance in England to the American Minister Abbott Lawrence. A deputation, consisting of Lord Shaftsbury, Rev. Dr. J. Thomas and J. Macgregor, Esq., presented it. They asked that in any treaty with Japan we shall exact perfect religious freedom and toleration. Mr. Lawrance promised to transmit the memorial to the Secretary of State and the Protestant Alliance in the United States.

THE WILL OF HENRY CLAY.—The will of Henry Clay was presented in court at Louisville on the 13th last., and admitted to record. It is drawn up by his own hand, and bears date of July 10, 1851. It relates almost entirely to the disposition of his estate among the members of his family, the only exception being that which relates to his slaves. It provides that all the children of his slaves born after the 1st of January 1850, are to be liberated and sent to Liberia—the males at the age of 28, and the females at the age of 25—three years of their earnings prior to emancipation to be reserved for their benefit for the purpose of fitting them out; prior to their removal, they are to be taught to read, write and cipher. Slaves in being before 1850 are bequeathed to his family.

Ashland is left to Mrs. Clay, for her sole use and benefit during her life, and at her death is to be sold, and the proceeds divided among his children. The following are the only specified devises outside of his family: To Dr. D. W. Dudley the gold snuff box presented to him by Dr. Hunt, late of Washington; to Henry S. Duncan a ring containing a piece of Washington's coffin, and to Mr. W. N. Mercer a snuff box said to have belonged to Peter the Great.

Mrs. Clay was appointed executrix, and the Hon. Thomas A. Marshall and James O. Harrison, executors, with the provision that no security should be required of either.

HUMBOLDT, for NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, July

The New Orleans Christian Advocate.

"MY KINGDOM IS NOT OF THIS WORLD."

BY ABNER MORTIMER.

Not of this world, where despotism heavy,
Reigns the Nations, with tyrannic beasts;
Crushing with impious heel, immortal beings
Made in the image of the Lord of Hosts!
And where fair Freedom, though herself untrammeled,
In powerless bee brotherhood in free!
The chained hands must rive their own dark fetters
The fettered minds, shape their own destiny!

Not of this world, thy kingdom, Holy Saviour,
Where misery skulketh in her tatters wild,
Crouching in hamlet where starving children perish,
Where aching hearts break, and no hope hath smiled
Where lonely homes exist, though in pomp erected
And brilliantly adorned with earnest care
Can keep their dwellers safe no more than barrels
For Death and Grief are preying everywhere!

Not of this world, where fond hearts pour their fulness
Of deep affection on, alas! to find
Those in no prayer for the foolish prayers!
Who on this earth, their golden days pre unbind!
Where smoldering hearts watch wildly by the dying,
All unaware as the death-film gathers slow
Over eyes whose gentle light made life a glory,
But oh! whose setting darkens all below!

Not of this world, where treachery walketh smiling,
With saintly air, the trustful to beguile. [heads,
Bringing light wreaths to crown their upturned fore-
Gladdening their pure hearts with her well-masked guile!
And there, as their soul's organ swells its anthem
Stealthily tearing its fair fabric down,
And leaving them to die amid the ruins.
Plowed by the thorns amid their flowery crown!

But Oh! Thy Kingdom great hath its existence
In the eternal, spiritual world,
Where one kind God and tender Father ruleth,
And the outbreathed, with Thy flag unfurled,
Thy glorious flag of peace, their victory shouting,
Swell their proud paean as they sing of Him
Who, breaking their dark chain, their fetters loosing,
Diademeth with joy their eyes with tears long dim!
Where outweighed, for the want of crumbs, who perished,
Crumbs from the rich man's table cast aside,
May freely drink of heaven's clear flowing river,
And find immortal vigor in its tide!
Where stands the tree of life, whose leaves of healing
Perfume, heaven's holy air, inviting all
To come, the sick, the worn, the broken-hearted,
And rich redemption find, from misery's thrall!

Where those for whom we mourn with grief unceasing
In hopelessness darkened by Death's gloomy shade,
Their kisses, like the balmy south wind, missing,
And the soft thrill their hand's fond pressure made,
Are gladdened, and eagerly are waiting
To greet us when our earthly life is o'er,
And with their angel wings around us folded,
Guide us in peace, their heaven's eternal door!

Then, Oh our Saviour, who didst bow in meekness
When the dark Traitor gave Thee up to die,
Grant, (!) desire to Thy Kingdom beam [day!
To give us power to resist temptation's power,
Grant Thou Thy heavenly hands to nerve thy people
To gather up from their hard toil treasure
That shall not perish, but be borne rising!

A SEASON OF LIFE IN THE BUSH.

A writer who contributes to "Household Words," recently met, at a social party in England, a man who had spent eleven years in Australia, and who gave a narrative of his adventures in "the bush" in nearly the following terms:

"Another ten years," said he, "if things go on their present footing, tales of blacks and bush-rangers will exist only as nursery stories in Australia; but when I first went out to the colony, the case was very different indeed. Black tribes, flourishing by hundreds, were like beasts of angry wolves, where they now limp about like lame foxes by ones and twos. As for the bush-rangers, they were generally convict servants, too lazy to work, or driven out by the cruelty of unjust masters, had fled into the bush and, after repeated flogging, and lived by plundering the stations or by lifting cattle. When matters used to be worth five pounds to ten pounds it was worth while to be gullyraker—a cattle stealer; but when they fell to forty shillings, the profit on a robbing speculation was not worth the risk.

"At that time, some of them made little parties to go out and stop the drays on any unfrequented roads, and rob passengers near towns; while others, who desired to have the exclusive privilege of pocketing the booty and were despotic enough for the adventure, went alone. Horses formed an essential part of the equipment, whether he was a bushranger, or a member of a troop of mounted police.

"To make my property from reckless, I refused to pay a sort of black mail. When my drays were about to travel nearly two hundred miles over a very bad road, I used to remind the bullock drivers that if they should meet with any one upon the road in very urgent want of tea or flour, they had better be good natured, and supply them with a little. In this way my stores traveled safely, while those of my neighbors were rifled, and sometimes their drays were often wantonly pushed over the edge of some precipice. This no doubt, was chiefly due to the black mail I paid; but I had managed to get the good will of those fellows, by earning a character for humanity.

"During the assignment times I was never a flogging master. If a man was saucy to me I might perhaps knock him down, but that was a proceeding taken in good part. The convict brought upon it as a very different thing to being taken before a magistrate and forfeiting a year's labor.

"One evening, when returning from a three days' journey, I found myself within fifty miles of a station—at that time recently established on the extreme borders of known land. I was exhausted, for we had been travelling since daybreak. I had dismounted, and was strolling by the Southern Cross, until I noticed the reflection of a fire, and heard an echo of rude laughter in the neighborhood. Here, I thought, was some bullock drays encamped; I lighted my pipe and got a quart of tea. I walked up to the shadows of the trees, and stooping down impatiently to light my pipe with a 'Well a fellow, how goes it?' was welcomed by the pointed muskets of a couple of shaggy men, in garments wonderfully patched. Four others at the same time ran to their arms, but seeing that I was unarmed, they sauntered away at the lighted brand, apparently as much about no greater matter than the lighting of my pipe, and noticing, perhaps, that my horse was exhausted, they exchanged their proposed warm reception with their muskets for a 'Hallo, stranger, where do you come from? Have you any tobacco?' 'I am going,' I said, 'to my station on Pelican Creek, and I have been up to the Crowyland Commissioners, to see about the boundaries of my new run.' I have plenty of tobacco, but not a skerrick of tea or sugar.' So saying, I pulled out my tobacco pouch, which I had taken care to supply well—for it is the best purse to carry on a journey in the bush—and then, unbuckling my horse's saddle, threw my saddle down before the fire. My two new friends upon it fired their muskets, as I have been quite impossible; my safety, if therefore in treating them with confidence.

"The first thing to which they attended was the filling of their pipes from my pouch; the next to which they attended was the lighting them. They then inhaled and puffed the smoke with an ecstasy that I can compare only to the rest which men swallow water after a long journey in a drought.

"Presently they consulted apart; while I, preparing for the night, hobbled the forelegs of my horse, rubbed his ears dry, and shook out my blanket. After a few minutes, having made the most of whispering, one of the men handed to me a quart pot of tea—there were three such pots boiling at the fire—and, grasping back the fourth cake, he cut and fairly divided a third deeper among us all, to which he added for my share the hind-quarters of a kangaroo. There were grinding at the fire, at the same time, certain bits of meat, which at once I knew to be mutton-chops. After their first pipes, they attended to the fire, and commenced a running fire of questions, which way had I gone? as not my name Lawdon? the Commissioner coming from? I knew a man, I best bullock-driver. Who was my stockman? Red Irish Dan.' Then they again whispered together, and I could overhear such comfortable words as 'The swell's all right;' 'He's jammock;' 'He won't split.' Finally they came back; and when they had continued smoking and eating far into the night, they packed up the remnant of tea and flour in the two sleeves of my shirt, asked me to oblige them with the whole of my tobacco, and advised me to sleep away from the fire, since it was possible that the blacks might creep up and throw in a shower of spears. I took the hint, rolled myself in my blanket, and, in spite of all misgivings, fell asleep. At sunrise, awakening stiff and chilly, I found my blanket gone. Fortunately I had nothing else worth taking about me; my friends had not robbed me of my horse. The great hollow gum-tree which had formed the fire still smouldered; so I warmed myself before it, and nibbled a bit of the damper left behind by my departed hosts.

"On the evening of the same day I reached my station. A fortnight afterwards, Bald-faced Tom came up with the light cart from Maitland, and there was great mirth in the prisoners' hut. The joke was in due time imparted to me. Moody's overseer—who had the credit, like his master, of serving out short rations, and getting the men too freely flogged—had met two 'boys' in the Ten-tree Flats, had been taken off his horse, stripped, tied to a tree, and presented with a service of three dozen lashes. Of course, he was left to go home as he might be able, naked, and on foot. From the description, I at once knew that these six men had been my supper companions in the bush.

"That was my first adventure; nothing very terrible. The next day, however, you will find, was serious enough; and these two are all the stories of bush peril that I can tell you from my own experience.

"I was going down to Sydney, after two years in the bush, only varied by an occasional journey to South Australia. My hool had gone on a week before, and my intended companion, Charley Malcolm hed disappointed me, being suddenly prevented from travel by affection of the heart. He had seen, and married within a week, a pretty Scotch girl who had come into our district as nurse in the doctor's family. I set out accordingly, alone, with a carbine at my hook, and two of the best kangaroo dogs in the country for my escort, riding a horse no man ever can own twice in a single life. I bought him, at two years old, from the stockman by whom he was bred, (at a very long price,) and had spent a great deal more pains in training him than we can generally afford in the bush, to horse-flesh. We set out, as usual, at a foot-pace, to do thirty mile stages, which would bring us to Maitland in five or six days. On the very first day I was tempted foolishly to chase a strey emu, because I had promised a few feathers to some Sydney friends. The emu was caught, but Moonlight, my horse, putting his foot into a wombat-hole, gave me a fall over his head, by which the stock of my carbine was snapped asunder. So, for the rest of the journey, I was doomed to go unarmed.

"Before getting to Liverpool Plains, at a Bush Inn, where I passed the night, there was a great talk about a certain Che-yeed Hyk, a bush-ranger, whom the mounted police had been seeking for the last three weeks. In chase of him, a few days before my arrival, they had shot his horse; but he had, nevertheless, contrived to get away into the scrub, and find a hiding place among the rocks. It was supposed that he was by this time driven to extremities; and no one would dare to help him, if there had been any one inclined, and he could not venture so much as to light a fire to cook his food, lest the smoke or flame might betray his whereabouts to the pursuers. He was a murderous fellow, for whom no one had a good word; and it seemed to be agreed on all sides, that, if he did not find means to get another horse to carry him into another district, his life would not be worth many weeks' purchase. Being tired, and knowing full well that bush travelers were given to ornament their narratives, I paid little attention at the time to all this gossip, and went drowsily to bed.

"Crossing the ranges on the following day, I had to pursue a narrow track along the steep side of a hill which went down by steps into the valley. Before I reached the open forest, as I was winding round a long peninsula of rocks, my dogs dashed after a kangeroo. In another minute I was hailed by a voice immediately overhead, shouting, with wild oaths, 'Bail up, or I'll blow out your breins!' I caught a glimpse of an extremely ugly face, and of the muzzle of a rusty musket. There was no time for consideration. The gentleman above required my horse. I regarded that horse as my choicest treasure. Therefore I pressed the horse's sides, threw myself flat on his back, and away we went tumbling, rather than galloping, along the narrow path-way of uneven stones. The musket, of course, was discharged, and the slugs whistled round me, raking up the skin of my neck and shoulders. But we soon turned the peninsula from which the bush-ranger had fired. The narrow defile into the open forest being partly blocked up by a small tree that had fallen across it, the gentleman of bush was taking a short out to meet me at this point, holding his musket clubbed, ready to deal, when he could get at me, a desperate blow. His had evidently got his mind on bestriding Moonlight.

"We got to the barrier nearly at the same time. Moonlight went at end cleared the tree like a kangaroo; but, as he alighted on the other side, he tripped and struck upon his head among the brambles. I rolled over him, still holding firmly by the reins. It was well for me that the bush-ranger, being out of breath, missed the blow aimed at my devoted head. It was parried for me by the strong arm of an overhanging tree, which caused the musket to recoil at an unexpected moment with so much force as to fly out of the ruffian's hand, and to tumble down the hill side. My horse rose; and the man ran to seize him, shouting threats and oaths against me which I do not think needful to repeat. I still maintained my hold upon the reins and the stirrup. My blood was up; and with all my force I cut my assailant across the face with my double stick-whip. Then he grappled with me, and we fell. He was a bigger, broader man than I, but starvation had weakened him, and I was in the better condition for a wrestle. We rolled over and over, at first each trying to get the other down. I had his left wrist grasped in my right hand; my left hand, missing his throat, tugged at his chin and beard. He clenched my handkerchief in his fist and dug his knuckles into my throat, and would certainly have strangled me, had not my handkerchief—which was thin—given way. Then he attempted to get out his knife; but in the moment when he put down his right hand—being then undermost—I threw back my own head and struck him a stont blow on his only eye. I do not know how long the struggle lasted; but my strength began to fail. His knees were once or twice upon my chest, and although I threw him off, my hands were losing power rapidly.

"Until I felt that his enturance surpassed mine—until I despaired—I had been silent, while my antagonist most vehemently swore. I summoned, however, at last, my falling strength for a loud shout. In a very little while his cursing took the form of a wild howl of rage and pain, his grasp relaxed, and I saw him fighting at the jaws of my fierce and faithful dogs. Supporting myself on my hands and knees, I, like a savage, urged them on in feeble whispers; they were my last hope and my strong hope. One dog had the robber by the throat, the other had plunged his sharp muzzle into his side. Shrieking horribly he writhed and fought with them. As soon as I could gather strength I arose, and with faltering steps followed my horse, who waited, trembling, for his master. I mounted, and without looking back, pushed over fifteen miles, until we halted at a cattle station. My dogs did not follow me. I waited an hour for them before they came in. Refusing the offal of a sheep which was presented to them, they went to sleep before the fire.

While I was in the colony I never mentioned the matter to any man except the head of the police. One-eyed Dick was never heard of more. The Dingoes and eagle-hawks soon provide decent burial for any dead body of man or beast left in the bush.

A Warlike Rumor.—The Brownsville (Texas) Rio Bravo says: "It is stated that Canales is making preparations to prosecute against the Mexican Government. A report was in circulation, some few weeks since, that a train, having $15,000 for Avalos, had been robbed, and it is now asserted as a fact, that Canales' men took the money, and that he has gone to Victoria to procure more men and mature his plans. General Avalos may be tearing down his fortifications too soon.

Land Warrants in New York.—Land warrants in New York on the 10th inst. were quoted as follows: 160 acre warrants, buying at $126, selling at $127; 80 acre warrants, buying at $67, selling $69; 40 acre warrants, buying at $34, selling at $35. It will be observed that the small warrants are but a trifle dearer than the quarter

The writs for a new Parliament will be sent out immediately after the dissolution of the old one, on the 1st of July, returnable in the month of August, but it will not probably be called together before the middle of October.

It appears certain that the British Government will rigidly enforce all the clauses of the Emancipation act. The Government, through the Chief Secretary, Mr. Walpole, have informed Dr. Newman that the recent proclamation referred to all practices contrary to the strict letter of the law. The Irish Roman Catholics declare that they will not obey the law, and the priests who conform to the requirements of the law have, in several cases, been insulted in the streets.

The Vienna Gazette contains an "act of grace," by which 103 officers, undergoing punishment for their share in the Hungarian war, are set at liberty. The sentences of six are commuted to four years imprisonment, and those of ten others are reduced to one half. The same number of the Gazette contains sentences pronounced by the court-martial of Hermannstadt against 40 Transylvanians, many of whom are condemned to death. Among the sentenced is Baron Kemeny, who expired suddenly in London a few months ago.

HANOVER.

Arrest of Six American Sailors—Trouble between the Hanoverian Authorities and the American Consul.

A letter from Bremen, of the 14th ult., in the Augsburg Gazette, gives an account of a misunderstanding which has arisen between the American Consul at Bremen and the Hanoverian authorities at Lehe, a place quite on the frontier of the territory of Bremen, and having, it would seem, jurisdiction over a portion of the roads of Bremerhaven. The facts of the case are these—Six sailors of the United States bark Arethusa had got into debt at Bremerhaven with a public house keeper, who, on hearing that the Arethusa was to sail in a few days, applied to the authorities of Bremerhaven to get the sailors arrested, or else their property seized; but the authorities had no power in the matter, owing to a recent law of Bremen, which prohibits the arrest for debt of sailors in active service, or the seizure of their property.

The creditor then bethought himself of the following plan to obtain payment: He transferred his claim to an inhabitant of Lehe, who applied to the Hanoverian authorities; the latter, immediately on the Arethusa arriving within their jurisdiction sent out a boat, manned by the arrest of the sailors in question, and as the captain demurred, he was threatened with forcible measures, and that the cannon of the adjacent Hanoverian fort were ready loaded to enforce the demand. The captain at last yielded, but applied to the American Consul, who has just sent a note to the Hanoverian Government, demanding a compensation of $600, the liberation of the American sailors, and their free passage home, begging, at the same time, to be informed of the exact demarcation of the jurisdiction of Hanover over the roadstead of Bremerhaven, that American vessels might avoid it in future.

INDIA.

Bombay dates of 22d May have reached France. No important event had occurred since the previous dates from that place. It is generally understood that nothing more will be done in Burmah till after the rains. The whole force will remain in the country, and the war be regarded with vigor the moment the season permits. The Indian papers are already hinting at the probable "annexation" of the whole peninsula.

Disturbances still continue along the north-western frontier, and military movements of an extensive nature are in preparation. Several huts had been attacked or captured in the Hasara country, and operations are in progress which, it is thought, will terminate the war in a week or two.

The difficulties with the Nizam are still unsettled. The Calcutta Englishman hints that the Nizam has been treated with injustice, and that he owes the British nothing.

The electric telegraph has been put into successful operation in India.

Congressional.

WASHINGTON, July 10, 1852.

The Senate was not in session to-day.

House of Representatives.—Mr. Olds, of Ohio, chairman of the Post-office Committee, repeated his explanation of yesterday, with reference to the postage on papers and periodicals, and contended that the bill which had been reported by the committee would cheapen the rate of nine-tenths of the circulation, while the objections of Mr. Brooks, of New York, only applied to the remaining one-tenth.

A desultory discussion followed until the morning hour expired.

On motion of Mr. Houston, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and again took up the amendment of the Senate to aid of the Collins line.

Various amendments were moved, and correspondent speeches made for and against their passage, but of no novelty or importance, for the purpose of enabling members briefly to deliver themselves of their sentiments pro and con.

Mr. Meade, of Va., on moving to substitute $20,000 in lieu of $33,000, went on to show, from information before the House, that the Collins line had netted five per cent. on the capital, after deducting the advance made by the government. The amendment of Mr. Meade was negatived.

At two o'clock, a motion was made that the committee rise, which was rejected; tellers having been appointed—yeas 34, nays 89.

Mr. Olds, chairman of the Post-office Committee, submitted an amendment, authorizing the Postmaster-General, with the consent of E. K. Collins & Co., to advertise for tenders to transport the mail to and from New York to Liverpool, from American citizens.

He referred to the circumstance of the present contract being for ten years, and that one for a similar period had been entered into with the California line, whereas offers had been made by which half a million annually would be saved. Proposals had also been made that the Postmaster-General advertise for the transporting of the mail between New York and Galway at a rate not exceeding $10,000 per round trip. He made the motion, he said, to show that the additional vote was not required for the carriage of the mails. If the object was to put money in the pockets of Messrs. Collins & Co., let its supporters say so.

This amendment was negatived—yeas 72, nays 75.

Mr. Meade, of Virginia, moved that $26,750 be paid, and went on to shew that this amount will yield the company twelve per cent. per annum by their own showing, besides seven per cent. which they have charged for wear and tear, and after building an additional vessel.

Mr. Orr, of South Carolina, moved that the Collins line company receive as a compensation the amount of all the postage; which was negatived.

At a quarter before 3 o'clock, Mr. Marshall, of Kentucky, moved that the committee rise; and tellers having been appointed, the motion was negatived: Yeas 67, nays 74.

Mr. Venable, of N. C., said the House had been told that the postage would meet the remuneration paid by government, and yet the friends of the line had refused the offer to give them all the postage. This proved they were not sincere. He moved that they receive $50,000 in addition to the postage.

Mr. Evens, of Md., asked if the mails could be carried through North Carolina on the same terms, where it was notorious the postage does not meet the expenses. The proposition, he said, embraced the Collins line postage, and this the company could not at present accept.

They had refused to run the six additional trips at $19,000 each, because these were made during the winter months, when there are but few passengers and a small amount of freight. Mr. Meade, he said, was mistaken in his statement, as the price of the stock in the Collins line will show. He did not wish to occupy time, and was desirous of having a definite vote.

A motion was made and carried—yeas 78, nays 84—that the committee rise.

The committee rose, and the House adjourned at 3 o'clock.

Washington, July 12.—The Senate to-day passed the bill for the better security of lives and property on board of steamboats.

In the House, the consideration of the Deficiency bill was resumed, and the amendment giving increased compensation to the Collins' steamers was agreed to—ayes 84, noes 75. The bill was then reported to the House, and the previous question demanded on its passage, which was seconded, and the House adjourned.

Washington, July 13.—The Senate to-day passed the joint resolution for the relief and indemnification of the Spanish Consul and Spanish residents of New Orleans, for property destroyed by the Fillibuster mob.

The House passed the postage bill, and then voted on the amendments to the Deficiency bill.

The California Ticket Swindle.—Mr. Corwine, the American Consul at Panama, has arrived in New York, and made affidavit that neither himself nor the firm of which he is a member, has had any connection with Palmer & Co., of New York, who, it is alleged, defrauded so many California emigrants. He further swears that Palmer & Co. were not at any time concerned in steamer or vessel sailing from Panama to California.

An Interesting Meeting.—Joseph Balch, an old soldier of the revolution, living at Johnstown, New York, went all the way to Boston, on Friday the 9th inst., to see Mr. Webster for the first time. He was introduced to Mr. W. by Mr. Lord, and had an interesting interview.

The London Herald says the belief is prevalent that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be able to realize the dream of the late Sir Robert Peel, by reducing the five hundred millions of three per cents. into two and a half per cent. stock. Consols have advanced, and were quoted at last accounts at 100¾ to 101 ex. div.

Mayor's Caution.—The City Marshal of Gardiner, Me., having placed a watchman at the various churches in that city, to prevent the ringing of the bells before 4 o'clock on the morning of the 5th inst., a mob collected about 12 o'clock, beat in the doors of the church, assailed the watchmen, and rung the bells most furiously. The object seemed to be to set the authorities at defiance.

From Texas.

By the arrival of the James L. Day, on Saturday, we have received Galveston papers to the 13th inst. The news is unimportant.

Railroad Convention.—The railroad Convention at Chapel Hill adjourned on the 5th instant, having previously formed an association to be called the Washington County Railroad Association.

Col. Williamson.—Col. W. B. Williamson died recently at his residence in Polk county. Col. W. was born in Kentucky, in 1793. His father emigrated in 1794 to Tennessee, and in 1795 to Hapides parish, Louisiana, where Col. W. lived till 1838, when he came to Texas, and settled in Polk county in 1840. In the year 1815, Col. W. at the head of a volunteer company, assisted in the bloody, but ever memorable battle of New Orleans, and acquired the well deserved name of an American hero and patriot.

The Crops.—The accounts of the crops continue to be of the most favorable character, from every part of Texas. There is no appearance of the worm in the cotton, and the staple is rapidly maturing. In a short time all danger will be over.

Removed.—Hon. F. H. Merriman has resigned his seat in the Senate, from the Galveston District. A new Senator will probably be elected in August.

THREE DAYS LATER.

The steamer Yacht, Capt. Thompson, arrived Sunday, bringing Galveston papers to the 16th instant, three days later than were received by the Day on Saturday. We do not, however, find any news of much importance.

Cholera.—The Victoria Advocate contradicts the alarming reports of the Cholera in that place we have before referred to. It now appears that only about 20 deaths from Cholera took place in that city up to the 10th inst., of whom all were late emigrant Germans except one grown American, one child and three or four negroes. The American population of Victoria are said to have enjoyed uninterrupted health.

FROM THE RIO GRANDE.

By the steamer Yacht we have received the American Flag, published at Brownsville, of the 10th instant.

The flag gives a synopsis of a correspondence between Mr. Waddell, U. S. Consul at Matamoras, and Gen. Avalos, relative to the firing into the steamer Comanche, and the murders committed along the river.

To this Gen. Avalos replies, by stating that he has been informed that the firing into the steamer Comanche was caused by the officers of that boat having killed a "white cow," belonging to one Trevino; and that when Trevino presented himself for payment he was insulted and abused. He maintains that, as the boat had stopped at the Mexican bank to take the property of a Mexican citizen, by force, they had a right to fire into her and treat her as a pirate in consequence. With respect to the depredations committed at Campacane, Agua Negra, San Rosario and divers other places, as also the firing from the Mexican bank upon a party of Americans, citizens sent from Brownsville to bury their murdered countrymen, he positively denies all knowledge, and intimates the possibility of their having been committed by straggling bands of Fillibusters, under the name of Mexican subjects. Gen. Avalos then winds up his letter in a thorough-bragga-docio style, worthy a veritable Bombastus Furioso, giving us to understand that so long as the heads of the recent movement against Mexico, of whom he mentions quite a list, are allowed to run at large, we need not look for security in the future, nor be surprised to have the country overran and laid waste by red-handed men from the Mexican bank.

Major Commanding, Wm. W. Buglas; Captain A. Co., A. B. Dover; Captain H. Co., Sullivan; 1st Lieut. A. Co., John S. Carey; 2d Lieut. A. Co., O'Brien; 1st Lieut. B. Co., S. F. Brewer; 2d do. do. P. Co., Wm. W. Clemens was elected Quartermaster to the battalion.

Shooting.—The Court Martial which assembled at Ringgold Barracks for the trial of Brevet Majors Paul and Gilpatrick of the 8th Infantry, upon the charge of disobeying certain orders of General Harney, in relation to the followers of Carvajal, has acquitted those officers, and has sustained them in having prosecuted those orders, under the circumstances, illegal.

Attempting Offer Declined.—A London letter in the New York Times states that Madame Goldschmidt (Jenny Lind) has been offered £12 000 to sing for twelve nights at Her Majesty's Theatre, but that she has declined the tempting bait, and had expressed her intention not to appear in public for some time—that is, until after an expected interesting event.

The Fire in Montreal.—It is estimated that the fire in Montreal consumed property to the amount of $2,000,000.

Women Transported.—Among the prisoners recently sent from France were ten women, three of whom were arrested at Paris in the events of December; the others came from the southern departments. Amongst them are Pauline Roland, Rosalie Gilbert and Helen Gausein, all noted for having spoken at clubs and otherwise taken an active part in political affairs. Jeanne Derlon was also designated for transportation, but she has become so mild of late that she has been set at liberty.

From the West Indies.—Dates from British Guiana to the 27th ult. have been received. Another arrival of coolies from Calcutta had taken place, and some of them had been detailed for an experiment in the culture of rice.

In St. Vincent and St. Lucia, abundant rains had fallen, and the prospects for the crops were flattering. In the French Islands, however, the drouth was still severely felt.

The St. Kitt's papers contain a letter from the Rev. Mr. Rock, of Anguilla, wherein a most heart-sending picture is drawn of the wretched condition to which the prevailing drought had reduced all classes of that island. They are represented as literally starving.

Naval.—The United States African Squadron was at Port-au-Praya, June 15—officers and crew all well. The Germantown and John Adams had just returned from Madeira, and would leave shortly for Monrovia and then down the coast. The Dale and Bainbridge had just returned from a long cruise upon the coast, and would leave soon for the Canaries and Madeira. The Perry was daily expected. As soon as she arrived the Porpoise would sail for the United States. The crews of the vessels of the squadrons generally enjoyed good health, but the climate was beginning to show its ill effects on their constitutions. Letters for the squadron, addressed to the care of R. H. Yarrington 31 India street, Boston, prepaid, before August 5, will be sent to their destination.

The U. S. sloop-of-war Levant, Commander Upshur, bound for the Mediterranean, was to have sailed from Norfolk on Saturday, the 10th.

The U. S. sloop-of-war Cyane goes on the dry dock at Norfolk, to have her copper repaired, she having been ashore three times in a short cruise of eight months. A court-martial will be held upon Captain Pelne and one of her lieutenants.

Military Power of the United States.—It appears from official records that the Standing Army of the United States, at present, numbers 10,129; commissioned officers, 396; non-commissioned officers and privates, 9,233. The number of buglers employed is 60, and the number of musicians 256. The headquarters of the Army are in Washington, D. C. The number of commissioned officers in the militia is 74,802, and of non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, 2,105,524, making a total of 2,180,326 fighting men. Truly, we are inclined to believe that the United States are "a power on earth," whatever we may hear to the contrary. The number of military posts is 9, and of arsenals 20.

A Specimen of Neapolitan Geography—Good Chance for a School-master.—A singular instance of the ignorance of foreigners in relation to America, is related by a correspondent of the Providence Journal, writing from Florence, Italy. It appears that an American cotton laden ship recently arrived in the Bay of Naples, from New Orleans, and exhibited a clean bill of health, and all the necessary documents, duly certified by the Neapolitan Consul at New Orleans. On being boarded by the officers at Naples, to the great surprise of the Captain, he was informed that notwithstanding his documents, he would be obliged to go into quarantine for six weeks or two months! Finding that he could get no redress, he applied to the American Charge, who, in reply to his remonstrance, was officially informed by the Minister of Foreign Affairs, that, as the yellow fever existed in the Brazils, no ship from America could be permitted to discharge without performing quarantine! The Captain actually performed them to the charts, and attempted to satisfy them that it required as many days to make the passage from New Orleans to Ilio, as it did from the same place to Naples. To which the learned functionary replied, that, "if Brazil is not contiguous to New Orleans, at all events it is well known that the United States have conquered Mexico, and Brazil being an integral part of Mexico, of course, a vessel coming from thence, is to be considered as coming from a portion of the United States." The Captain expostulated, but it was of no avail, and he only succeeded in effecting a compromise, that after a quarantine of two weeks he should be permitted to discharge at a small port some twenty or thirty miles distant from Naples. The loss to the owners from this brilliant display of Italian geographical learning, amounted to some $2000.

Hot Weather.—At Wheeling, Virginia, on Friday the 9th inst., the thermometer went up to 98 in the shade; at Needham, Massachusetts, to 101; at Boston to 95; at Philadelphia, on Sunday, to 96.

At Richbustle, New Brunswick, on Friday, at 4 P. M., the thermometer stood at 103 degrees in the shade. At Calais, Maine, on Friday, the thermometer reached 96 degrees. At Fredericton, New Brunswick, on Friday, the thermometer was at 106 degrees.

In the city of Moscow the nightingales sing in every respect as beautifully in cages as in their native woods. In the bird-shops they are heard warbling with all the fullness and variety of tone which characterizes the nightingale in its natural state. By rattling beads upon their tables of tangible arithmetic, the Russians can make these birds sing at pleasure during the day; but at night they make the streets of the city resound with the melodies of the forest.

The Crops.—The most favorable accounts of the crops continue to come in from nearly all quarters. In many of the parishes the corn crop is estimated at sixty bushels per acre, and cotton in proportion.

Apples.—The Mansfield (DeSoto) Advertiser mentions having been presented with some specimens of apples raised in that parish of a very large size and fine flavor. It says that apples can be successfully cultivated there if the right kinds are selected.

A Storm.—The Alexandria Democrat of the 14th inst. says: We have had intense heat of late, and, in some portions of the parish, copious showers of rain. On Saturday last there was a very severe storm, extending from a low point on Bayou Boeuff a considerable distance on Bayou Robert. Much corn was blown down, and in some places were evidences of hail. It was a real Norwester.

The Great Fire in Montreal.—The Montreal Herald of Saturday, the 10th inst., contains several columns of the particulars of the conflagration which occured in that city on the Thursday and Friday previous. After narrating with much minuteness the progress of the fire—which broke out in a house on the east side of St. Lawrence street, near the fields—the Herald remarks:

As to the victims, they deserve the utmost compassion. The majority belong to the laboring classes. The sufferings of some of them, especially of the children, must have been intense. Anxious to take care of their property, they accidntely sat upon their goods, though without the slightest shelter, with the sun beating directly upon them, in many cases with little to eat, and perhaps offener in great straits to procure water. Fortunately the night was so fine as to make a moonlight bivouac by no means a serious hardship.

We have heard of several cases of coup de soleil, caused by exhausting labor in the heat, but of no fatal case. There were also some births in the fields on this memorable occasion. We have not yet made up the lists which we are about to print below but not a rough calculation we suppose there may have been fourteen hundred houses burnt, which, at seven inhabitants to each house, would give nearly ten thousand without houses; the probability is, however, judging from the census returns, that as many as fifteen thousand must have bivouacked in the open air. We cannot refrain from bearing testimony to the cheerfulness with which the poor people bore their misfortunes. The writer walked some miles through heaps of furniture piled on each side of the street, between midnight and 4 o'clock in the morning, and conversing with many of them, he found nothing like complaint or despondency.

A table is given, showing the yearly rental value of the properties destroyed, which sums up a total of 1080, worth probably about £201,000, besides a considerable quantity of merchandise and furniture. The fire was principally in what are called the suburbs, and the damage consequently is less in extent than it had occurred in the business quarter. The popular distress, however, could hardly be agravated.

Resting Place of the Dead Waiting for the Living.

BY THE REV. W. M. HETHERINGTON, LL. D.

Here rest the Dead! in silence rest,
Waiting the living! Mortal, come!
Gaze on the many-heaving breast
Of this lone spot, thy final home!
Whatever thou art near, they were,
While vain life's busy dreams swept past;
They wait thee here, for thou must share
With them the grave at last!

Art thou a Chief of daring breast,
Of lofty brow, and kindling eye!
Gleaming the flaring meteor-crest
That bursts through battle's lurid sky!
O, Warrior! doff thine eagle plume,
Resign thy war-steed, brand and spear!
Disarmed, imprisoned in the tomb
Thy comrades wait thee here.

Art thou a King! a Hero! one
At the dread bidding of whose word
The grisly war-fiend buckles on
His panoply, and bares his sword!
Ah, mighty Conqueror! blanch thy cheek,
Quell the red terrors of thine eye!
Here earth's proud thunderers, silent, weak,
To wait thy coming lie.

Art thou a man of loftiest mind,
Statesman, Philosopher, or Bard,
On whose great soul can only find
Its native worth its high reward?
O, wreck the bright wreath from thy brow,
And leave it in the hall of fame!
Here wait the glorious Dead, each now
The shadow of a name!

Art thou a Youth of gentle breast?
A roamer by romantic streams,
With love's delicious woes opprest,
And haunted with fantastic dreams?
Shake the soft fetters from thy heart.
Dreamer! the partners of thy fate,
Subdued by no bland Cupid's dart,
Thy coming here await.

Woman! young Mother! tender Wife!
Ye dearest forms of mortal birth!
Sweet soothers of pure human life!
Fair angels of the happy hearth!
Maiden—grave Matron—Widow drear—
Whate'er thou art, cherished or lone,
The Dead beloved await thee here—
The grave still have its own!

Thou, too, bright, blooming Beauty! thou,
The load-star of a thousand eyes,
That liquid eye, that marble brow,
That cheek of spring-dawn's loveliest dyes,
O, veil those charms! they too must share,
Alas! the universal doom;
The beauteous Dead, where are they? where?
They wait thee in the tomb.

Here rest the Dead! waiting the hour
When the last sob of living breath
Shall have expired beneath the power
Of that grim phantom, dreaded Death:
They rest in hope, waiting till He,
Who died and lives for aye, shall come,
To give them immortality,
And call them to his home."

From the New York Observer.

The Influence of a Day.

In the balmy month of June, a certain village, once remote, but now brought, by means of steam, within one day's journey of New York, received into its quiet hotel two gentlemen, whose aspect and bearing indicated the possession of wealth, and the consideration which its possession generally secures. At first they were thought to be strangers, but it soon appeared that they were natives of the place, though they had been absent nearly half a century. Their locks were white, and their step had not the elasticity it had when they trod the surrounding hills in "life's morning march."

During this long period, they had seldom been in each other's society. Their pursuits were different, and the time and energies of each were fully occupied.

Now they had leisure. The toil and strife were over. They had retired from business, and though without concert, common feelings had brought them together in the place of their nativity. As they had outlived most of those who knew them in early life, they were strangers to most of the inhabitants of the village. They naturally spent a large portion of their time together. They ate at the same table, they occupied the same sitting room, they visited the neighboring hills together, though they did not extend their walks to a great distance, for they were approaching the time of life when the grasshopper becomes a burden.

There was one subject in regard to which they differed widely. That subject was religion. Both left home with hearts devoted to the pursuit of wealth; both had been successful; but in an hour of deep affliction Mr. M. had found the pearl of great price. That he now regarded as of infinitely more value than his houses and lands, and he felt a strong desire that others, and especially his fellow exile, should be a possessor of the same treasure.

Mr. N. was decidedly hostile to religion and to its possessors. He would not permit them to speak to him on the subject. This was well known to Mr. M., who avoided irritating his prejudices, while he anxiously sought for a favorable opportunity of conversing with him in relation to his interests and prospects for that eternity whose portal was so evidently near them.

With this purpose, he invited him to visit the village burial ground, where he was erecting a monument to the memory of one whose care over him in his youth had been most kind and disinterested. The invitation was accepted, and having surveyed the monument in question, they walked through the grounds reading the epitaphs, stopping and calling up recollections of the past, when they met with a name known to them in other days.

They came to the grave of one whose possession of religion was decided, and perhaps ostentatious, but whose life was not remarkable for justice, mercy, and an humble walk with God. Mr. M. noticed a change passing over the countenance of his friend, as he read the somewhat eulogistic epitaph. Fearing that the recollections likely to be excited might not be profitable, he sought to draw him to the grave of the pastor of their youth. Mr. N. was not, however, inclined to move. He sat down on a hillock near at hand, and remarked, "the influence of that man," pointing to the grave before him, "probably gave color to my whole life."

Mr. M., by a look, requested an explanation. "To the influence of that man chiefly it was owing that I have lived an irreligious man. You know I am no friend to religion, and I never allow any one to speak to me on the subject. Unlike most of the class to which you belong, you have behaved cautiously in respect to that matter, and I will talk with you more freely than with any one else. I am not a religious man, and never shall be. I am too old to change now, if I had any desire to. But there was a time when I felt very differently on the subject. I was very desirous of setting out on a religious course, but I met with difficulties. My anxiety was so great that I determined to ask counsel of some who professed to know all about religion. I made an errand to his store," pointing to the dust before him, "and while I was dealing with him he deliberately chented me, and then, the minister coming in, he spoke to me in a way to make an impression on the minister's mind that he had been reproving and exhorting me. I felt a strong desire to expose his dishonesty and duplicity to the minister, but I thought I was too young for so bold a measure. My desire for becoming religious was greatly lessened by the events of the morning, and utterly destroyed and forever by those of the afternoon. In the afternoon I thought I would go for advice to the saddler, who was thought to be the most religious man in the place, as you know, after Mr. H. I found him in a great passion with one of his children, for an act that was rather an accident than a fault. His language approached pretty near to profanity. I was disgusted and turned away, making to myself a vow that I would never again think of asking a professor of religion for advice respecting the mode of becoming religious. I have kept my vow.

"If H. had not defrauded me and lied in my presence—if he had been what he professed to be, and had given me good counsel and encouragement, I presume my purpose to become religious would have been as strong as my purpose to leave it to hypocrites. It is possible if I had found Mr. G. in the mood he appeared to be in when conducting a prayer meeting, I might have been induced to persevere; but meeting with two such disappointments was too much for me. It settled the question forever with me."

Mr. M. seized the opportunity thus afforded for reasoning with the unhappy man on the great concern, and of urging him, even at that late hour, to repent of his vow and seek the favor of God. He showed him the folly of living in unhappiness and dying in despair, because one professing Christian was a hypocrite, and the other had an imperfect control over his temper—for even Mr. N. admitted that Mr. G., despite his occasional outbreaks of temper, was a pious man.

But his arguments and expostulations and entreaties failed to make any impression. He had kept his vow, and it would seem that he would be left to keep it to the end.

It would seem that when a man deliberately makes up his mind to have nothing to do with religion, he is in danger of being taken at his word, and left to his own way.

The events of that day, so far as appears, decided that man's character for time and for eternity. The influence of Mr. H.'s deliberate villany, and of Mr. G.'s want of watchfulness, may be felt to all eternity.

Professing Christians are constantly surrounded by those whose destiny they may influence efficiently by their conduct during a single day. What weight does this consideration give to the exhortation, "be sober, and watch unto prayer." Who would like to have one stand on his grave, and attribute to his carelessness or wickedness results as fearful and appalling as those attributed by Mr. N. to him whose dust was mouldering before him?

Man's Food.

What do men really live upon? The answer will be various enough. The Guacho, who in the wild pampas of Buenos Ayres, managing his half-wild horse with incredible dexterity, throws the lasso, or bolas, to catch the ostrich, the guanaco, or the wild bull, consumes daily from ten to twelve pounds of meat, and regards it as a high feast day when in any hacienda he gains a variety in the shape of a morsel of pumpkin. The word Bread does not exist in his vocabulary. The Irishman, on the other hand, regales himself in careless mirth on "potatoes and point," after a day of painful labor; he who can not help making a joke even of the name he gives to his scanty meal. Meat is a strange idea to him, and he is happy indeed if, four times a year, he can add a herring to season the mealy tubers. The hunter of the prairies lays low the buffalo with sure bullet; and its juicy, fat-streaked hump, roasted between two hot stones, is to him the greatest of delicacies. Meanwhile the industrious Chinese carries to market his carefully fattened rats, delicately arranged upon white sticks, certain to find a good customer among the epicures of Pekin; and in his hot, smoky hut, fast buried beneath the snow and ice, the Greenlander consumes his fat, which he has just carved, rejoicing over the costly prize, from a stranded whale. Here the black slave sucks the sugar cane, and eats his banana; there the African merchant fills his wallet with sweet dates, his sole substance in the long desert journey; and there the Siamese crams himself with a quantity of rice from which a European would shrink appalled. And wheresoever over the whole inhabited earth we approach and demand hospitality, in almost every little spot a different kind of food is set before us, and the "daily bread" offered in another form.

Notes of an Itinerant.

Rev. H. N. McTyeire:

Dear Brother—Having been solicited by numbers of my friends and your readers to send you a brief account of my early travels in the Mississippi and Alabama Conferences, I have often refused the task, but have concluded to communicate briefly some facts connected with those days, leaving you to do by them as you please.

And now for an introduction. I was born of religious parents, in North Carolina, in the fall of 1794, removed to Tennessee when I was yet a boy: in the year 1811, I embraced religion, and felt I had a call from God to do something in his vineyard. But I kept this to myself for several years. In the fall of 1813 I went into the war against the Creek Indians, under Gen. Jackson; but still I felt the impression to warn sinners to flee from the wrath to come. I tried to ease my conscience by framing many excuses. I was poor, had no education, and worst of all, had an impediment in my speech from my childhood; but still I felt woe is me if I preach not the Gospel. For four years I strove to hide it. Sometime in the fall of 1815 I attended a Conference, held in Wilson county, Tennessee, where I heard the sainted Asbury preach; and during this Conference I heard Rev. Lewis Garrett, and he said he had no doubt but many men who were called of God to preach would be damned through pride. Because they could not preach eloquently they would not preach at all; and God would condemn them as unprofitable servants. He closed the sentence by saying, if he could preach like an angel he would never preach like a man, but as he could not preach as an angel he would preach like Lewis Garrett. Just then I determined to do the best I could, and that I would follow the opening of Providence.

Not long after that I was visited by the late Rev. Jack White, in the shop where I was learning the cabinet business. He invited me home with him, and while sitting by his fireside, he drew from me the impressions I had long strove to get clear of. He set to work to get me from the work shop to the Gospel field. The first quarterly meeting thereafter he obtained for me a recommendation to the Annual Conference for admission into the Itinerancy. I attended the Conference in October, 1816, in the town of Franklin, Tennessee. Here I was presented to the Conference, young and totally inexperienced, having never had license to preach or exhort, nor had I ever been a class leader. The Conference received me, and to my utter astonishment I was appointed to the Duck River Circuit, in charge, and all alone. This was an awful shock to me; but I had put my hand to the plow and did not dare to look back; but still the burthen was so heavy that I thought I must sink under it. But I met with the Rev. Joshua Kirkpatrick, who had been a traveling preacher, at my father's house, when I was but a boy. He encouraged me the best he could, and here I determined to discharge my duty, and leave the event to or with God. About this time I found that my impediment was gone, and since that time I have had little or none of it.

During this, my first year, we had a gracious revival, all round the circuit, and during the year we added to the Church more than two hundred members; but many were my trials and temptations during the year, and when the year closed I felt my work was done in that field.

In November, 1817, I attended another Annual Conference in Franklin, and felt that I had gained some confidence, but still the burden lay heavily on me. From this Conference I was sent to the then Flint Circuit, embracing some portion of Franklin and Lincoln counties, in Tennessee, and Madison and Limestone counties, in North Alabama. I had a young man with me—Brother Sterling C. Brown. From November till the following March we labored together, and had some success, when I was called to visit my P. E., Rev. Thos. L. Douglass, who informed me that he had detained me in the bounds of his district for the purpose of sending me as a missionary to South Alabama. The enterprise was one which I approved of, and as he had selected me for that purpose I readily consented, although I felt that the mission was of such intercat and of such difficulty, that it required a man of more experience than I had. However, I shouldered the responsibility, and in March, or the first of April, 1818, I left the circuit in the hands of the young man, S. C. Brown, and set out southward, not knowing where I was going, notwithstanding I had been over a portion of the ground in 1813, as a soldier. The field I was hunting lay farther west than the ground I had surveyed when in the army—quite an unknown country to me. Serious and almost sad I set out.

Of Love—"God is Love."—Frequently call to mind what God, in Christ, has done for you. Think on what he has in reserve for you, if faithful. "How great is his goodness!" Be ever stirring, from the principle of divine love, to please God in all your thoughts, words and actions. Labor to realise that inspired truth—"He that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him."

Cardinal Wiseman.

After some preliminary remarks, the writer thus introduces us to the internal arrangements of the church in which the newly appointed cardinal was to preach:

A bell, which was hung over a little door on one side of the building, close to the chapel of the Virgin, sounded, intimating that the service was about to commence. The door opened, and the organ commenced pealing forth its harmonious thunder, as a procession emerged from a private chapel.

It was headed by a beadle, with a severe look and a very red nose, bearing a silver-headed mace. After him were acolytes, carrying enormous lighted tapers; then came about forty little boys, clad in white robes, their hands reverently folded palm to palm, and their eyes directed upward. The faces of some of these children were very beautiful: the dew of youth rested on their brows, and they had not as yet been beclouded by the chilling mysteries of the religion of Rome; dissimulation had not as yet banished innocence; for the poor little fellows doubtless believed all true that their ghostly instructors had told them. Following these walked the richly attired deacons, also with folded palms and uplifted eyes. Then came about a dozen ecclesiastics of different orders; and lastly there emerged, from the door of the private chapel the object of universal curiosity, His Eminence, the Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster.

Slowly, and with an air which some might mistake for dignity, and which it is very possible was meant to express it, came forth the prime emissary of the Vatican. Before him was one official, bearing a lofty triple cross, and another carrying a silver gilt crosier; and on either side of the prelate walked two priests in amber-colored robes, richly broidered with gold, supporting his train. With tall and robust form, towering above these, appeared Cardinal Wiseman. He was magnificently dressed. On his head pressed a mitre, glittering with gold and jewels; a robe, also of amber color, profusely decorated with gold embroidery, and on the back emblazoned with a gorgeously wrought cross, enveloped his portly frame; and from beneath it appeared trowsers (profanely so to speak) of white satin, glittering with gold spangles, and white shoes, also embroidered with gold. His hands were encased in white gloves, splendidly braided, and over these were rings of dazzling lustre; but conspicuous among them was the Episcopal signet, which appeared black and dull among its brilliant companions, like the dark Church of which it was a symbol, when compared with that of a simpler, but a far purer and more resplendent faith.

"Shade of Wolsey!" we mentally ejaculated, as we gazed on the new cardinal, and involuntarily contrasted him with our preconceived ideas of the personal appearance of the magnificent prelate of Hampton Court, "can he upon whom we now gaze be the man who has set Protestant England at defiance? Is that coarse and vulgar looking individual the head of the Catholic Church in England?" The universal homage which was paid to him, as he slowly paced the isles of St. George, furnished us with an affirmative reply.

Kohl, the celebrated traveler, in a work which was published some few years since, descriptive of his travels in England, says, when describing Dr. Wiseman's personal appearance, that his features appeared to have been "combed out;" these, or words to that effect, are used by the author named. This description, however, is too vague. Let us try our hands at a sketch.

The face of Cardinal Wiseman is not unlike, in breadth, that of the late Dan. O'Connell; and those who have seen portraits of the latter personage—and who has not?—may therefore form a tolerably correct idea of the massiveness and squareness of the countenance of our Catholic friend. But there the similarity ends. Dr. Wiseman's head is large, and covered with iron-gray hair, carelessly disposed; his forehead is low but broad, and bounded inferiorly by two large dark eyebrows, beneath which are a pair of gray eyes, whose furtive expression can not be described. These are shaded by a pair of spectacles which rest on a short nose, rather knobbed at the end. The mouth is very peculiar. Cunning, sarcasm and duplicity are stamped as plainly on that feature as public indignation is upon its owner's presumption. A fat double chin, and "plobby," whiskerless cheeks of a swarthy complexion, complete our portrait, so far as the face goes; but, reader, add to this a pair of broad shoulders, a brawny chest, and an aldermanic abdomen, and you have a fair idea of Cardinal Wiseman.

Never saw we—and we have looked upon many eminent men in our time—a face so little indicative of great learning as that which belongs to Dr. Wiseman. There is a sensual expression upon it, and an assumption of humility which no acute observer would mistake for an evidence of the genuine virtue. In short, it is a vulgar physiognomy; sensuality and sagacity being its predominant expressions.

On goes the procession round the cathedral, the cardinal, with downcast eyes, slowly pacing the aisles, one hand resting on his prominent stomach, (not diminished by fasting in the least,) and the other gently waving to and fro, as his thick lips move whilst he mutters a benediction. At length the altar is reached, and with great ceremony the cardinal is conducted to his throne, when his mitre is exchanged for a scarlet cap, and the service commences.

But the "mummeries of superstition," such as the genuflexions, the unrobings, the bowings, and the like, incident to this part of the proceedings, we will not attempt to describe. Imagine, therefore, reader, that Cardinal Wiseman has had his mitre placed and replaced a dozen times at least; that clouds of incense have issued from silver censers, and floated in thin blue wreaths through the cathedral, and now enshroud the saints who are worshipped, and the sinners who worship, and the Virgin and Child, and the banners and the other insignia in an odorous haze; that the splendidly attired priests have retired from the altar; that the organ no more sounds forth its dulcet diapasons; and that the rich voices of the "professional" choir have "died into an echo." We say, fancy all this; and now behold another procession issue forth from between the gilded gates of the high altar. The satellites of the cardinal are escorting him to the pulpit.

At the foot of the pulpit stairs the procession halts, and between two rows of ecclesiastics and choristers, the great man ascends to the sacred place. Two priests only attend him to bear his train, and these enter the pulpit with him and occupy places behind him. One of these takes the gilt crosier from the Cardinal's hand, and upholds the emblem of mock authority. And now all are on the qui vive: a display of eloquence is looked for; for surely so great a dignitary as a Cardinal must do something a little "out of the common." But listen; the preacher commences.

His voice is coarse and vulgar, dry, harsh, and unmelodious. "Peace on earth and good will to all men" is the text. What a text for the great religious peace-breaker himself to discourse from! As he proceeds we anxiously listen in the hope of catching some new idea, or some original remarks. But vain the effort! Commonplace remarks, delivered in a commonplace manner, combined with a certain unctuousness of phraseology, is all that we hear. Very little action is used by the cardinal; his gestures are confined to some slow wavings of his hands, which display his jewel-studded fingers to the staring multitude. His body appears immovable; so does his head, as though he were fearful of rumpling his robes, or of letting the mitre fall from his brow, before the time appointed for its removal by the strong arm of English law. And so he goes on stringing sophisms, truisms and Remanisms together, until about twenty minutes have been wasted; and then, with pompous step, and face flushed with prelatic pride, he descends the pulpit stairs, escorted as before, and proceeds to the space in front of the altar, where, a priest having ingeniously converted himself, for his convenience, into a reading desk, by kneeling and supporting a large missal on his hands and head, he reads or intones a few prayers, and then retires within the screen to the altar's foot, where we will leave him.

To deny that Cardinal Wiseman is a man of profound learning and of great sagacity, would be about as absurd as the assertion of a certain Roman Catholic ecclesiastic, in one of his educational works, that the hitherto believed in systems of some of our great astronomers are mere fictions, and that in truth the sun is a simple disc of only a few yards in diameter! Eloquent the cardinal may not be, and in fact is not, but it should ever be remembered that the Roman Catholic Church depends more for its success upon private teaching than upon public preaching. The cardinal has given us a pretty fair sample of what he can do in the way of religious intrigue; for it is acknowledged by all that to his counsels, and not to any original idea of Pius IX., are we indebted for the attempted re-establishment of the Papal hierarcy in England. The man who would commit so daring an act would not be likely to be overscrupulous in other matters, nor might he omit laying his "appropriation claws" on any thing which would benefit his Church. Scorning, as we do, his pretensions, it may perhaps be well to remember that he is one of Rome's ablest and subtlest sons; that he is ambitious of power, and unscrupulous as to the means of obtaining it; and that, as such, his influence and abilities should not be too lightly estimated. A Remarkable Incident.

In a quiet village, situated on the shores of a beautiful lake, lived a man of some wealth and independent manners. He disregarded the Sabbath, entirely, and pursued his business or pleasures as best suited his taste or convenience. He commenced building a boat principally for pleasure excursions on the lake. While he was proceeding with the enterprise, which it was whispered abroad would afford opportunity for Sunday sailing, he was called on by minister, who inquired about the boat, and expostulated with him, as the enterprise would increase the wildness and immorality of their village. "I am afraid," said the minister, "your boat will prove a Sabbath-Breaker." The man looked him in the face, and with much assurance said, "yes, it will—that's just what I'll name my boat. I have been thinking some time, what to call her, and you have just hit it. I thank you for the suggestion. The boat shall be called the 'Sabbath Breaker.'" As he said this he bid the minister good-day, with a chuckle at his evident surprise and mortification. The building went on, and especially on Sundny. She was soon ready to launch, and was launched on Sunday, named "the Sabbath Breaker," amid the cheers of some twenty or thirty half intoxicated men. An old sailor or two shook their heads at the way she struck the water, but the folly usual to such an owner hid his eyes to the truth. She was rigged and fitted for an excursion. She must go out on Sunday. A general invitation was given and numbers crowded on board. On the streamer was floating the name in large black letters, "The Sabbath Breaker." She put out. Several, seized by an indefinable dread as they read the name over them, sprang on shore; others would have done so but she was off. She sailed well enough for a while. The timid felt re-assured, and music and mirth began. But scarcely four hours had passed, when the boat was struck by a flaw of wind which came very suddenly upon her. Confusion reigned aboard. Scarce an effort was made. She heeled almost instantly over, and went to the bottom. Now, what an out-cry! But soon all was over. Forty souls, mostly youth, had found a watery grave, and just above the surface of the lake floated the streamer bearing a terrible meaning, "The Sabbath Breaker." If Earth furnishes such incidents, what will Eternity unfold of the wreck of the Sabbath Breaker? [California Christian Advocate.

The Pleasures of Beneficence.

A SERMON FOR CHILDREN.

Freely ye have received, freely give.—Matt x 8

This was one of the commandments given by our Lord to his apostles, when he sent them forth to preach the glad tidings of the Gospel and to heal the sick. But though these words were first spoken to those who had received miraculous powers to heal and to teach, are they not spoken to us all? Have we not all received freely from God many valuable powers, and many, very many blessings? If, instead of counting our troubles, we were to count our comforts, how long would be the list of them? If you look back upon the past year, dear children, I think you will remember many things to be thankful for; good health, happy days, kind friends, food and clothing, sunny days and moonlight nights, with the bright myriads of stars. Perhaps you have been preserved from danger so visibly through God's mercy, that it was plainly seen by you. Some of these blessings, perhaps all, have been yours; and if not, there is one blessing we may all have, whatever be our lot here; we may have Jesus for our friend and guide and Saviour, and God for our heavenly Father. However friendless we are, he is ever with us, and he will give us all that is good for us, if we try to, he faithful children. Is it not true, then, that we have "received freely?" Our blessings are more than we can number.

Let us now read the next words of our Saviour. What are we to do to show that we value all these blessings and powers of mind and body, and that we are grateful to God for them? Jesus Christ gives us a simple answer, so plain and simple, that every little child can understand it, and yet the wisest and the best listen to it with reverence, and feel that they can not fulfill the command as Christ would have done, "Freely give." At this time, when we are all called to look back upon the past, and feel how much God has given us, we must be thankful to learn how we can best show our love; and having learned, to do what he tells us with all our hearts.

What have we to give, and whom are we to give to? Perhaps you will say, I am too poor to give any thing to any body; but it is not so. God has given precious gifts to the poorest; and even a poor child has much to give. Money is not the only thing worth giving to others. If you have only a few little pence sometimes, and they are freely given, they become very precious in the sight of God. If you give a penny to assist a friend in distress; if you deny yourself some little toy or sweetmeat to help a neighbor, it is a sacrifice that God will accept. You know what Jesus Christ said about the widow's mite. She gave all she had, and her mite was more in the sight of God than the large sums of money given by the rich out of their abundance.

Knowledge also is a blessing from God that we may give to others. If you have learned to read, you may help others. If you have learned any wise or good thing from the books you have read, you may tell it to others, who have not been so happy as to learn things; for it is sad to think how many there are who know very little about all the good and beautiful things that may be learned out of books. If you have learned that God has made animals to be happy, and formed every tiny insect to enjoy its short life, you can tell this to your friends and companions, and show them how great a sin it is to destroy or injure what God has made so beautifully. I do not mean that you should set yourself to find fault with your companions, but that you should kindly and gently tell them of these things.

There is again another way in which you may give a good example; and this speaks to every heart more plainly than words. Jesus says, "Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven." How delightful to feel it possible to lead others to glorify God, and to believe that if we do all we can to please God, we may lead others to know and love him! Now these words of Christ are just as true amongst children as they are when applied to grown up people, for the example of a child has as much effect upon his companions as the example of a good man has upon older persons. I want you to feel that every thing you do and say may, if you try, be doing good to others and helping to make them happier; and you will find a rich reward, if you persevere in goodness, in the peace and joy in your own little hearts.

There is still another way in which you may give. When the lame man who sat at the beautiful gate of the Temple asked alms of Peter and John, Peter answered, "Silver and gold I have none, but such as I have give I thee;" and he healed him. You can not make the lame walk, but you can give something more precious than silver or gold. You can give loving help to the sick, kind words to the sorrowful; you can laugh with your little friends when they are merry; you can rejoice when they are praised, and grieve when they do wrong. This will be giving freely from the rich treasures of love in your hearts, and will bless those about you more than any other gift. Though many comforts may be seen on every side, without love and gentleness there can be no real happiness. Love is the greatest blessing God has given us. To love one another was the parting command that Jesus gave to us all, and this is the best gift than you can bestow on all around you. True love does all things well. Angry words and unkind thoughts can not arise from a loving heart. Whatever may be your home, however poor, you may hope to spread sunshine through the whole house if you love and sympathise with all. Even a little baby can not be happy without a loving smile, and so it is with all. There is no joy without love and kindness. If this is the case when all is well with us, it is much more so when sickness and sorrow come. It is then that love shines the brightest. The hand of a little child may soothe the pillow of a sick friend, and cheer and gladden the weary hours with a thousand kind attentions.

I have told you of a few ways in which you may share with others the blessings you have received from God; but there are many more. Try to think of them for yourselves, and new ways of doing good and being kind will open to your minds every day. Above all, pray to God for his blessing, dear children, that he may help you to begin the coming season with fresh desires to love and serve him. [London S. S. Penny Magazine.

An Eternal Weight of Glory.

What a glorious destiny is that of redeemed man's immortality! Paul's thought seems to labor with its own vastness in its outburst of comprehensive expression, when he exclaims, "Our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory," 2 Cor. iv. 17. Numerous texts are employed to describe the future inheritance and glory of the redeemed, and the more fully they are meditated, the more exalted will be our conceptions, the more rapturous our emotions, in view and hope of a blessed immortality. The Scripture here referred to is striking by its own contrast. These light momentary trials in this house of our pilgrimage, are so related to us and the future, that if sanctified they increase, and add to our eternal inheritance. And where else in the whole range of our language will you find a single idea that so labors for a full expression as this antithetic clause to light afflictions enduring but for a moment, "a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory?" "Glory" is itself a sublime thought, an expressive term—"an eternal weight of glory" is grander still—but the whole expression, "a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory," pours a flood of light upon that blessed world which the gospel reveals, and reminds us of that other Scripture, "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor the heart of man conceived the things that God hath prepared for them that love him."

Our English translation is as strong as language well can be—"a far more exceeding and eternal "weight." Paul's own original Greek is, if possible, still stronger; and if you look into a French or Latin Bible, you will see that language labors, by a most comprehensive circumlocution, to give utterance to the burden of idea so richly descriptive of future glory. In a translation which we some months attempted of a German tract, in which this passage occurred, we find this rendering given, "an eternal and far exceeding all other measure weight of glory." No language is rich enough to supply another adjective which, together with "eternal," is sufficient to describe the weight of glory reserved for spirits saved by Christ Jesus our Lord. Amid sanctified afflictions and through the telescope of an earnest faith, Paul gained such visions of Heaven's blessedness as indneed the unsurpassed and nervous language of this text. An eternal glory in duration, and such a weight of glory in amount as our poor mortal constitutions might not endure, but just such as shall be adapted to the immortal capacities of the saints in light.

In view of the thought here presented, how forcible should be our Saviour's injunction, "Lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven!" How far must the heavenly inheritance exceed any possible earthly possession! What an idea does the word ETERNITY contain! And yet for that eternity a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory is offered us in the Gospel. This is the hope set before us to which, through Jesus Christ, we are to fly and to lay hold of. Why not reach up and take this crown of life? If mortal, and hastening on to death, why not pant after and secure such an immortality as the Scripture shadows forth? O, what will not be lost if we lose heaven? And with another writer, "Beloved, now are we the sons of God; but it doth not yet appear what we shall do." What saints shall be, the weight of glory to be revealed in the brighter world, it has been essayed again and again to represent. Paul himself, caught up to the third heavens, heard things unutterable, and saw glories indescribable. Bunyan, while he dreampt in Bedford jail, saw even from the land of Beulah across and beyond the river the hills of a sunlit immortality, and beheld the shining ones who came down to the other bank, to conduct up to glory's bright mansions Christian and Faithful; yea, saw them clad with the shining robes of the City, and heard them sing the song that swells up round the Throne. Not a few before they have quit their clay, have had upon their dying beds such foretastes and prelibations of the heavenly joys, as that their songs have seemed almost immortal.

Well, then, eternity is a reality, heaven a reality, "a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory" a reality. This life is a vapor, this earth is to be burned up, and on all here is inscribed "passing away," a shadow. O, let me, let us, kind reader, regard the real, the eternal. What a blessing is ours! "Our light affliction, which but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory, while we look at things not seen and eternal." So then, if it please God, let affliction come. They are but for a moment; and what a moment! Eternity is before us—and what an eternity! What a weight of glory are the only Christ's! [Morning Star.

NEW ORLEANS:

Saturday Morning, July 31.

OUR MISSIONARY WORK.

The seventh annual report of the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, South, is before us. In this neatly printed pamphlet of 175 pages, statistics of present and permanent interest are condensed, showing the extent and condition of the missionary field now occupied by us.

From the report we learn that the seventh annual meeting of the Parent Society was held in Louisville, on the third Monday in April last, in Fourth Street Church—that Faneuil Hall of Southern Methodism—Dr. Stevenson presiding. All the officers provided for by the constitution were duly elected—but one. The third article of the constitution provides, besides the Treasurer, residing at Louisville, Ky., that there shall be two Assistant Treasurers, "one of whom shall reside in Charleston, S. C., and the other in in New Orleans, La." An Assistant Treasurer for Charleston was elected, but none for New Orleans. We are at a loss to account for this, and find no explanation of it in the report.

The Secretary, Dr. Sehon, justly complains of the want of attention to disciplinary requirements on the part of the officers of a few of the Annual Conferences in forwarding their reports to his office. This has not only delayed the bringing out of his report, but, with all his labor and care to produce a perfect one, has left some gaps which it was impossible to fill up. It is to be hoped that his calls will be heeded in future. We suggest that it is a grave matter for an Annual Conference not to be represented in this report, and where this is due to the negligence of the officers, the Conference would do itself justice by putting others in their places.

Dr. Sehon has given an easy and lucid arrangement of our missions, and we take

I. Missions in the Destitute Portions of the Regular Work.—These are justly regarded of "first importance." They are the foundation for future self-sustaining circuits and stations. It is beginning at Jerusalem. Those who plead that charity should begin at home, will find nothing unfavorable to this, if no other difficulty. The system of population that now prevails, and will long prevail in this country, marks out domestic missions as a field upon which much of the Church's [illegible] is to be expended. Sparsely settled regions, poor districts of land and new settlements present cases of religious destitution which nothing but organized missionary effort relieves. The preacher visits them [illegible]; they can support him only in part. But with more or less help for a few years some of these places become able to support the preaching of the Gospel among themselves, and aid in sending it to others. The Texas Conference, where striking examples of this wholesome policy have occurred, thus alludes to it, in the last report:

"Long and unvarying experience convinces us that moneys expended in aiding the settlements in supporting their preachers is profitably invested. They soon become self-supporting, and return, with interest, the moneys expended upon them."

Patriotism should bring every citizen to the support of these missions. They have opened every where the quickest and cheapest and surest means of the social elevation of those who are his fellow citizens. They are spoken of in those who meet him at the [illegible] bar and the judgment seats of time. The poor we shall have always with us, even in our richest countries and best times. The domestic missions are their hope. And the path of the emigrant must be followed up promptly by these Gospel pioneers, and his wants supplied by the circuit. It is [illegible] hard work. It is a sort of John the Baptist work, preparing the way for flourishing churches and the highest order of civilization. It presents strikingly one of the noblest features of Christianity—aggressiveness.

We are happy to believe that the claims of this class are not grudgingly supported. There are 136 of these missions, including a mixed membership, of whites 22,676, and colored 1,922. In Holston Conference are 14 of them; St. Louis has 16; Mississippi and Arkansas and Georgia each 13. In Texas are 7, Louisiana 2, Alabama 8.

II. Missions among the People of Color.—The Annual Conference reports all present this subject in a manner distinctly recognizing the peculiar position and duty of Southern Methodism in the premises. The Secretary well remarks: "Our position and our duty are not doubtful—by the one is the other [illegible] enforced." As a Church, we have no pastoral scene to the servile population at a cost which shows how much we value it. Our heritage ground is obtained, and not to use it well would argue incompetency, and [illegible] as a grievous sin to the providential indications.

Preaching to the negroes! Our platform orators have discovered poetry in this, and so beautifully the lot of the plantation missionary is depicted, one would suppose that every member of the Conference would be an eager candidate for the post. But the shades as well as lights of this work are now very generally appreciated. Godly men undertake it in consciousness, and not for poetry. One of the Conferences that has nobly [illegible] in the field, thus speaks of the [illegible], and we heartily agree:

[illegible] occupied, whether at a [illegible] self-[illegible] going spirit is demanded, and in which the sustaining principles of the Gospel of Christ are more necessary, and at the same time more beautifully exhibited, than in our missions to people of color, and the Ethiopian may as soon be expected to change his skin, or the leopard his spots, as the natural man patiently to endure the hardships of our missionaries, or fully appreciate the motives and feelings that urge them, from year to year, to undertake these god-like labors."

It is gratifying to behold the increasing order into which this work is being brought, from year to year. It is extending and an unprecedented anxiety is manifested by masters to afford religious instruction to their servants. There is an encouraging enlargement of subscriptions to the missionary fund from this quarter.

The difficulty of meeting all the demands for missionaries, results, we fear, from having carried too far a division of the congregations, white and colored. When it is convenient there are many reasons why they should worship together and be under the same pastoral charge. Upon this point we concur in the opinion held by the Memphis Conference, and expressed in their annual report:

"We fully believe, that, in some places, for missionaries specially to labor with the servants, in preaching to and instructing them in the way of life, will continue to be the most successful plan in securing and promoting their religious happiness. Yet, in many, if not in most places, their profit would be the better secured by allowing them to worship in the same house, and at the same time with the white congregation. It is cause of regret to know, as we all do, that our people have become exceedingly careless in reference to the religious interest of their servants, scarcely ever inviting them to attend circuit preaching with them, especially on week days; and, if there be a missionary within the bounds of a circuit, the circuit preachers give but little if any attention to the servants, committing them wholly to the missionary, who does not see them often enough to accomplish what is desired."

Of these missions, there are 120, numbering 33,378 members, and 16,385 catechumens. S. Carolina has 20, Mississippi 19, Georgia and Alabama each, 16, Louisiana 12, Texas 1.

III. German Missions.—This is easily told. Of ten missions of the church, South, to the Germans, three are in New Orleans, one in Mobile and the remainder in Texas. Missionaries 7, who, it is believed, are all converted men and laborious pastors; members, 332; churches, 5; Sabbath schools, 4, and pupils, 136.

The Galveston Mission, it is thought, will soon be detached from the Missionary Treasury and become self-supporting. With a good house of worship, we doubt not the first German mission in this city would assert its ability to live alone. Measures are now being taken for building such a house and under auspices promising success. The Church South has not yet been able to afford her German missions any books, periodicals or tracts in their own language, for use and distribution, and this is a felt want. The few members and congregations we have among the Germans are perhaps pro rata for what the church has outlayed in this cause. With out mistake there is a quickened interest in it and the results already attained are held as a hopeful nucleus for a great work among this interesting and growing people.

IV. Indian Missions.—The men of color, both red and black, have fallen to the guardianship of the Church South. The Indians at the division adhered to us, almost to a man. The whites owe a debt to this waning race, and what the church does for them must be done quickly. The scattered tribes on our Western borders, numbering in all less than 400,000, are all that remains of a once mighty people, the owners of this soil. The Secretary finds impediment in their evangelization, arising from their migratory habits not being counteracted by the Government in securing their possessions to them and perpetuating their lands in title to them. The Indian Mission Conference, embracing this work, has in it four P. Elder's districts; the Indian communicants number 3,869. There are eight schools maintained among them, principally on the manual labor plan, and in them 489 pupils. This Conference numbers several native Indian preachers, some of whom are highly spoken of for piety, talent and influence. We are pleased to observe the excellent understanding which the courteous Secretary keeps up between the government agents and the missionaries. The United States government has signified its confidence in the fidelity and economy of the Society's administration by dispensing through its agency, the last year, $9,155 50 for ameliorating and educating the Indians. Twenty-seven missionaries are operating in this field, and though their reports show many hindrances, they show no discouragement. The work is of a nature that must have time for development.

V. China Mission.—The Secretary considers the wisdom of the appointing power in the selection of men for this mission, as fully endorsed by the facts connected with the history of their labors. The originals, Rev. Messrs. Taylor and Jenkins, have lately been reinforced by W. S. Cunningham, of the Holston Conference. The two former have each buried a son in China—a sad endearment.

Mrs. Taylor, having suffered from irritation of the lungs for the last three winters, has, at the advice of her physician, returned to the United States, with two or three other invalids attached to the Protestant Missionary corps in Shanghai—hoping by and bye to return.

The missionaries seem to be hard students, and while preparing for future labors, are using their gifts of language at teaching and preaching as they acquire them. It is to be regretted that, with the exception of a small chapel, without the city proper, they still have "all out doors" for preaching in.

The American Bible Society has, during the last twelve months, furnished the missionaries with $2,000 for distributing the Scriptures in China. The 4th January, 1852, was a day of interest to this little band, the sole representatives of the M. E. Church, South, in the foreign field. On that day were baptised a native Chinaman and his wife. He speaks the Mandarin dialect—"the universal colloquial"—and thus has access to one hundred millions of his benighted countrymen. Lieu went into the pulpit from the baptismal font and gave a capital sermon, which in some shape he has kept up under the direction of the missionaries. While rejoicing over this success, they rejoice with trembling for the stability of the convert. May these first fruits be abundantly established.

We regret to see that the two schools in this mission have, for want of sufficient means been merged into one, under one teacher—pupils, 20.

The Church will perhaps have to exercise a long patience in this enterprise. These four hundred millions are not to be converted in a day. The numerical results already obtained by Jenkins and Taylor, are greater by two than the immortal Judson's, after laboring twice as long in India. Hasten slowly is the motto. As the way is opened, throw in more men and more means. Providence is never in a hurry, nor does Providence ever fail. Success eventually is sure, and let us be prepared for large success, and as early as God is pleased to give.

No License.

The North Louisinnian, of July 17th, gives us the intelligence below. We understand that there is much valuable land in this parish (Morehouse) yet to be settled. Men with families to raise up, had better be looking that way:

"On this 10th inst., the voters of ward No. 4, in which our town of Bastrop is situated, decided by a small majority that hereafte "no license" is to be granted for the keeping of grog shops and drinking houses in the ward. Elections have been held in all the other wards in the parish, and with the exception of Warde No. 8 and 9, all of them voted against the license system."

The editor holds the following language on the matter. We wish there were more of such editors in Louisiana:

"In our ward the greatest contest was had—there being one hundred and six votes polled, giving only a majority of seven votes for no license. This, though a small majority, is sufficient for the downfall of the present license system here, which expires on the 1st January next. It is a matter of great surprise to us that so many votes should be cast in this ward, to uphold a business of two or three men at a ruinous expense to the community, and which the proprietors thereof we feel satisfied know in their hearts is every thing else but conducive to the welfare and happiness of those who support them—and we feel satisfied that the result of the election here, will in the end be so apparent that all those who saw fit to cast their votes in favor of license, will be glad that they were defeated.

MARION FEMALE SEMINARY.—We are in receipt of a neat catalogue of this Seminary, located in Perry county, Ala., and under the superintendence of Rev. Jas. K. Armstrong, assisted by a Faculty of five teachers. Mr. A. has qualifications for his position provenble by experience, and also inferable from a finished literary and Christian character. ADVERTISEMENT next week.

SABBATH SCHOOL CAUSE.—The Northern Sunday School Advocate, in an article showing the "adaptation of Methodism to promote the cause of Sunday Schools," intimates that there are, in all the branches of the Methodist Church throughout the world, 12,000 schools, 200,000 teachers, 1,000,000 scholars. If Methodists do their duty, and enjoy the favor of God, for the next twenty years, the two latter items ought to be quintupled. Irrespective of all who shall have passed through these schools to heaven, and to different fields of Christian usefulness upon earth, Methodism ought in 1872 to have in her Sunday Schools one million of teachers, and five millions of scholars.

This is a glorious and animating prospect, truly—one that should excite the ministry and membership of the Church to renewed and unwearied labors.

RECEIPTS.—These are unavoidably delayed another week. Let none of our correspondents be anxious about their letters—doubtless they are safely in hand. By the bye, we shall have much need of funds the next three months. Verbum sat.

A CRASH.—On Tuesday night last, about midnight, a part of the roof of the new M. E. Church, now building on Carondelet street, fell in with a crash. The timbers, it seems, were defective. The repairs of roof and other damage done will require some $4,000 or $5,000.

METHODIST PRESS.

CONNECTION WITH CHINA.—The "Observer" is publishing a series of most interesting letters from the Rev. B. Jenkins, missionary of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in Shanghai, China. We regard all religious communication between China and California with peculiar interest. It is the last link completing the world's circuit, and is daily growing in its important moral and religious connections. The editor remarks, in publishing the first of the series:

"As will be seen, the writer wields a graphic pen, and being a bold and energetic character, will, we doubt not, be read with great interest. Several of these communications have already reached us, while a succession is promised at an early day. Our next number will contain an interesting account of the writer's visit in disguise, to the interior of China, together with an inscription taken from the tomb of Confucius, which can not fail to interest every class of readers. It gives us unutterable pleasure to have become, at so early a day, the connecting link between our brethren in the Atlantic States and those in Asia. Brother Jenkins forwards packages to several points in the Atlantic States, via San Francisco, to our care, to be sent on by express, which we shall now and henceforth find great pleasure in doing, and hope soon to be made the conducting agents, in sending more missionaries to China, this being, undeniably, the great highway to those benighted millions of souls."

The California Advocate, of June 24, speaks encouragingly of Church extension. This paper is urging a point of reform perseveringly—the abolition of Sunday papers. We are pleased to see both of these papers taking strong ground against the prejudice and policy that so unreasonably (as it seems to us) obtains in California against the Chinese. For all that appears to the contrary, the Celestials make industrious, peaceable citizens, and among foreigners, as good as the best. On the more policy of prohibition of the Asiatics, the Observer says:

"The subject is one of no small or trifling magnitude, and is, we doubt not, destined to the production of consequences seriously affecting our own country as well as China. To say nothing of the harmony of the prohibition of foreigners by law with American republicanism, it is a question of some importance at least, whether or not it is wise, when the door to Asia is thrown open to us and its commerce ready to pour into American markets, to shut the door and turn that vast and remunerating trade into the hands of England, now so eagerly seeking it. The commercial intercourse now opening up between the United States and China, is one which has long and diligently been sought by enlightened and powerful nations—and do we seek to throw it back and give it to others?"

TO THE OLD RULE.—The editor of the Western Advocate ventures to recall preachers and people to the enforcement of attendance on class meeting as a condition of membership. It is to be feared that in many places this rule has fallen into obsoleteness, and there is need for a very judicious administration.

He says: "For those who neglect class will be found, for the most part, either grently wanting in Christian experience, or they have already fallen into a state of lukewarmness, or are negligent in acknowledged Christian duties, or something is defective in heart or life in some way. Those remarks will not apply to members of other churches, among whom class meetings do not formally exist. Yet in all well regulated churches, institutions exist among the members that maintain substantially, if not so efficiently, all the elements of class meetings. In all churches of Christ, exhortation, watching over one another, seeking out the wanderer, and many other requirements, are constantly employed to build up the members in faith and holiness. The mere form of the class meeting seems, as a wise, prudential means, to be admirably calculated to promote the spirit of piety, and to insure the observance of all those means of grace which all good Christians find it necessary to observe. The Methodist, therefore, who neglects his class, will mostly be led to neglect those vital matters which the formalities of the class so well secure, and which all devout Christians look upon as necessary, and they do in part observe them. And when a Methodist is excluded the Church for neglect of his class, he is excluded because he in fact neglects what is expressly enjoined by the word of God, "Forget not the assembling of yourselves together," etc.

Consequently, it is the duty of all preachers in charge to enforce attendance on class as a term of membership in the Methodist Episcopal Church. It is true, this is to be done with great tenderness; but it should be done with great decision, not in haste, but after due exhortations and attempts to restore. The leader should endeavor to prevent non-attendance, and should visit, exhort and do his best to secure the presence of all his members, the sick excepted. If his exhortations fail, the preacher in charge is required to visit and do his utmost to bring the neglecter to his proper place in the Church. If bearing for a season the godly endeavors of the leader, and the consequent exhortations and admonitions of the preacher, will not effect a cure, then exclusion is the safer way for all concerned. By this means the vitality of the Church will be preserved, and religion will be the gainer."

The St. Louis Advocate urges upon the Church South, in that rapidly enlarging city, to lengthen their cords and strengthen their stakes. It says there are now five houses of worship, besides one in question, and five more are needed.

Centenary College Commencement.

MR. EDITOR: According to promise, I send you some notice of the annual treat of the Commencement week of Centenary College. The ball fairly opened to-night, with the exhibition of the PREPARATORY SCHOOL.

The chapel was crowded on this interesting occasion with parents and distinguished visitors, trustees, ministers, students and ladies, and was brilliant with every thing but—light. A nebula of "star candles," barely resolvable, served a melancholy duty, and shed disastrous twilight over the perplexed audience.

The boys did credit to themselves and to the drilling of their preceptor. There was a sturdy good sense about the whole affair very much like Brother A. G. Miller himself. The very first speech broke the ice and carried me back to old times; it was so downright school-boyish. The second was the immortal, "Imagine to yourselves a Demosthenes addressing the most illustrious assembly in the world;" and certainly no exhibition would be perfect without either that, or "Gods! can a Roman Senate long debate!"

The boys had a hard task of it, to be cool and eloquent; for there, right before them, in full, was a blaze of eyes from all the beauties in the neighborhood. Poor fellows! it was like trying to look at the sun without winking.

The speeches were pleasantly short, and enlivened by dialogue, by one Latin and one Greek speech, which, from not being understood, were listened to with marked attention. The whole ended in a specimen of the rare times, rare youths and rare parents that make up "College Scenes." This piece, with several others, was composed by the Principal, for the occasion; and it afforded the parents present a good chance to see what some of their "good boys" do when away from home. Some knowing lads were seen on the stage with letters from their fathers, which stated their transcendent qualities. One who was "too far advanced to be taught in this town," and whose father requested that he should be "put in the junior class," stood a very significant examination—"Nominative, Stella; possessive, Stellæ; objective, Stellus." He "knowed Greek, too, lots of it"—"Tupto, Tuptis, Tuptit."

One of the young gentlemen spoke Brother Walkers' communication to the N. O. Advocate—"Good Company." It was very well pronounced. Several of the speakers exhibited very tasteful thorough training in enunciation, action and emphasis. The most taking piece of the night was a speech on "Marriage." Marry, murry, yes, marry; who would not marry! Answer, ye withered, soulless old bachelors, who stand like leafless, branchless, dead trees in the farmers' field; so deeply rooted in the stiff clay of life that ye stand erect; ye low and desolate trunks, rifted by the winds and dissolved by the rains of adverse fate, answer, answer, this momentous question! Ye self-styled lords of creation, whose ambition never soared higher than a high-heeled boot, with a gold chain in the vest hung to a trunk key in the pocket: ye silken daughters of leisure, who frisk and dance in the phosphorescent light of your genius, whose hearts are as hollow as an air bubble, and as soft as a frost-bitten pumpkin, come, come on, come all, and hear what is written against you!

"Beauty is but skin deep;
Ugly goes to the bone;
Beauty soon fades away,
But ugly holds its own."

The performance was interspersed with music by the College orchestra, which is composed entirely of students, under the conduct of Mr. Blackmar. This was to me one of the most interesting features of the occasion. The music was excellent, and shall receive hereafter a more extended notice.

On to-morrow morning will be held the exhibition of the Societies; after which, his Excellency Gov. Foote, of Mississippi, will address them.

Yours, K.

A PRAYER NOT ANSWERED.—Many years ago, a man then recently married settled in my native town. It was then quite new, destitute of religious privileges, and given to all manner of wickedness. There was no Sabbath, and no sanctuary. The man was pious. The thought of bringing up a family in such a place distressed him. He wished to remove; and he used to retire daily to a little grove, and pray that God would send some one to buy his farm. This prayer was not answered. Better things were in store. A neighbor was taken sick. He visited and conversed with him. In the midst of the conversation, one sitting by interrupted him and said, "Sir, if what you say is true, I am lost." This gave new interest to the occasion. Prayer was offered, the Spirit was found out, and many were converted. A prayer meeting was started; other revivals followed; in due time a church was organized, a house of worship built, and a pastor settled, mainly through the instrumentality of that one man; and he trained up his family there, and lived to see most of them members of the church of Christ. Thus God often does better for us than our fears, and better than our prayers. Let us aim to be useful, and look over to God for his blessing to rest upon us and upon our efforts, upon the church and the world. Several Things.

MR. EDITOR: I have just returned from a tour of several weeks on the Natchez District, whither I had gone to assist the brethren in holding their Quarterly Meeting, our Presiding Elder being absent for a short time, in search of health for his afflicted companion. The trip was one of pleasure and profit to me, and, I trust, also to others. It gave me an opportunity of greeting old acquaintances, and forming many new ones, of the most agreeable kind. But what gave me more pleasure than any other incident of my journey, was the privilege of uniting with the Church in holding a protracted meeting, on the old Bethel Camp ground, in Wilkinson Circuit.

Our meeting commenced on the 8th and closed on the 13th inst. In consequence of sickness in some families, rainy weather, and a meeting being held at the same time, not far off, in an adjoining circuit, our congregations were not as large as usual for Bethel. But our meeting was a profitable one: the Church was quickened; thirteen white and seventeen colored members were added, and we had several conversions of the right sort.

Since Brother A. T. M. Fly has been in charge of Wilkinson Circuit, there has been an increase at Bethel of fifty-eight white and eighty-seven colored members, which, in addition to former numbers, shows a total of ninety-eight white, and one hundred and twenty-seven colored members.

But it is not so much of our late meeting that I wish to write, as to sketch some pleasant reflections and cheering reminiscences that were called up by my visit to a place deservedly famous in the history of Southern Methodism. Never having lived near Bethel, and never having had any pastoral connection with the church there, I am not the man to write its history; but I sincerely hope this may be done by some one of competent ability, while the materials for such a history are yet extant. It is important that this successive triumph of the Gospel, at Bethel, for forty years, should be recorded, that men may be led to "praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men."

A venerable mother in Israel, who still resides in the vicinity, informed me that the first house of worship, which was a plain, wooden building, was erected there about forty years ago, principally by Bro. E. Mageshee, and a gentleman by the name of Phares.

One of the interesting reminiscences connected with the first Bethel, is, that soon after its erection it was honored by the presence and preaching of the deeply pious and tender hearted Lewis Hobbs. He came as a missionary from the South Carolina Conference to Wilkinson Circuit, in 1811, and continued there in 1812. In 1813, he was stationed in New Orleans, where he became deeply consumptive; and in 1814 he left this country for Georgia, the place of his nativity, telling his brethren here, on his departure, that he was going home to die. He got home in June and died early in the following September. I love to hear the old members talk about that holy man, and devoted and faithful minister of Christ. He partook largely of the spirit of Jeremiah, and often wept over his congregations.

The "number of the disciples multiplied" so fast at Bethel, that they soon had to put up a house of more ample dimensions, which in its turn has been superseded of late years by a substantial and commodious brick edifice. One very important item in church-building seems to have been overlooked in the construction of this house, which is much regretted; that is, no place has been set apart for the occupancy of the colored congregation—so that when the white congregation is large they are necessarily excluded from the house. And this is to be the more regretted, as they are served by the circuit preachers in connection with the white congregation. But the brethren there will remedy this in some effectual way. I confess I preach to a white congregation with a much greater assurance of success, where I find they have made specific arrangements to secure to their servants, regularly, the preaching of the Gospel, with its attendant privileges.

When the first camp meeting was held at Bethel I am not informed. In 1823 I first visited the place on a camp meeting occasion, and the encampment then had the appearance of age. I well recollect the introductory sermon preached by Bro. Winans, from Psalm C, 4:5. "Enter into his gates with thanksgiving, and into his courts with praise: be thankful unto him, and bless his name; for the Lord is good; his mercy is everlasting, and his truth endureth to all generations." That sermon is still fresh in my memory, and the maturity of age has only confirmed me in the belief, that it was one of the most appropriate and effective I ever heard. In preaching another sermon on the first Psalm, he was led by the Spirit in a most extraordinary manner.

We felt indeed that the awful God was present and spoke to our hearts by his servant. Those who never heard Brother Winans preach until his vocal organs were impaired by age and hard usage, can have but a faint idea of the immense volume and shrill intonations of his voice when he was in his prime, or the divine power that often attended his public ministrations. He still lives among his brethren of the Mississippi Conference, one of the best specimens of a primitive Methodist preacher now extant. At the camp-meeting of 1832, I heard one of the most extraordinary men preach I ever knew. I refer to Mark Moore, who for thirty-seven years previous had figured extensively in the Atlantic States, both as a traveling and local preacher. His place was evidently in the pulpit. God designed him for the work of the ministry, and hence, he prospered in nothing else but preaching. All secular business seemed to wither at his touch, but, as a preacher, his fame was co-extensive with a knowledge of his name. His appearance was truly apostolic. In preaching he seemed to aim at nothing great—nothing sublime; and yet he was really great and sublime. His strong-hold was the power that attended his ministrations. In him we had evidence that it is not essential for a preacher to speak loud in order to speak powerful; for when preaching just loud enough to be distinctly heard by the outer circle of a camp-meeting audience, there was an energy in what he said that gradually insinuated itself into the inner man until it made every chord of thought and feeling vibrate. I heard him preach at a camp-meeting on 1 Thess. iv 16: "For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first." I record that sermon as one of the most eloquent and powerful I have yet heard. "The dead in Christ shall rise first!" How distinctly I recollect his outstretched hand, his glowing countenance, his moistened eyes, and the trembling intonations of his voice as he dwelt on this subject—Christian hope. Never before had I been so completely unmanned, disabled and unfitted for anyway from every thing earthly, as I was under the peroration of that sermon. Mr. Moore was a fine specimen of pulpit oratory. When I heard him he seemed to possess in a high eminent degree, the rare talent of speaking low, while he felt loud.

Before the next annual camp-meeting festival at Bethel, this great and good man had gone in the Lord, and his body reposes in a quiet grave, awaiting the time when "the dead in Christ shall arise."

How long the camp-meetings were annually kept up at Bethel I know not. For the present, they have been superseded by what we call "protracted meetings."

In the last forty years Bethel has been the spiritual birth-place of multitudes of souls, and the leaven has spread from this point into all the region round about. There is one fact in relation to this church that deserves special notice, which is, that after the existence of about fifty years, Methodism has never died out in this locality; so far from it that it still exists in youthful vigor, and has as fair to live and flourish as ever it did. Member after member has died or moved into other localities, but their places have been supplied by new accessions, so that the church is, perhaps, as numerically strong at any former period. It is a melancholy truth, that this can not be said of some other places in the river counties of Mississippi, where Methodism once existed in purity and power, but now scarcely exists in name. "O, Lord! revive thy work!"

The following Saturday and Sunday of our meeting closed at Bethel, I attended a quarterly meeting on Buffalo circuit, which under the pastoral charge of Brother Lorenco. The territory of this circuit was formerly attached to Wilkinson circuit, but by some strange neglect or unaccountable oversight in the predecessors of Brother Fly, it had been left out, and the sheep shadowed by their shepherds.

From the line of Amite county to the mouth of the Homochitto river, not a single appointment has been kept up by the traveling preachers within ten miles of that river on the south side; and yet, to judge from the size of the congregation we had at the quarterly meeting, there are multitudes of people in that region to preach to. Brother Fly went out through this forsaken territory last year, and found people enough to form a new circuit, so that Buffalo appears for the first time on the regular list of appointments.

The brethren had worked me hard at the previous meeting, so that my voice was exceedingly feeble at this quarterly meeting, but God was there in the power of his grace, so that, especially on the Sabbath, we had a time of general interest and deep feeling. Six or seven joined the church, and a large number bowed at the altar for an interest in our prayers. The preachers there also ought to make arrangements to hold a protracted meeting at Hopewell. I would like to attend it if possible to do so. "I will go with God's blessing upon our labors, and the harvest of souls might be gathered into the garner in that section.

Yours, affectionately,

J. G. JONES.

A COLORED MAN FROM NORFOLK IN LIBERIA.—Jasper Bough, an intelligent colored man, who sailed from Norfolk, Va., in July of last year, and who settled in Liberia, has lately written an interesting letter to the Rev. Wm. H. Starr, of Norfolk. It is dated Ashland, Liberia, May 26, and after expressing his gratification with every thing in his new home, and saying that nothing could induce him to return to Norfolk, he adds:

"I live in my own house, on my own lot of 80 acres, and eat every day of my life provisions and breadstuffs of my own raising. I have been growing as my 1852 crop, a large quantity of cassadas and potatoes, several acres of sugar canes, several acres of rice, and several lots of ginger; I have now ready to be transported into my nursery several thousand coffee plants, nearly one hundred cocoa nuts, (not cocoa nuts, mind you, but chocolate,) and about the same quantity of mango plums. My present crop, when it matures, will be worth about one thousand dollars. My sugar crop will be worth over three hundred dollars. I will have about 150 cross of rice, which is worth from 75 cents to $1 per cross."

He concludes by strongly urging the oppressed people in Norfolk to come to Liberia, and it would seem that they are rendering his advice, as 175 applications have already been made for passages in the vessel to sail from that port on the 1st of November next.

MENDICANT DOG.—"I was travelling," says M. Blaze, "in a diligence. At the place where we changed horses I saw a good looking poodle dog, (chien caniche,) which came to the coach door, and sat upon its two hind legs, with the air of one begging for something. 'Give him a sou,' said the postillon to me, 'and you will see what he will do with it.' I threw to him a coin; he picked it up, ran to the baker's, and brought back a piece of bread, which he certainly did: he had no master, and begged alms on his own account."

A curious case is related by the Troy (N. Y.) Budget. A girl in that city losing her speech for a while from Being disobedient, and refusing to answer her mother when spoken to, she found, after sitting dumb by a corner for about an hour, brooding over her bad conduct that she was unable to utter or articulate a word. Her friends did not take particular notice of her for a couple of days, supposing she was keeping up her pet. But she wrote down that she could not speak, when her friends became alarmed and consulted several physicians, but a week had passed she awoke one morning and found herself again in speaking order.

FUNERAL OF BISHOP CHANCHE.—The remains of the Right Reverend J. J. Chanche, D. D., Bishop of Natchez, arrived in Baltimore on the 23d, and the funeral obsequies were to be performed the next day. He was to be interred in the Cathedral Burial Ground, alongside his only sister, whose ashes repose in that hallowed spot.

ATTENTIONS TO A BISHOP.—The lately appointed Bishop of Nova Scotia applied to the government of that province to allow the soldiers of that garrison to present arms to him, which Sir John Harvey permitted and it is heard from the Commander-in-Chief. The old Tory answer was, "The only attention the soldiers owe is to the Bishop, is to his sermons."

Some men devote themselves so exclusively to their business, as to almost entirely neglect their domestic and social relations. A gentleman of this class having been was asked what he intended to do. "I am going home," said he, "to get acquainted with my wife and children."

Obituary.

Major B. TALIAFERO was born in Wilks county, Georgia, Feb. 3, 1787, and died in this place on the 3d of July, 1852, leaving a wife and seven children to mourn their irreparable loss.

For a long time he had been afflicted with a disease of the heart, from which he for some time past has been anticipating a sudden death. On Saturday, July 3, he returned home about sundown, took his seat as usual, and expired, without speaking, in a few minutes. He was a consistent member of the M. E. Church in this place.

We are heppy to say of our departed brother, that he was scrupulously honest—honest in social, in pecuniary and in spiritual things. The fictitious and deceitful he abhorred. He wished to be accounted only at its true value—a trait as rare as it is commendable in this unreal world and age. This principle manifested itself especially in connection with his religious interests. His great caution, lest he should profess more spirituality than he really possessed, operated as a nervous check upon his religious enjoyments. In conversing on the subject, he always insisted, without reserve, and with uncommon power, what he considered his failings and infirmities.

During the last few months of his life, religion occupied and absorbed his attention in a peculiar manner. He was regular, faithful and assiduous in the discharge of his Christian duties. Of his state of mind in the last moments, the suddenness of his decease prevents us from speaking. We are satisfied, however, that in the faith in which he lived he died; and we have, therefore, comfortable assurance that he now dwells with those who "are before the throne of God and serve him day and night in his temple."

General Intelligence.

The Credit of New Orleans.

We copy the following from the Delta of Thursday evening:

We take very sincere pleasure in referring to the announcement below, of Messrs. Couverse and Place, as commissioners for the sale of city bonds, now in New York—a duty which they have performed with so much credit to themselves, and in a manner so highly advantageous to the financial credit of the city. The several bids for these bonds will be found in our commercial article of this evening. The city of New Orleans is now where she should have long since been—clear out of the grasp of Bayliss and shavers, her matured debts all paid, or about to be so paid, and her financial credit and character re-establishe d. Messrs. Converse and Place are paying off the obligations of the several former Municipalities, and of the late city of Lafayette, so fast as they are presented to them in New York, and Col. Garland, the able and efficient City Treasurer, is equally actively engaged in a similar duty here.

Last Friday he paid over $500,000 of the old debt, and on Tuesday and Wednesday paid each day about $170,000. The demand on the Treasury has since, we learn, fallen off, and but few claims were presented to-day. This healthy issue of the finances of the city cannot fail to have a highly beneficial effect on the general business of the city.

NOTICE.—The holders of matured obligations and interest coupons of the city of New Orleans, or either of the late Municipalities Numbers One, Two and Three, or of the late city of Lafayette, will receive payment for the same on the presentation to the undersigned, at the office of Frost & Converse, No. 148 Pearl street, prior to the 1st day of August next.

☞ On those payable in New Orleans, the current exchange on the latter city will be charged.

New York, July 21, 1852.

WM. P. CONVERSE, } Commissioners.
L. H. PLACE, }

In copying the above, we cannot refrain from congratulating our citizens that New Orleans is no longer a city of four separate governments, and that consolidation—the perfect and necessary consolidation, not only of the old three Municipalities, but of Lafayette with them as well—has been accomplished so successfully, and with such flattering results. When every one of our four divisions sought credit abroad, upon its separate account and responsibility, it found itself unknown, and with no larger credit than might be accorded to a city ward, or backwoods county; whilst the very fact of every one of them making application for such credit, confessed capitalists, and made them discredit that old defunct shadow of a name called the city of New Orleans.

Under the new state of things, we may see our way clear before us in the opening light of a new day of commercial prosperity. Our city is now a unit, and so is our credit; and it is as much better as would be the credit of four merchants than the credit of any one, or two, or three of them, to the exclusion of one or more.

We feel sincerely rejoiced at the improved state of things. If our State Convention does its duty, we have full confidence in a prosperous future, in multiplied resources, largely swollen population, busier trade and steadily increasing prosperity. New Orleans will yet be the Queen City of the South, and the centre of a magnificent commercial empire.

We append the particulars of the bids for the New City Bonds.

We are indebted to Mayor Crossman for the following list of the bids made in New York for the new consolidated loan of thle city, which was finally awarded to Messrs. Jas. G. Kiog & Sons, of New York, as it is believed on foreign account:

DEATH OF CHRISTOPHER ADAMS, JR.—A telegraphic dispatch received in this city announces the death, in Philadelphia, on Wednesday last, of this valuable and much esteemed citizen. Mr. Adams was formerly a resident of New Orleans and a successful merchant, but for some years past has resided in the parish of Iberville, where he owned a fine plantation. He has filled several public stations in the city, with much ability, among them, Manager of the Union Bank, and, after the removal of Mr. Frorer last fall he was offered the Collectorship of the Port, which he refused. He was for some years an able and vigilant member of our State Senate and was recently chosen President of the Opelousas Railroad Company, and his great abilities will be a serious loss to the Company. His health had been feeble for some time, and his trip North was made with the hope of improving it. The citizens of Iberville have lost a highly useful member of their community.

NEW ORLEANS RAILROAD STOCK.—The Aberdeen (Miss.) Democrat says that $270,000 worth of stock in the New Orleans and Nashville Railroad was been taken in Monroe county, Miss. The editar says that but a short time will elapse before a letter or dispatch will be sent to Mr. Robb from Aberdeen, informing him that Monroe county has done her duty, and that $500,000 will be forthcoming.

A GREAT WINDFALL.—A young lady of Brooklyn, N. Y., named Payne, has recently received a legacy amounting to £75,000 sterling, from a Don Iluy Emanuel Hernando, a wealthy West India planter. This lady, it is said, was married to the planter in 1846, when she was scarcely fifteen years old, but the marriage having proved an unhappy one, it was never proclaimed. Shortly after he left her and took up his residence in New Orleans. In 1848 he received information of his father's death—he returned to his estate in South America, and succeeded in increasing his large fortune to one hundred and fifty thousand pounds sterling. As he was about to embark for Havana, he was taken with cholera, and died on his estate, bequeathing seventy-five thousand pounds to his wife, (if living,) and the whole if she never married and resided on his estate, which will render her the wealthiest heiress in the United States.

DESTRUCTIVE GALE.—A dispatch to the Charleston Courier says: Terrible gales have occurred in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, causing great disasters to shipping. Among those already known, we hear of the bark Trusty, from England, as having gone ashore, and eighteen of her crew losing their lives. The schooner Alliance is also said to have gone ashore near St. Paul's Island, and all on board to have been lost. Fifteen schooners likewise, it is reported, have been lost near Magdalen Island, and twenty pilots drowned.

DREADFUL ACCIDENT.—The Boonsboro (Md.) Odd Fellow, states that a son of James Campbell, Esq., of Franklin co unty, Pa., aged about eleven years, was escaped at a bark mill, a few days ago, and by some misbap was caught in the machinery and forced through an aperture, or space between the shaft and beam, not more than five inches square. A number of his teeth were found sticking in the beam; his nose was mashed, his head dreadfully injured, his mouth and chin severely cut, besides other injuries, and yet he is doing well, and his physicians say he will recover.

THE FRENCH LANGUAGE.—A number of young officers of Prussia are about to visit Paris at the expense of their own government. Their mission is not a military one, although they are to return to military service; but the design is that they shall learn to speak the French language with perfect propriety.

ANTIDOTE FOR STRYCHNINE.—A writer in the Texas Ranger gives an account of the successful treatment of some negroes, who had been poisoned with strychnine prepared for wolf's bate. Melted hog's lard was administered to them freely after they had suffered in great agony for several hours, and immediate relief was the consequence.

NEW LINE OF STEAMERS.—Arrangements have been fully consummated by which a line of Ocean steamers is to be established between Portland, Me., and Liverpool, in connection with the Portland and Montreal Railroad, commencing in the autumn of 1853, in season for the fall and winter business.

SALT IN IOWA.—We learn from the Dubuque (Iowa) Tribune, that specimens of beautifully crystallised salt were recently discovered about two miles southwest of that town. In grading the road-track the earth was removed from some rocks, in a crevice of which the salt deposit was found. A piece weighing upwards of 100 pounds was taken out.

THINGS IN HAVANA.—A correspondent of a New York paper says that the new administration in Havana is making several reforms, which are of great value. Havana now wears the appearance of a Northern city on the Sabbath; no places of business being open after 10 in the morning, and then only for certain necessaries required by the laboring population, who subsist from day to day upon their earnings. Another order inhibits profane and indecent language in the streets—and a third resuscitates an ancient ordinance prohibiting the exposure of nudities in the streets, so that parents have to dress their children once more in Havana, which is a decided improvement.

La Verdad Pueblo, Organ de Independencia, a sheet full of revolutionary sentiments, is out in Havana. Copies of it are scattered in town and country. The Government has offered a reward of $3000 for the apprehension of any one connected with the printing or circulation of this sheet. (two numbers of which have been issued.) but without success. This shows that there is a remarkable inct on the part of the publishers, agents, etc.

FREE SOIL MEETING—Ludicrous Scene.—A meeting of the free soilers was held in Baltimore on the 22d inst., which was pretty numerously attended as it seemed at the outset. When the question was taken on the acceptance of the resolutions, it was found that the noes more than tripled the ayes. A gentleman then arose, and after stating that he was an "outsider," said that he did not think it right to interfere in the proceedings of their free soil neighbors, and requested all those who, like him, had attended the meeting from mere curiosity, to retire to a corner of the room. This was done amid much laughter. When it was found that the free soilers numbered exactly seven, exclusive of the Chairman and Secretary. The resolutions were then put and carried unanimously—ayes 9, noes 0. The free soilers then appointed six delegates to the Pittsburgh Convention, and adjourned amid much good humored confusion.

HOT WEATHER.—At New York on the 22d the mercury rose to 94½ in the shade, and for nearly six hours remained above 90.

FROST IN JULY.—The Rochester Advertiser says there was a heavy frost in Niagara county, N. Y., on Sunday night last, so that it was quite thick on the grass, and corn and other crops severely injured.

LIQUOR SEIZED.—In Providence, R. I., on the 22d inst., two hundred gallons of liquor were seized, it having been smuggled into the State contrary to law.

CONSULS RECOGNIZED.—The President has recognized Vincente Antonio de Larranaga as Consul of Spain for the States of North and South Carolina, to reside at Charleston.

Manuel Crosat has been recognized as Vice Consul of Spain at Mobile.

NEW FIRE ENGINE.—A St. Louis paper mentions a new fire engine invented by Daniel Tompkins. The plan is to have one or more gutta percha or India rubber pipes, upon which revolvn small rollers, placed in a large wheel. The rollers press the water out of the pipe or pipes, and then rise up to receive another supply of water. It is said to work both as a suction and a force pump, and the model throws water to a great distance.

NAPOLEON'S HAT.—A hat which the Emperor Napoleon wore during the Russian campaign, was sold at Chateau Thierry for 4000f. The hat belonged to Everard, one of the Emperor's valets de chambre who lately died.

FRIGHTENED INTO INSANITY.—Miss Caroline Whitney, of Nantucket, while walking through Purchase street, New Bedford, Mass., a few evenings since, was overtaken by an idiot known as "Rafe," who placed his hands upon her shoulders, and uttered some incoherent words, which alarmed Miss Whitney so much that she immediately fainted, and has since become insane.

A NEW SPECULATION.—A company is now forming in New York city, with a capital of $100,000, to be called the "New York Wood Fuel Company." The founders of this enterprise propose to take a large lot with a water front, near or in the city, to buy wood by the cargo and prepare it for use, sawing and splitting it by machinery.

ANOTHER OF THE LIFE-GUARD GONE.—Died, on Sunday, July 11, at his residence, in Hartford, Oxford county, Maine, Seth Sturtevant, in the 93d year of his age. He was with Washington at Valley Forge, and was in the battles of Stillwater and Monmouth. He was perfectly well on the day of his death; he arose from his seat, wound up his clock, resumed himself and fell asleep, and the first intimation the family had of his death was in his unusual silence. He died while sleeping in his chair.

MORE BODIES FOUND.—The Advocate, published at Covington, La., of Saturday last, says: "Within the past week, four bodies, sufferers from the ill-fated St. James, have been found, two having drifted into the mouth of the Tchefuncta and two into Bayou Lacombe—all men. A leg of one had been blown off. A description of the apparel found on these bodies can be had by any one interested, by application to Dr. J. W. Thompson, at Covington. This, we believe, makes thirty-eight deaths in all by the accident.

LARGE DONATIONS.—A lady of Charleston, Mrs. Kouno, a member of the Protestant Episcopal Church, has left upwards of $80,000 to religious and charitable purposes, besides $70,000 in bequests to relatives, servants and friends.

Mr. Dargan, the eminent Irish railway contractor, has placed in the hands of the Royal Dublin Society $100,000 for the purpose of an exhibition of the manufactures of the three kingdoms, to be held in Dublin in 1853.

MORE ESTATES.—Louis Napoleon is said to have bought lately two large estates in Poland, for the sum of 1,800,000 francs.

AUSTRALIA.—The Liverpool Courier estimates the tonnage of the ships engaged in the trade with Australia, at 100,000. This is exclusive of steamers. For the week ending June 27th, two thousand persons left Liverpool for Australia, and the weekly average was expected to exceed that number.

VALUE OF HUMAN LIFE IN AFRICA.—The Landers in Africa were dreadfully tormented by the rude curiosity of the natives, who almost suffocated them by crowding to and about their tents. On complaining of this nuisance to the chief of one place he said—"Take your gun and kill a few; you have my leave to slaughter as many as you please. After you have cut off the heads of many of them, the rest will not molest you."

GOOD ARRANGEMENTS.—In Paris and London when a house is pulled down and a new one put up, only two feet of the sidewalk is allowed to be taken up, and the space enclosed in a high board fence. The building is taken down and the rubbish immediately carried off, except what may be wanted in rebuilding, which is piled upon the premises, and not in the middle of the street as with us. Materials for the new building are brought as they are wanted.

A London correspondent of the New York Sunday Times says: The French army at Rome will, in all probability, soon return home. The Pope is seriously attacked with dropsy, but every care is taken to prevent the disagreeable fact becoming known. The Italian patriots are not idle. They have issued proclamations against the Romans paying taxes to the Pontiff, and the advice is being acted upon more generally than might have been anticipated. The emperor of Russia has bestowed the order of St. Anne on General Gemeau, the French commander-in-chief at Rome.

COTTON WORM.—The Alabama Standard, (Butler, Clarke county,) says that the cotton worm has made its appearance in vast numbers in that county. One planter has had his crop almost entirely destroyed.

COMBINATION.—A combination of the coal dealers of Cincinnati is about to be formed, "for the protection of the trade." In consequence of this step, coals have advanced to 14 cents per bushel. It is claimed that, taking the year through, the tetergels of the consumers will not be injured.

VICKSBURG AND SHREVEPORT RAILROAD.—The Executive Committee of this company have advertised for proposals to make the preliminary surveys. The whole distence is about 145 miles.

THE ARMY WORM.—The Columbia South Carolinian of the 23d inst. says the army worm is making sad havoc in some of the cotton plantations on the river, below that place.

ABOLITIONISM.—The Boston Hee says that the Atlas, published in that city, has suffered severely in its advertising and general business patronage, in consequence of its strong abolition tendencies.

VALUABLE PRESCRIPTIONS.—Weak doses of wash-board are now recommended by physicians for ladies who complain of dyspepsia. Young men troubled in the same way can be cured by a strong preparation of wood-sour.

Judge Hall, the Postmaster General, it is said, will be appointed U. S. Judge of the Northern District of New York, in place of Judge Conklin, appointed Minister to Mexico. Hon. Francis Granger is mentioned as the successor of Judge Hall for Postmaster General.

QUICK WORK.—Hussey's Reaping Machine, in an experiment, recently, in Maryland, among a company of farmers, cut twenty-five acres of wheat in a day, requiring twelve binders to keep pace with it. The wheat operated on was about five feet high, and very thick and heavy.

THE MISSION TO ENGLAND.—A dispatch from Washington says that Mr. Webster has positively declined to accept the mission to England, and it is now asserted that Mr. Crittenden will be appointed in place of Mr. Abbott Lawrence.

MOBILE AND OHIO RAILROAD.—We learn from the Noxubee (Miss.) Beacon that the subscriptions of Pontotoc county to this road have been increased to $320,000.

HEAVY WORK.—During the recent session of the grand jury of Philadelphia, they returned 666 indictments; 408 were for keeping tippling houses.

A WEALTHY MERCHANT DEAD.—George Collier, a wealthy and well known merchant of St. Louis, died in that city on the 18th inst. He leaves property estimated at over a million of dollars.

A MARYLAND FARMER.—The Easton (Md.) Star says that Col. Edward Lloyd, of that county, with his own servants—numbering near four hundred—some nine or ten farms—about 6,000 acres of land, including timber land, raises annually between 30,000 and 40,000 bushels of wheat and a much larger quantity of corn, besides various other valuable products. Besides these extensive operations in Talbot, he has a plantation carried on in the State of Mississippi, worth several hundred thousand dollars, and his annual income cannot fall short of $150,000. His residence is one of the most splendid in this country, and has been the homestead of the Lloyd family since their first settlement in Maryland.

A TEXAS editor, writing an obituary of his assistant, in which he refers to the talent and virtues of his deceased brother of the quill, concludes by observing "that he was an honest man—much more than he can say for the majority of his subscribers, and if they don't hollow it, if they will call on him he will beat it into their heads. He will be at leisure every afternoon at three o'clock." His subscription list, as the story goes, increased one hundred upon this announcement.

THE TEXAS CRUSADERS.—The Washington Union contains the following card:

As a member of the committee of three appointed by the creditors of Texas, we have seen with regret the publication made by General James Hamilton, chairman of the committee, urging the creditors generally to authorize him to act for them and accede to certain terms connected with the distribution of the five millions of five per cent. stock still held by the treasury.

We deem it our duty to state that the General's publication was made without our concurrence.

We regard the course recommended by him as injurious to the general interests of the great bulk of the creditors.

TO MAKE MOSQUITOES LEAVE.—Tie a piece of flannel or sponge to a thread made fast to the top of the bedstead; wet the flannel or sponge with camphorated spirits, and the mosquitoes will leave the room.

WHISKY-FED HORSES.—The N. Y. Journal of Commerce says that some of the horses employed on the Harlem Railroad may have been noticed as having a peculiarly "hard look," and a few may be considered as regularly installed into the fraternity of "hruters." It appears that during this hot weather, they are each in the habit of taking their "drap" of whisky and water, in order to better qualify them for labor. This mixture is regarded as an improvement on the usual beverage of horses in its native state, and as protecting the animals from the heat of the sun. Watt awhile, says the Journal, and you shall know whether this opinion is correct. For ourselves, we very much doubt its correctness.

PUNISHMENT IN SUMATRA.—The natives put the criminal into a hole, tie both his hands, and make him kneel down. The executioner then stabs him with a spear on the left shoulder, the criminal's hands are loosened, and executioner jumps upon, presses into the hole, and covers him with earth instantaneously. If two people fight and blood is drawn on the head, the party who has inflicted the wound pays eight dollars, a goat, a cabong of white cloth, and a bundle of serre: the goat is sacrificed, and the priests are assembled to pray. If the body is wounded the fine is four dollars, a fowl, yellow rice, and a seree. For smaller offences, flogging with a rattan is the usual punishment. [Anderson.

A NEW PISTOL.—The editor of the Hartford Courant describes a new pistol, patented by Mr. Christian Sharp, the inventor of the celebrated rifle. It is a rifle pistol, light and compact, but of great power, and fires with remarkable exactness. The target was pierced at a distance of three hundred yards, and we have no doubt that the pistol would do execution at a much greater distance. Though not a revolver, it can be fired with great rapidity—the inventor informs us that seven shots can be made in less time than the same number with Colt's pistol, though for a few shots the latter would have the advantage. Attached to it is Sharp's patent Primer, one of the simplest, yet most effective inventions ever made for this purpose—it never fails, in whatever position the pistol may be placed.

AMERICAN ENTERPRISE.—A writer in the Kingston (Jamaica) Journal, speaking of a rich copper mine recently discovered near Motcalfs, in that island, says:

Mr. Arthurs, the American Mining Captain, is the fortunate man who discovered this mine, the steep part of the surface of which appears to have been washed off by the heavy rains, leaving an immense surface of ore embedded in hush and vegetative matter. The Americans are indeed going ahead of the English mining companies in Jamaica, for they are now in possession, to all human appearance, of one of the richest and most promising copper mines probably in the world. Jonathan, I aspect, and not John Bull—though the captain himself may be a John Bull—will have the credit of being the first discoverer of one of Jamaica's richest occult treasures.

GERMAN EMIGRANTS' MARRIAGES AT BREMEN.—Mr. Locke, of the Savannah Republican, in a letter from Bremen, says:

"The Consul here drives a considerable business in the marrying line. On the day of my arrival he united 23 couples—all emigrants about to sail for America. The laws of New York and Bremen require these marriages by the Consul. There, unmarried women with children, or expecting, to have them, cannot land without giving heavy bonds. Here, the laws do not allow them to get married by a clergyman unless they have property enough to support a family. Hence, the duty falls on the Consul. Of all those who come to the Consul to be married, four-fifths have been living together before, and have nice little families already."

The Fishery Difficulty.

The Boston Courier of the 21st contains the following important document:

BOSTON, July 20, 1852

To the Editor of the Boston Courier:

SIR—Since my return to the city this morning I have received a copy of a dispatch from Mr. Everett, the United States Minister in London, to Mr. Buchanan, Secretary of State, which adds a very important feature to the subject of the fisheries, and which I send to you for immediate publication.

Yours, very respectfully, DANIEL WEBSTER.

LONDON, April 23, 1845

James Buchanan, Esq., Secretary of State:

SIR—With my dispatch No. 278, of March 25, I transmitted the note of Lord Aberdeen of the 10th of March, communicating the important information that this Government had come to the determination to concede to American fishermen the right of pursuing their occupation within the bay of Fundy.

It was left somewhat uncertain by Lord Aberdeen's note, whether this concession was intended to be confined to the Bay of Fundy, or to extend to other portions of the coasts of the Anglo-American possessions, to which the principles contended for by the Government of the United States equally apply, and particularly to the waters on the Northeastern shores of Cape Breton, where the "Argus" was captured. In my notes of the 25th ultimo and 24 instant, on the subject of the "Washington" and the "Argus," I was careful to point out to Lord Aberdeen that all the reasons for admitting the right of Americans to fish in the Bay of Fundy, apply to those waters and with superior force, inasmuch as they are less landlocked than the Bay of Fundy, and to express the hope that the concession was meant to extend to them, which there was some reason to think, from the mode in which Lord Aberdeen expressed himself, was the case.

I received, last evening, the answer of His Lordship, informing me that my two notes had been referred to the Colonial Office, and that a final reply could not be returned till he should be made acquainted with the result of that reference; and that in the meantime, the concession must be understood to be limited to the Bay of Fundy.

The merits of the question are so clear, that I cannot but anticipate that the decision of the Colonial Office will be in favor of the literal construction of the Convention. In the meantime, I beg leave to suggest, that in any public notice which may be given that the Bay of Fundy is henceforth open to American fishermen, it should be carefully stated that the extension of the same privilege to the other great bays on the coast of the Anglo-American dependencies, is a matter of negotiation between the two Governments. My notes of the 25th of March and 24 instant, will suggest the reason for presenting the actual state of the controversy in this form.

I am, sir, with great respect, your obed't servt.

(Signed,) EDWARD EVERETT.

Transmitted with dispatch No. 305.
The Earl of Aberdeen to Mr. Everett, April 21, 1845.

Later from Texas.

By the arrival yesterday of the steamship Louisiana, Capt. R. B. Forbes, we have received Galveston papers to the 23d inst., and our regular exchanges from the interior.

RAILROAD MEETING.—An enthusiastic railroad meeting has been held at Bastrop. Resolutions were adopted, pledging Bastrop county for her full share of money and labor in constructing the proposed San Antonio and Mexican Gulf road. The Gulf terminus has not yet been decided upon, but will be on the 21st December.

ROBBERIES.—The Austin Gazette states that within the past month or two, several robberies of a very daring character have been perpetrated in that city, and thus far the robbers have escaped detection. A few nights since, the safe of John H. Coste, Esq., setting in the County Clerk's office, was opened and robbed of about $500.

INDIANOLA.—The Bulletin says: "After some two months of rather dull times business is reviving again, and within the past week a large number of wagons were loaded for the interior."

ATTEMPT TO MURDER.—An attempt was recently made by three Mexicans to murder Mr. Wm. A. Herd, of Victoria, while on his way to the Rio Grande.

Mr. Herd and two companions had camped at noon about ten miles the other side of the stream known as the Little Colorado, and thirty miles this side of the Rio Grande. After they had taken their dinner, his two companions went to remove their horses, which were staked a short distance off, and Mr. Herd, who was reclining on the ground, hearing a rustling in the bushes behind him, sprang to his feet and discovered three Mexicans, one with his gun leveled and pointed at him. The Mexican immediately fired, and lodged the contents of his piece in the hand and side of Mr. Herd, who immediately seized his gun, but owing to his wounds was unable to manage it. His companions hearing the discharge of the Mexican's gun, hastened into camp and thus saved the life of Mr. H. The Mexicans, on seeing assistance so near, took to the thickets, and made good their escape. There is no doubt but that these men belong to a gang who are numerous enough to guard every pass and road in that whole country, and who never let an opportunity go by to murder and rob.

It is more dangerous to travel from here to the Rio Grande, and up and down that river, than it was during the Mexican war. Will our Government will not see to providing a remedy?

NEW EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS.—A Presbyterian school has been determined upon by the Presbytery of Eastern Texas, to be located in the vicinity of Fredonia, Rusk county.

The Western Texas Presbytery (O. S.) has fixed upon Goliad for their institutions of learning.

The Episcopalians of Texas have located an institution of learning at Anderson, Grimes county, to be called St. Paul's College.

FATAL AFFRAY.—The Houston Beacon of the 23d inst. says: "We learn that Richard Hanson, late of this place, was killed in Richmond, a few days since, by J. O. Wright, Esq., editor of the Brazos Delta. We have not heard the particulars."

EXTRA SESSION.—The subject of an extra session of the Legislature is engrossing a large share of public attention. Much diversity of opinion exists.

CHOLERA.—A letter from Victoria says that seven deaths from cholera occurred in that place on the 14th instant. There is no cholera at Corpus Christi.

THE CROPS.—The papers generally continue to speak of the promising condition of the crops throughout the State.

Louisiana Interior.

SHREWSBURY.—A private letter from Calliou Island informs the editor of the Thibodaux Minerva, that the schooner Henry Delaney, Capt. A. Dolo, with a full cargo of sugar and molasses, from Matagorda Bay, and bound to New York, was wrecked off that island on the morning of Saturday, the 17th inst. Vessel and cargo a total loss. No lives lost.

DEDICATION.—A Presbyterian Church is to be dedicated at Thibodaux, to-morrow.

CROPS.—The Thibodaux Minerva, of July 24th, says: "We were shown a sugar cane from Calliou Island which numbered fifteen red joints, and measured five feet in height."

The Marksville (La.) Villager, of July 22d, says, cotton, corn and cane on the bayous never promised a larger yield than this season. In the Prairie, in consequence of the protracted drought, the yield of corn will fall short of an average—that planted late being only fit for fodder. The showers of Tuesday and Wednesday last cannot improve the condition of rice and potato crops, and the quantity raised will hardly be sufficient for domestic consumption. Tobacco has stood the drought remarkably well.

FOREIGN ITEMS BY THE AMERICA.

The Kings of Bavaria, Holland and Belgium are to meet the King of Prussia in a few days at Schlangenbald.

The Emperor of Austria, having completed his tour in the southern provinces of Hungary, has returned to Buda.

A letter from Vienna, in the Times, states that the rumor of a proposed Lombard loan of 100,000,000 livres is not correct.

It appears from a letter of Mr. Moxon, the publisher, that the cause of delay in the erection of the statue to Campbell, the poet, in Westminster Abbey, arises from the high price charged by the dignitaries for permission to erect in Poet's Corner, viz: £288—a monstrous and audacious sum.

General Dembinski and M. Esemers write to the Paris Journal des Debats, referring to Gorgay's book on the Hungarian war, and deny that they offered the crown of Hungary to Russia. Gorgay himself, they say, was the only one by whom the proposal was ever made. Esemers's letter concludes thus: "To offer the crown of Hungary to the Russian could only be the work of a man reduced to the last extremities of despair, like M. Kossuth, or of a man destitute of principle, like M. Gorgay. I may add that Count Batthyani had, it is true, no confidence in Austria, but in Russia still less."

NEW YORK, July 25, 9 P. M.

The Collins steamer Baltic has arrived here, bringing dates from Liverpool to the 14th ult., four days later than the intelligence brought by the America. The following is a brief summary of her commercial accounts:

LIVERPOOL, July 14.

There has been a fair demand in the Cotton market since the departure of the America, and the sales of the four days embrace 20,000 bales, of which 4000 were taken for export, and 5000 by speculators. Prices have been stiffer, but without any quotable advance, though some brokers report the following rates: Fair Orleans 6¾; Middling Orleans 6¼; Fair Uplands 5¾, and Middling Uplands 5¼ d ₱ lb. [These rates are probably above the market, as without any actual advance the quotations would be the same as the official figures reported by the America, which were as follows: Fair Orleans 6¾, Middling Orleans 6¼; Fair Uplands 5¾, and Middling Uplands 5¼ d ₱ lb. Ed.]

Flour has been in fair request, at previous rates, and quotations closed at 19s. 6d. ₱ bbl for Western Canal, and 23s. for Ohio. Corn is unchanged, and is still quoted at 31s. ₱ quarter for Yellow, and 28s. 6d. for White.

NEW YORK, July 26th

The Baltic reports that the Cunard steamer Europa arrived at Liverpool on the afternoon of the 11th inst.

The Pacific mail steamer Thames arrived at Southampton on the 10th, bringing one million four hundred thousand dollars worth of gold.

A recent decree exempts the clergy of France from the obligation of taking the oath of allegiance, we presume.—Ed.]

NEW YORK, July 27th.

BUFFALO, July 27th.

There is a tremendous gathering at Niagara, and hundreds are arriving by every train. The camp ground is already covered with military from different points of the country, and every place is crowded with the visitors.

NEW YORK, Wednesday, July 28.

The steamboat Henry Clay, on her passage from Albany to this city, took fire this afternoon as the North river, a few miles above the city, and was destroyed. She had on board one hundred and fifty passengers, many of whom were lost by being burned or drowned. The boat is a total loss.

NEW YORK, Wednesday, July 28.

There has been a good demand in the Cotton market to-day, and the sales embrace 2000 bales. Prices are without change. Flour has been in fair request, and 11,000 barrels have sold at $4@$4 12½ ₱ barrel for State, and $4 25 for Ohio. Corn is steady, with sales of 40,000 bushels at 64c. ₱ bushel, for Mixed Western. Pork is still advancing, and 1200 barrels have sold at $20 for Mess, and $17 50 ₱ barrel for Prime.

NEW YORK, Thursday, July 29.

Further accounts have been received from the fishing grounds on the Northern coasts, which state that more vessels have been seized by the British cruisers, and sent into the British-American ports for condemnation. The British vessels are very active in their movements, and strict in the execution of their orders, to prevent American vessels from fishing within the limits assigned by the Colonial Governments.

Twenty-three of the bodies of the passengers who lost their lives by the burning of the Henry Clay have been recovered, among whom are Wm. B. Prescott of Louisiana, and Miss Moore of Tennessee. Fifty or sixty passengers are still missing, and it is believed that a large portion of this number were burned to death or drowned. The boat was crowded, and the passengers seem to have been so terrified as to have lost all command of themselves. The scene was frightful in the extreme.

NEW YORK, July 29.

The Europa brings Liverpool dates to the 17th instant, at which period the markets were dull, and most articles of American produce showed a declining tendency.

The sales of Cotton for the week ending the 17th inst. embraced 42,000 bales, of which speculators took 6000, and exporters 5000 bales. The leading Cotton houses in Liverpool make no change in their quotations, but the rates have been decidedly easier, and a decline of 1-16d. is generally admitted on all qualities. The stock of all descriptions remaining on hand on the 16th instant, was 600,000 bales.

Flour had been quiet during the week, and prices had declined one penny.

Corn was scarce, but holders did not realize previous rates, and the market closed 1d. lower.

The stock of Beef was light and prices steady. Very little was doing in Pork.

Bacon was dull, and prices had declined one shilling per cwt.

The Coffee market was extremely dull and depressed.

The Europa brings 47 passengers.

NEW YORK, July 30.

The Europa brings the following items of general news:

The Parliamentary elections are closed, and the returns show an overwhelming defeat of the Ministry. Out of 480 members chosen, only one hundred and eighty-seven are in favor of the Ministry.

Serious riots occurred in many places during the elections. At York, at Limerick, at Belfast, and elsewhere in Ireland, the military had to be called out, and many persons were shot.

The resignations of the Ministry have been accepted.

The commercial treaty between Switzerland and the United States is completed.

The Prometheus has arrived from Navy Bay with $1,400,000 in gold dust.

BATON ROUGE, July 30—7 P. M.

The Convention passed the report of committee

The New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Difficulty with England.

The American Fisheries—Department of State.

WASHINGTON, July 6, 1852.

Information of an official character has been received at this Department to the following effect:

The late Ministry of England was opposed to the granting of bounties on principle, and in consequence it steadily refused to give the necessary assent to the acts of the Colonial Legislature granting bounties to the fisheries. The Colonies complained severally of this interference with their local affairs, and they further complain that the Government declined to enforce the provisions of the fishery Convention of 1818, and thereby permitted American fishermen to encroach on the best fishing grounds, from which, under the legal construction of the treaty, they ought to be excluded.

With the recent change of Ministry in England, has occurred an entire change of policy. The present Secretary of State for the Colonies, Sir John Packingham, has addressed a circular letter to the Governors of the several North American Colonies, an extract of which is as follows:

DOWNING STREET, May 26, 1852.—Among the many pressing subjects which have engaged the attention of Her Majesty's Ministers, since their accession of office, few have been more important in their estimation than the questions relating to the protection solicited for the fisheries of the coasts of British North America. Her Majesty's Government have taken into their serious consideration the presentations upon this subject, contained in your dispatches noted in the margin, and have not failed to observe that whilst active measures have been taken by certain colonies for the purpose of encouraging their fisheries, and of repelling the intrusion of foreign vessels, it has been a subject of complaint that impediments should have been offered by the policy of the Imperial Government, to the enactment of bounties, considered by the local legislatures essential for the protection of this trade. Her Majesty's Ministers are desirous of removing all grounds of complaint on the part of the Colonies, in consequence of encouragement of the fishing vessels of the United States upon waters from which they are excluded by the terms of the Convention of 1818, and they therefore intend to dispatch, as soon as possible, a small naval force of steamers, or other small vessels, to enforce the observance of that Convention.

This announcement is accompanied by the following as to bounties:

With regard to the question of promoting the fisheries of the British Colonies by the means of bounties, Her Majesty's Government, though desirous to sanction any unnecessary deviation from the policy which regulates the commerce of this country, are still disinclined to prevent these Colonies by interposition of imperial authority, and especially pending the negotiation with the United States of America for the settlement of the principles of which the commerce of the British North American Colonies is hereafter to be carried on, from adopting the policy which they may deem most conducive to their own prosperity and welfare."

Meantime, and within the last ten days, an American fishing vessel called the Coral, belonging to Machias, Maine, has been seized by the officer commanding her Majesty's cutter Medley, already arrived in that Bay, for an alleged infraction of the Fishing Convention, and the fishing vessel has been carried to the port of St. John, N. B., where proceedings have been taken in the Admiralty Court with a view to her condemnation and absolute forfeiture. Besides the small naval force to be sent out by the Imperial Government, the Colonies are bestirring themselves also for the protection of their fisheries. Canada has fitted out an armed vessel to be stationed in the Gulf, and this vessel has proceeded to the fishing grounds, having on board not only a naval commander and crew, with power to seize vessels within limits, but also a stipendiary magistrate and civil police to make prisoners of all who are found transgressing the laws of Canada, in order to their being committed to jail in that colony for trial. The colony of Newfoundland has fitted out an armed vessel for the purpose of resisting the encroachments of French fishing vessels on the coast of Labrador, but when ready to sail from her port, the Governor of that colony, acting under Imperial instructions, refused to give the commander of the colonial vessel the necessary authority for making prize of French vessels found trespassing. This is an extraordinary circumstance, especially when taken in connection with the fact that the like authority to seize American fishing vessels under similar circumstances has never been refused to the cruisers of any of the North American Colonies. The colony of Nova Scotia has now four armed cruisers well manned on its coasts ready to pounce upon any American vessels who may accidentally or otherwise be found fishing within the limits defined by the Crown officers of England. New Brunswick has agreed with Canada and Nova Scotia to place a cutter in the Bay of Fundy to look after Americans fishing there and at Prince Edward's Island, and her Majesty's steam frigate Devastation has been placed under the instructions of the Governor of that colony.

The first article of the Convention between the United States and Great Britain, of the 20th October, 1818, is in these words: "Whereas, differences have arisen respecting the liberty claimed by the United States for the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, and cure fish on certain coasts, bays, harbors and creeks of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America, it is agreed between the high contracting parties that the inhabitants of the said United States shall have forever, in common with the subjects of His Britannic Majesty the liberty to take fish of every kind on that part of the Southern coast of Newfoundland which extends from Cape Ray to the Rameau Islands on the Western and Northern coasts of said Newfoundland from the said Cape Ray to the Quirpon Islands on the shores of the Magdalen Islands and also on the Southern coasts, bays, harbors and creeks from Mt. Joly on the Southern coast of the Labrador to and through the Straits of Belle Isle and thence northwardly indefinitely along the coast without prejudice however to any of the exclusive rights of the Hudson's Bay Company and that the American fishermen shall also have liberty forever to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors and creeks of the Southern part of the coast of Newfoundland hereabove described, and of the coast of Labrador, but so soon as the same or any portion thereof shall be settled, it shall not be lawful for the said fishermen to dry or cure fish at such portion so settled without previous agreement for such purpose with the inhabitants, proprietors or possessors of the ground.

And the United States hereby renounce for ever any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof to take, dry or cure fish on or within three marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of his Britannic Majesty's dominions in America not included within the above mentioned limits. Provided, however, that the American fishermen shall be permitted to enter such bays or harbors for the purpose of shelter and of repairing damages therein, and purchasing wood and obtaining water, and for no other purpose whatever. But they shall be under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent their taking, drying, or curing fish therein, or in any other manner whatever, abusing the privileges hereby reserved to them." It would appear that by a strict and literal construction of this article, fishing vessels of the United States are precluded from entering into bays and harbors of the British Provinces, except for the purposes of shelter, repairing damages, and obtaining wood and water. A bay, as usually understood, is an arm or recess of the sea entering from the ocean between capes or headlands, and the term is applied usually to small and large tracts of water thus situated. It is common to speak of Hudson Bay or the Bay of Biscay, although they are very large tracts of water. The British authorities insist that England has a right to draw a line from headland to headland, and to capture all American fishermen who may follow their pursuits inside of that line. It was undoubtedly an oversight in the Convention of 1818, to make so large a concession to England, since the United States had usually considered that those vast inlets or recesses of the ocean, ought to be open to American fishermen, as freely as the sea itself, to within three marine miles of the shore. In 1841, the Legislature of Nova Scotia proposed a case for the consideration of the Advocate General and Attorney General of England upon the true construction of this article of the Convention delivered by these officers of the by the terms of the Convention were excluded from any right miles from the coast of that the prescribed distance of three miles is to be measured from the headlands or extreme point of land next the sea of the coast or of the entrance of bays or indents of the coast, and consequently no right exists on the part of American citizens to enter the bays of Nova Scotia, there to take fish, although fishing, being within the bay, may be at a greater distance than three miles from the shore of the bay. As we are of opinion that the term headland is used in the treaty to express the part of the land we have before mentioned, including the interior of the bays and the indents of the coast.

The vessels of war mentioned in the above circular dispatch are expected to be upon the coasts of British North America during the present month (July) when, we doubt, seizures will begin to be made of American fishing vessels, which in the autumn pursue their business intents on the coast, from which it is contended they are excluded by the Convention of 1818.

It is this construction of the intent and meaning of the Convention of 1818 for which the colonies have contended since 1841, and which they have desired should be enforced.

This the English Government has now; it would appear, consented to do, and the immediate effect will be the loss of the valuable fall fishing to American fisheries, a complete interruption of the extensive business of New England, attended by constant collision of the most unpleasant and exciting character, which may end in the destruction of human life, in the involvement of the Government in a question of a very serious nature, threatening the peace of the two countries. Not agreeing that the construction thus put upon the treaty is conformable to the intention of the contracting parties, this information is however made public, to the end that those concerned in the American fisheries may perceive how the case at present stands, and be upon their guard. The whole subject will engage the immediate attention of Government.

DANIEL WEBSTER, Secretary of State.

THE MURDER OF LIEUT. COL. CRAIG.—Further Particulars.—The Washington Union of the 18th inst. contains letters from Major McKinstry and Lieut. Col. Magruder, dated San Diego, Cal., June 19, addressed to Senator Dawson, detailing with minuteness the particulars of the murder of Brevet Lieut. Col. Craig, U. S. Army, of the Boundary Commission, which was briefly noticed in the California news, published in the Sun on Friday, the 10th instant. These letters confirm the facts narrated in the following article:

Col. Craig, accompanied by a Sergeant of the Third Infantry, and by Sergeant Bales, of the First Artillery, who was detailed by Col. Magruder with a party to act under the orders of Col. Craig, as an additional escort to the Boundary Commission from San Diego to Camp Yuma, met on the desert the two deserters, on the 8th of June, at about one-third of the distance across from this side. They were on foot and armed with percussion muskets. The Colonel, taking with him the two Sergeants, pursued them for some miles, calling on them to surrender. At length they halted. Col. Craig took off his sabre, gave it, with his pistol, to Sergeant Bales, and dismounting proceeded unarmed towards the deserters, offering to use his influence in their favor if they would return with him. The other Sergeant, in the meantime, seeing the Colonel's mule stray off, went to catch it—heard a shot—turned, and saw Col. Craig fall, and at another shot saw Sergeant Bales fall. Before he could recover the Colonel's mule, the deserters fired upon him, and he fled to the camp. Col. Craig's body was subsequently recovered and interred at the "Almo Mucho."

Col. Magruder, who was on the spot at the old town of San Diego, when this news came, immediately sent native California scouriers to all the Indian chiefs between San Diego and San Gorgonia—some one hundred and thirty miles—ordering them to turn out their men, and use every effort to apprehend and deliver to him alive, these murderers, offering, at the same time, suitable rewards—the object being to establish a cordon of Indians from San Diego to San Gorgonia, so as to block up all the avenues from the desert to the upper country.

The result was, that the murderers were delivered up to the Colonel, at the mission of San Diego, by Pablito Apis, a chief of Temecula, to whom he had sent orders. They were well secured, being heavily ironed and confined in strong and separate cells. Their names are Faye, a corporal, and Condon, private, of Company D.

The muskets, and a knife belonging to Sergeant Bales, were also delivered up by the chief. It is said that Pablito showed much tact in capturing these men. He first bought their muskets and paid for them, then asked to look at their only revolver, and, having got possession of it, coolly told them they were his prisoners. Upon showing a disposition to resist, fifteen Indians sprang up from "parts unknown," and, drawing their bows, threatened instant death, whereupon they were put in the stocks by Pablito, and delivered up the next day, as above stated.

FARM ORDEON.—Advices from Oregon are to the 5th of June. The people of the Territory were engrossed with local politics, being in the heat of elections of legislative and county officers.

Twenty-two wagons of emigrants, who had wintered at Salt Lake, were almost daily expected in Oregon.

A public meeting was to be held on Sauvie's Island to memorialise Congress on certain alleged encroachments on the part of the Hudson Bay Company.

There was still much excitement in Oregon with respect to the gold mines said to have been discovered in Queen Charlotte's Island, but the farmers, being busy putting in their crops, were properly unwilling to leave their farms for the more uncertain pursuit of gold hunting. The Island is claimed by the Hudson's Bay Company.

FROM JAMAICA.—Late advices from Jamica, state that the Small Pox is prevailing to a fearful extent in nearly all parts of the Island.

Severe drought prevailed in some districts, and the cattle were dying for want of water.

Severe shocks of an earthquake had been felt throughout the Island. The rivers had risen two feet perpendicularly, overflowing their banks. Many buildings had been slightly damaged, but no lives were lost.

Cordova's circular reports the markets dull. There was no Coffee or Pimento in first hands. Beef was wanted at 62s. American Hams abundant at 4½@7d. Southern Flour 31s.

FROM TURKS ISLANDS.—By an arrival at Bermuda we have Turks Islands dates to the 23d ult.

The erection of a light-house on the Bluff was proceeding rapidly.

A ship's bell weighing 367 pounds, dated 1757, and a large copper boiler, had been recently carried to Grand Cay by some wrecking vessel. They had obtained them from the wreck of a very large vessel, evidently a ship-of-war, which they had discovered at Silver Cay Bank, in five fathoms water. The wreck is supposed to be that of H. M. ship Wolf, lost somewhere in that neighborhood in 1762, being one of Admiral Pococke's fleet.

The body of an unknown man was found on the eastern side of the Northern Bluff, Grand Cay, Turks Islands, on the 11th ult. It was supposed to be the remains of a Mr. Hall, the mate of the American brig Primera, who unfortunately fell from that vessel on the 20th of the previous month, when in sight of the Islands.

His Lordship the Bishop of Jamaica had paid a visit to the Island. He landed under a salute of seventeen guns, and was escorted by a "guard of honor" under arms to Government-house. After confirming fifty-two persons and consecrating a burial ground, his Lordship left for Iongus and Jamaica.

RAVENOUS WOLVES.—The Chicago Tribune has the following: It is said that since the tracks of the Railroads around the Lake were laid down, but one single wolf has been seen or heard of south of them, and it is thought that he had never been north since their construction. The farmers of Twenty Mile Prairie, and adjacent country, are no longer troubled about herding their sheep in pens during each night, as they were formerly. The wolf is at all times exceedingly suspicious of traps, and is not disposed to venture near iron or steel, however tempting the bait may be that lies near it; hence their fear of crossing the railroad track to commit depredations on the flocks in the farming country south. At night, too, when they leave their dens, the locomotive fires, and their hideous noise is not calculated to inspire the varmints with any remarkable degree of confidence and security from danger.

FREAKS OF LIGHTNING.—In Mobile, on Monday, the lightning struck a telegraph post on Spring Hill Road, and completely shivered it to atoms. Two small boys, standing on the gallery of an opposite house, were knocked down; also two negroes who were walking along the street at the time. Several members of the family in the house were more or less affected by it. Fortunately none were seriously hurt.

Arrival of the El Dorado.

The steamship El Dorado, Lieut. Mitchell, U. S. N., commanding, arrived on Saturday evening from Aspinwall, bringing dates from San Francisco to the 26th ultimo, one week later than were received by the Illinois at New York. The El Dorado left Aspinwall, with 300 passengers, on the 14th inst., and arrived at Havana on the 20th. She remained but a short time at Havana, having been ordered off by the authorities, in consequence of sickness on board. Capt. Mitchell had made his vessel fast to a buoy in the harbor, and informed the commandant of the port that he was short of water and fuel, but he would not let the ship remain in the harbor, and threatened to cut her adrift if they did not leave immediately; when he was compelled to go over to Key West, where he transferred his passengers and gold to the steamship Empire City, from New York, and took on board the cargo of the Empire City, and left Key West on the morning of the 22d.

The Empire City also left Key West the same day, for New York, with the passengers of the El Dorado.

The El Dorado brings about fifty passengers from the Empire City.

The El Dorado lost fourteen of her passengers and crew during the run from Aspinwall to this port, and nearly all the hands belonging to the ship were prostrated with the Chagres fever. The sailing master, purser, mates, and the greater number of the hands, were unable to leave their berths during the passage hither.

The bark Volunteer was at Navy Bay, with captain, mate, and the whole crew likewise suffering from Chagres fever. The ship Afghan, of NewYork, bark George Henry, and brig Globe, in port at Navy Bay, discharging.

The passengers by the El Dorado report the sickness on the Isthmus to have been very alarming when they left, and non-acclimated persons were dying daily.

The El Dorado brought $25,000 in gold dust to this city, consigned to the following persons: Adams & Co., B. A. Dijon, W. L. Cushing & Co., Louisiana State Bank, and order.

The general news from California is not of much moment. The city of Sonora has been entirely destroyed by fire. The fire broke out about the middle of the day on the 17th ult., and in a few hours the entire city was in ashes. The loss is estimated at $1,000,000. A meeting of the citizens was held next day, and resolutions were adopted, recommending that the city should be built on a better plan, with wider streets, etc.

SAN FRANCISCO.—The Herald states that the great decrease of crime in San Francisco is a subject of general remark. The city is now as quiet as any in the Union.

RELIEF TRAIN.—The relief train, fitted out at the expense of the State, had started for Carson Valley, with instructions to proceed as much farther East as might be necessary to accomplish the objects of its mission. It is for the purpose of relieving the overland emigrants who may fall short of provisions in crossing the plains.

CAPT. FRENCH.—The Alta California learns, by a correspondent from the Southern mines, that the notorious Parker H. French, whose extensive swindling operations in Texas here rendered him so notorious, died a short time since in Durango. There are no particulars given. The report is given on good authority.

ISTHMUS ITEMS.

There is now much news of importance from the Isthmus. Chinese emigration appears to be a topic of considerable interest. The Star has the following item:

CHINESE IN PANAMA.—Quite a little excitement has been created through our streets for the last day or two, by the appearance of a number of freshly imported Chinamen.

We understand Senor Laco is the proprietor of these useful gentry, and that he is disposing of them at very moderate rates to parties desirous of procuring servants.

We recommend those who need such to try and procure one of those stout fellows in time.

It is amusing to see how the hombres about town eye these strangers, as if they were some wild animals. It is to be presumed, however, they will observe them with different feelings before long, when their importation becomes general, and they turn out to be the means of reducing the present exorbitant rates of wages to a moderate sum.

THE FOURTH OF JULY.—The anniversary of our nation's Independence was celebrated with much spirit at Panama. The Governor of the Province and the authorities generally participated in it with much good feeling. The Star, of the 3d instant, in alluding to the matter, says:

A few days ago, D. M. Corwine, Esq., addressed the Governor of this Province, Don Manuel M. Diaz, inviting that officer to attend that procession on the 4th inst. To his credit, be it said, that Senor Diaz responded to the invitation in terms that do honor to his republican spirit, and that should convey to the United States citizens here a feeling of respect for Senor Diaz, as a warm friend of the American nation. After acknowledging the receipt of Mr. Corwine's letter, Governor Diaz goes on to say "as idolators of liberty, and as friends of the great North American people, you may rest assured of the co-operation both of myself and of all the New Granadians in the celebration of the anniversary of your nation's independence."

FROM AUSTRALIA.

Dates from Hobart Town, Sidney, and Melbourne, nearly a month later than previous advices, have been received at San Francisco.

Further gold discoveries have been made in Van Diemen's land, near the eastern coast of the island, at a place on the Eske river called Fingal.

The escort from Mount Alexander brought to Melbourne, on the 10th of March, 12,055 ounces of gold dust; that previous brought down 12,895 ounces. The total weight of gold raised in Victoria up to the 1st of March was 653,276 ounces, making the total value, at three pounds per ounce, the enormous sum of £1,959,810. The South Australian escort, which left Mount Alexander for Adelaide on the 12th of March, took with it about 6000 ounces of gold. Ten thousand pounds worth of gold had been received in one day at the Assay-office, Adelaide, for assay and transformation into ingots.

A single lump of gold had been found in Australia weighing sixty pounds.

The gold mania appears to have disarranged the minds of sailors altogether. Many desertions had taken place, principally from American whalers.

The Legislative Council of Van Dieman's Land, which had been in session some weeks, was prorogued on the 19th of March. Before adjourning, they passed an address to the crown, denouncing, in the most earnest terms, the practice of transporting criminals to the colony, and insisting that it should be stopped. So great was the feeling on this subject, that opposition had arisen to the completion of a number of public improvements, because convicts were employed on them.

So strong was the address to the crown against transportation, which the Council had voted, that the Governor, in prorouguing that body, expressed his deep sorrow at the language in which it was couched, but he should still deem it his duty to forward it to the Home Government. The Anti-Transportation League, consisting of strong delegations from every colony, was to meet in June. Their deliberations were looked for with much interest.

NAVY BAY.—We have been shown a letter, addressed to a commercial firm in this city, under date of Aspinwall, July 10, 1852, from a gentleman holding a responsible station under the U. S. M. Ship Company. He pronounces Navy Bay as even more unhealthy than the coast of Africa, says that no constitution can withstand the climate, and that all the attaches of the company have been sent away more physical wrecks. His own situation, a very desirable one, he is compelled to resign, and to leave for Panama, in consequence of the state of his health. He says of all the company's attaches whom he found on his arrival at Navy Bay, he is the only one left, and the office would have been closed but for a timely arrival. "A through ticket to California" he pronounces "the greatest humbug of the day." Inasmuch as one can go from Panama to San Francisco, in the first cabin, for $25 to $50—opposition being so strong. Persons, he says, have frequently been sent from the Isthmus to NewYork for $15, $20, and $25.

A MISSOURI FARM.—One thousand acres in one field, fenced with posts and rails, a mile and a quarter square, and containing 150 acres of corn, 40 acres of strawberries for the St. Louis market, 30 acres of flowers, 50 acres of peach trees, and 200 acres of other fruits, among which are 2500 pear trees, 200 acres of mowing, and 30 of pasturage. One row of pear trees is three quarters of a mile long, a protecting row of arbor vitæ. All the orchard ground is cultivated in strawberries, melons, or something else. There are 600 sheep and 160 cattle kept on the farm. It is upon the prairie near St. Louis, and has only been about six years in cultivation. It is owned by Ligerson & Brothers, who seem to understand that to make money by farming, money must be invested to begin with.

A HEROIC ACT.—The Boston Herald records an act of darling and heroism performed at the late fire in that city by an ex-fireman, named Thomas Courtney, which should not pass unnoticed. On the roof of one of the first houses burned, a woman was discovered, while the whole interior of the building was in a light blaze. The woman was in the most extreme fear, but was encouraged by the spectators to keep up good courage. In the meantime, as no ladder of sufficient length to reach the eaves could be found, two short ones were procured. One of these was placed against the burning building, and two stout men immediately ascended it, taking up the other ladder which they raised, barely reaching to the desired point. The foot of the second ladder being firmly held in their hands, Mr. Courtney ascended both ladders, and with much difficulty gained the roof. When he reached the woman, she was nearly dead with fright, but he took her in his arms, and safely descended the ladder, placed her on the ground amid the congratulations of his friends, who witnessed the daring act with fearful suspense.

A BEAUTIFUL AND AFFECTING SCENE.—As the steamer Ben Franklin passed the town of Rising Sun, Indiana, on Thursday last, on her way to Louisville, with the sacred remains of Henry Clay on board, thirty-one young ladies, representing the different States of the Union, stood in conspicuous view on the wharf, in front of the crowd of citizens that had assembled. All, save one, were dressed in virgin white, their heads covered with black veils. The one excepted was robed in deep heavy mourning, and represented Kentucky, and occupied the centre of the line. How touchingly beautiful the scene, and what pride—and pride—she must have felt as in that galaxy of beauty she found herself the representative of that State whose broad land from one extreme to the other, was bedewed with tears. The whole scene was rendered more excessively solemn by the deathly silence that universally prevailed on board the steamer and on shore, as the vessel floated noiselessly by, bearing its precious charge onward to its last repose. News from the Plains.

Two expresses arrived in this city to Colonel Wilson, Commander of the Fort, one from Fort Arbuckle, the other Fort Ouachita, on Wednesday evening last, bringing the melancholy and distressing intelligence of the destruction of the expedition to the head-waters of Red River, and murder of Capt. Marcy and the whole of his command, about 80 men.

It appears that a Waco chief came into Fort Arbuckle a few days ago, and stated, that when out on the plains with his band of Indians, about twenty days' travel from Arbuckle, a company of Camanches and Kloways came into his camp, some of them dressed in soldiers' clothes, and others with bayonets fastened to sticks, and other articles he knew belonged to troops, and that they stated to him that us the Camanches were on their way to attack the post on the Brazos, they came across Capt. Marcy's expedition, and when they discovered him, they went into his camp, and he gave them presents, and then left.

At night, the Indians succeeded in getting up a stampede among the horses and mules and run them off, after which, about 6 o'clock, or about daylight, they attacked the command, there being about 2000 Indians, and fought all that day, and the next day they succeeded in killing off the whole company. It is also reported by the same chief that the Camanches intend attacking Fort Arbuckle and the posts on the Brazos. He says that he escaped by giving up all the peltries, etc., that he had, and was glad to get off by that means. The Wacos live in the neighborhood of Fort Arbuckle, and the officers at that post place full confidence in the report.

The expresses sent in from Arbuckle and Ouachita show plainly that an attack is apprehended. Indeed, reports of the gathering of the Camanches in a body, and their determination to attack the whites, has been frequent in this place for the last four or five months, and it accords with the statement made by Colonel Humphries, of Fort Ouachita, who went out some time ago to trade with them, and was robbed by them, his companions murdered, and he barely made his escape; an account of which was published in the Herald two weeks ago.

If this report proves to be true, and there appears to be not much room to doubt it, an Indian war is inevitable. There must be a combination of all the wild tribes that roam over the prairies and through the mountains of New Mexico. The real strength of these Indians is not known, and when combined will present a formidable force that the United States will find very hard to subdue. The prairies west will afford the Indians means of avoiding troops as intricate as the hammocks of Florida. They extend for hundreds of miles, and in many places are nothing but a sandy plain, upon which man nor boast can find subsistence, being generally destitute of water. The Indians are acquainted with the prairies, and know every hiding place and places for retreat, most of them being inaccessible to the whites.

There is but one regiment of troops on the Brazos, and that regiment having only half its complement of men, divided into two posts, some distance apart, and are, therefore, in no situation to meet a large and formidable band of Indians, and are so far from the white settlements as to be able to get no aid from that quarter.

The lives of hundreds of soldiers and citizens are sacrificed upon our frontiers annually, in consequence of the penuriousness of our Government. Instead of sending Capt. Marcy out with sixty or eighty men, he should have had about three hundred, as the importance of the expedition demanded it, the country being unexplored and unknown, and filled with bands of marauding Indians, who make murder and robbery a business.

We regret exceedingly the loss of so many valuable lives, and we are led to mourn over the sad fate of Captain Marcy, an intimate friend, and enterprising, high-minded officer of the army, and Dr. G. G. Shumard, an amiable and respectable physician of our city; also Captain Strain of Ouachita, and Mr. J. R. Suydam of NewYork, who accompanied the expedition for pleasure, besides others of less note, but whose loss to their friends will be nothing the less on that account, and will fill their hearts with sadness and grief.

RELIGIOUS CHARACTER OF MR. CLAY.—Theodore Frelinghuysen, who served with Mr. Clay many years in the Senate, and who was on the same ticket with him in 1844, bears the following testimony to the religious character of his friend and associate. It is from his own private correspondence:

I have thought that a few extracts from a private correspondence, evincing this serious and devout temper, would be grateful to you to hear. They show how universal is the need of a Gospel hope for the noblest and the humblest—that however human distinctions exist, and usefully, yet before God there is but one level; and they show also how far more gloriously true greatness beams upon us from the foot of the Cross, penitentially seeking peace through the blood of Him who once died upon it for our sakes.

In 1836, after the severe domestic affliction in the death of a married daughter, he wrote to a friend:

"I thank you for the deep interest you so kindly take in my spiritual welfare. I should be most happy to have full confidence and assurance on that serious subject. It is one on which, if I had given no evidence to the world of its having engaged my serious thoughts, I have long and constantly reflected with the greatest solicitude, and I indulge the hope that I shall ultimately find peace. My late sad affliction has taught me an awful lesson and impressed me with a solemn conviction of the utter vanity of all earthly things."

Again, in 1844, he writes:

"You have, my dear friend, however, kindly suggested the truest of all consolation; in the resources of our holy religion. I have long been persuaded of that solemn truth; nor have I been entirely neglectful of exertions to secure myself its benefit. I wish I could add that I felt entire confidence that those exertions have been crowned with success. But they shall not be intermitted; and I trust that by diligent searching, I shall find faith in the Lord Jesus, that solace which no earthly honors or possessions can give."

In 1846, he again writes:

"I am greatly obliged, my dear friend, by the kind interest you take in my spiritual welfare. I feel much more comfortable than I once did on that subject. I hope and believe that I have improved in my religious feelings, and in the performance of my religious duties. I attend the Episcopal Church regularly, and with satisfaction, but I have not yet become a member of it. This I hope to do. I must own, however, with regret, that I do not yet feel that absolute confidence in my future salvation which some Christians profess to have in theirs."

Not long after he lost his son, Col. Clay, in one of the Mexican battles with Gen. Taylor. God seems to have blessed this most afflictive bereavement in clearing his way to the truth as it is in Jesus. For, together with the little children of his beloved son, he was baptized, and himself received into the communion of the church.

When, after these events, a friend referred to his having come out on the side of the Saviour, and confessed Him before men, he fervently replied, "Yes, sir, and it has been a source of inexpressible consolation."

And during his late protracted illness, the calm composure of his contemplations, and the peaceful resignation of his mind, in prospect of his approaching dissolution, cheer our hearts with the trust that his Saviour was near with the support of His grace, and ministered unto him with the everlasting consolation of his gospel.

THE QUIZ QUIZZED.—A swell clerk, from the city of NewYork, who was spending an evening in a country tavern, cast about him for some amusement. Feeling secure in the possession of the most money, he made the following offer:

"I will drop money into a hat with any man in the room. The one who holds out the longest shall take the whole and treat the company."

"I'll do it," said an old farmer. The cockney dropped in a quarter—the countryman followed with a "Bungtown" copper.

"Go on," said the cockney.

"I won't," said the farmer; "take the whole and treat the company."

Foreign News by the Humboldt.

ENGLAND.

When the Humboldt sailed the United Kingdom was engaged in the excitement and turmoil of a general election. The polling in most of the cities and towns was to take place either on the 7th or 8th inst., and in the counties some days later. It was thought the election would result in Lord Derby's government not obtaining a working majority.

It was feared the election would not pass off without disturbances, the Stockport riots having fearfully aroused the religious animosities of both Protestants and Catholics in the north.

Large numbers of pikes had been seized by the police of Liverpool on the 3d inst., which it was said were intended for the Orangemen, to be used either for defence or aggression at the coming election.

The Eastern Steam Navigation Company of London have proposed a plan to the share holders for the building of two steamships 700 feet long and of 14,000 tons burthen, each vessel to have two sets of paddle wheels and a screw propeller of an aggregate of three thousand horse power. The vessels to run from Milford Haven to Alexandria, and from Suez to Calcutta. It is expected that they will go at the rate of thirty miles an hour, and cost one million seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

The London Daily News gives a list of seventeen liberals and seven Derbyites returned without opposition to the new Parliament.

The Herald is sanguine that the election will result favorably to the present government.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

The dates from the Cape of Good Hope are to the 29th of May. The news from the frontier is of an uncertain character.

General Cathcart is forming camps all around the frontiers. No casualties of moment had occurred during the preceding month, but the indications of insubordination among the Kaffirs were very provalent.

FRANCE.

The President has caused an official notice to be inserted in the Moniteur, declining any public banquets that may be offered on his approaching tour in the Departments.

Business affairs at Paris were favorable. The change in the weather had produced a good effect.

The Paris papers were full of comments on the plots discovered by the police of Paris.

It appears that notwithstanding the numerous arrests which were made, the affair was at first greatly exagerated, and in place of the parties engaged in having designs against the President's life, it is thought by some that the whole plot was got up by the police in order to justify Louis Napoleon for taking still more vigorous steps against the democracy.

CURIOUS DESCRIPTION.—A gentleman from Paris writes the following:

I saw through one of the windows of the Mayor's office, in the twelfth arrondisement, what seemed to be the body of a negro hanging by the neck. At the first glance, and even at the second, I took it for a human being, whom disappointed love, or perhaps an expeditious judge, had disposed of so suddenly; but I soon ascertained that the ebony gentleman in question was a large doll, as large as life. What to think of this I did not know; so I asked the door keeper the meaning of it.

"This is the Contraband Musoum," was the answer; and on my showing a curiosity to examine it, he was kind enough to act as my cicerone:

In a huge dirty room are scattered over the floor, on the walls, and along the ceiling, all the inventions of roguery which had been confiscated from time to time by those guardians of the law, the revenue officers.

It is a complete arsenal of the weapons of smuggling, all, unfortunately, in complete confusion.

Look before you; there is a hogshead dressed up as a nurse, with a child that holds two quarts and a half. On the other side are logs hollow as the Trojan horse, and filled with armies of cigars. On the door lies a huge bon constrictor, gorged with China silks; and just beyond it a pile of coal curiously perforated with spools of cotton.

The colored gentleman who excited my sympathy at first, met with his fate under the following circumstances: He was built of tin, painted black, and stood like a heyduck or Ethiopean chasseur on the foot board of a carriage, fastened by his foot and hands. He had frequently passed through the gates, and was well known by sight to the soldiers, who noticed that he was always showing his teeth—which they supposed to be the custom of his country.

One day the carriage he belonged to was stopped by a crowd at the gate. There was, as usual, a grand chorus of yells and oaths, the vocal part being performed by the drivers and cartmen, and the instrumental by their whips.

The negro, however, never spoke a single word. His good behaviour delighted the soldiers, who held him up as an example to the crowd.

"Look at the black fellow," they cried; "see how well he behaves! Bravo, nigger, bravo!"

He showed a perfect indifference to their applause.

"My friend," said a clerk at a barrier, jumping upon the foot-board, and slapping our sable friend on the shoulder, "we are really much obliged to you."

Oh, surprise! the shoulder rattled. The officer was bewildered; he sounded the footman all over and found he was made of metal, and as full as skin would hold of the very best contraband liquor, drawn out of his foot.

The juicy mortal was seized at once and carried off in triumph.

The first night the revenue people drank up one of his shoulders, and he was soon bled to death. It is now six years since he lost all the moisture of his system, and was reduced to a dry skeleton.

Mr. J. S. Thrasher was in Charleston on the 21st, and left on the evening of that day in the steamship James Adger for NewYork.

Oh! Who Could Feel Lonely?

BY MISS MARY HARRIS.

Oh! who could feel lonely
In this bright world of ours,
Where Heaven smiles o'er us,
And Earth is strewn with flowers?

There are beauties and truths
Still in Nature's wild look:
In each forest and glade,
In each murmuring brook;

In the birds and their songs,
In the ocean's broad swell,
In the stars up in Heaven,
Holiest Beauty doth dwell.

There's beauty in the sunshine
Which chases the shadow,
That lightly before it
Flits over the meadow.

There is beauty in all things
Which our Father hath given,
Perfect beauty and love.
To lead us to Heaven.

Oh, I feel the warm pressure
Of that Beauty's control,
Like joy stealing sweetly
Over the gloom-stricken soul.

FRANCIS ASBURY.

For forty-five years Asbury was the leader of American Methodism. Every year he made the tour of the American States, traveling never less than five thousand, and often more than six thousand miles a year. He must, therefore, during his residence in America, have traveled at least two hundred and fifty thousand miles, a distance equal to ten times the circumference of the earth. And this immense amount of journeying he performed under the most unfavorable circumstances. There were no railroads, no steamboats, no stage-coaches. There were hardly roads passable for any wheeled vehicle. The only method of getting over the country was equestrian. During the latter part of his life Asbury was able to get along in a gig, but far the greater part of his two hundred and fifty thousand miles was performed on horseback. In this manner he had to climb steep mountains, descend abrupt declivities, wind along sequestered valleys, cross extended plains, ford rivers, and wade swamps.

He usually preached at least once every week-day, and three times every Sunday. He estimates the number of discourses annually at about five hundred. At any rate, the number of discourses he preached during his ministry in America must exceed twenty thousand. He was accustomed also to pray with every family on whom he called in his daily journeyings; and when remaining in one place for a few days, he would pray every time he ate, every time a visitor called on him, and every time he made a call. He would talk personally on religious experience with every member of every family he visited. He attended seven Conferences every year, and an unknown number of quarterly meetings and camp meetings.

In addition to all this he wrote a great deal. His published journals make more than twelve hundred pages. He wrote, as he estimates, nearly one thousand letters a year. He wrote also largely on various matters connected with the affairs of the Church. In the winter of 1790 he says he wrote, while tarrying in Charleston, "more than three hundred pages on subjects interesting to the society and connection."

Much was added to his labor of mind by the duty of stationing the preachers in the several Conferences, Districts and Circuits. There were on the average, during the last ten or twelve years of his superintendence, seven Conferences, between thirty and forty Districts, three hundred Circuits, and five hundred preachers. It was his duty to apportion, every year, all these five hundred preachers among the three hundred circuits. In order to do this judiciously, he had to acquire acquaintance personally with the preachers, and to be informed, either by personal observation or by report, of the circumstances and wants of each circuit. He had not, as have our modern bishops, an informal council of presiding elders to make the appointments for him, requiring only his approval. His only anvil he himself of such facts as the presiding elders or others might be able to give him concerning the men and the place, and then he made the appointments on his own responsibility, according to his own views of right or expediency. Often he was greatly perplexed to find the right man for some particularly important station. Often by locations from ill-health or family embarrassments, the number of available and effective men was reduced greatly below the demands of the work. Often when he had done the very best in his power, the preachers complained of the appointments, or the people of the preachers he had given them. All these things added greatly to his labor, and sorely distressed him.

For all these services he received not one hundred thousand dollars a year, with the Archbishop of Canterbury; nor twenty-five thousand, with the President of the United States; nor nine thousand, with the American minister plenipotentiary to some foreign court; nor one thousand, with the settled clergymen of New England; but only sixty-four dollars. He received in addition to this his traveling expenses; that is, what he actually paid out in cash for ferriage and toll and tavern bills, in going from one Conference to another, was refunded by the Conferences. But with the sixty-four dollars he had to provide himself with horse and traveling equipage, and clothing and books. He received during the latter years of his life some few legacies, amounting to about two thousand dollars, from some of his American friends bequests for his own advantage. In his will he appropriated all he had thus received to the Book Concern of the M. E. Church.

His advantages for early education were very limited; yet he was by no means an unlearned man. We can hardly see how he could find time, or place, or books for study, yet he did become proficient in Latin, Greek and Hebrew. He read the Scriptures in their original tongues, and he was capable of critical exposition of difficult passages. He was acquainted with several branches of polite literature, and always kept fully up with the history of the times. We have alluded to the great number of letters, and the large amount of other matter he wrote. Where are these letters, and where are the papers he left on various "subjects interesting to the society and connection"? Why have they never been collected and published? or, at least, used in producing a biography worthy of the man and of the Methodist Church? Since he died a whole generation has passed from earth, and the name and the fame of Asbury have been suffered to descend rapidly to the oblivion from which recovery may soon be hopeless. It can not be that the hundreds of letters received by Asbury from persons connected with him in church fellowship, the thousands he wrote to his coadjutors and friends, and the papers on "various subjects," of which he often speaks, do not contain facts and suggestions of deep interest in the illustration of his personal character. He is a writer of no inferior order. His journals, it is true, exhibit no peculiar graces of composition; yet even these daily memoranda contain occasionally passages of beauty, which surprise us, when we consider the circumstances under which he wrote—circumstances the most inconvenient possible; in log cabins crowded with talkative women, noisy children and barking dogs; with cold fingers, frozen ink, impracticable pens, and rumpled paper; and suffering from headache, toothache, chills, fever, sore throat, and every other form of ill that "flesh is heir to" in a new and sickly country. The only specimens of his composition I have found exhibiting a fair view of the qualities of his style as a writer, are the obituary notices of the early preachers, inserted in the old Minutes from 1785 to 1808. There is internal evidence that Asbury wrote all, or nearly all, these notices up to 1808.

I can only form some estimate of his preaching talents from the notices of his texts and heads of sermons in his journal. His texts seem always appropriately chosen, and his thoughts presented in a natural order and simple style. He seldom meddled with controversy or metaphysics. He discussed the fundamental doctrines of evangelical religion with clear exposition and forcible logic. He enforced the practicable precepts of Christian duty. He denounced sin sometimes in terrible language, while he invited the sinner to Christ in soft and soothing tones.

His manner, as we should infer from his own notices in his journal, was generally pointed and energetic, sometimes boisterous. His voice was deep and powerful, but he could speak in tones of sweetest melody, melting the hardest heart.

In looking over his journals, we can but admire his happy selection of texts appropriate to the circumstances under which he preached. Finding the people at one appointment divided among themselves, he preached from these words: "This is his commandment, that we should believe on the name of his Son, Jesus Christ, and love one another." To a very stupid people he preached from this passage: "The word preached did not profit them, not being mixed with faith in them that heard it." Arriving at his preaching place one summer day, and beginning the services just as a plentiful shower, after a long season of drought, was pouring down from the clouds, he chose this text: "As the rain cometh down, and the snow from heaven, and returneth not thither, but watereth the earth, and maketh it bring forth and bud, that it may give seed to the sower, and bread to the eater, so shall my word be that goeth out of my mouth; it shall not return to me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I send it." A very small congregation he encouraged from these words: "Fear not, little flock, for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." Coming unexpectedly on the people at New Rochelle, he preached to as many as could be suddenly collected, from these words: "In such an hour as ye think not, the Son of man cometh." A very wordly and avaricious congregation he alarmed from these words: "What shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?" Before a congregation of careless young people he enforced the words of Solomon: "Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth, and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, and walk in the ways of thy heart, and in the sight of thine eyes; but know thou that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment." Having heard a discourse from an Episcopal clergyman against experimental religion, he preached at evening to the same congregation from these words: "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, for they are spiritually discerned." Having heard a Presbyterian minister preach a sermon "too metaphysical and superficial," he preached at evening in the same village from these words: "Ye have need that one teach you again which be the first principles of the oracles of God." To a new congregation, who seemed to be wholly ignorant of Methodism, and to know little of any thing, he preached from these words: "May we know what this new doctrine, whereof thou speakest, is?" To a people whom he had often visited with little success, he applied these words: "I am afraid of you, lest I have bestowed labor on you in vain."

He seemed never to choose a text administing of mere declamation; nor did he take applause by what is usually called a great sermon. His object was not to appear great, but to do good. He seemed to understand correctly the rule of greatness under the Christian dispensation—the rule that determines the degree of greatness by the amount of good accomplished.

For a superintendent his qualifications were of a very superior order. He was thoroughly acquainted with human nature as developed in every-day life. He understood every part of the work committed to his care, and easily acquired, as by intuition, a thorough knowledge of the men associated with him in the ministry. In his integrity, his prudence, his conscientiousness, and his devotion to the interest of the Church, the preachers and the people had the highest confidence.

It would seem providential, that in the infancy of the Church, such a man was spared so long to mature and perfect the system of Church government which the Methodists had adopted. For thirty-two years, a period forming a cycle in human life, he presided unquestioned and unrestrained over the destinies of the Church. He lived to see the system, which had been hastily adopted in 1784, amended, modified, and better adapted than it could reasonably be expected to be on first trial, to the circumstances and wants of the Church. The Discipline adopted at the organization of the Church in 1784 was substantially the same with that of the English Methodists. It had grown up in England under the Wesleyan regime by custom and usage, forming a kind of common law. The original rules of the Wesleyan Conference were few, brief and general. Others were added, one at a time, as circumstances required. The regulations added at the yearly Conferences were published in the Minutes of the Conference. After some time all the regulations, which had been from time to time adopted, were collected and published in a pamphlet called the Larger Minutes. The American Methodists, at the General Conference of 1784, adopted these regulations in all respects, so far as they were applicable to the circumstances of the Church in this country. Often as a new rule was needed, Asbury would propose it in each of the Annual Conferences. If sanctioned by all the Conferences, it became a rule of the Discipline.

In 1787 Bishop Asbury, while confined several weeks by lameness, undertook and completed a thorough revision of the Discipline, arranging its matter under appropriate heads. He did not, however, assume to alter any old or to add any new rule. At the General Conferences of 1792, 1796, 1800 and 1804, many alterations in the constitution of the Church were made, in order to render its influence more efficient for the purposes of its existence—the spreading "of Scriptural holiness over the land." For the greater part, if not all, of these modifications were made by the suggestion and sustained by the influence of Asbury. In 1808 an entire change was made in the constitution of the General Conference. The Conference had been an assembly of all the elders of all the Annual Conferences. From 1808 it became a representative body, with general powers, under certain limitations and restrictions. This was what Asbury had long desired, and he was happy in seeing it accomplished. He lived till he saw the constitution of the Church modified and amended to meet the wants which experience had developed, and till he saw other men rising up capable of leading on the sacramental host to victory and triumph.

Asbury was a man who might have highly enjoyed the exquisite pleasures of home—of home sanctified by the presence of "wife, children and friends;" yet such a home he never had. It has been generally supposed that he was averse to marriage. This opinion derives some plausibility from several of his remarks, occasionally sarcastic, and indicating impatience, in relation to some of the preachers, who committed matrimony, and soon after returned from the itinerant connection; yet the public impression on this matter is incorrect. It is not strange that he should sometimes, in the midst of the perplexity he often suffered from the want of men to supply the stations, inveigh against the matrimonial propensity, which had deprived the Church of the "services of more than two hundred of the best men in America." But he was not constitutionally an incorrigible bachelor. The reasons why he never married are given by himself, and are very honorable to his heart. In 1804, when he was nearly sixty years old, he says, "If I should die in celibacy, which I think quite probable, I give the following reasons for what can scarcely be called my choice. I was called in my fourteenth year. I began my public exercises between sixteen and seventeen. At twenty-one I traveled. At twenty-six I came to America. Thus far I had reason enough for a single life. It had been my intention to return to Europe at thirty years of age, but the war continued, and it was ten years before we had a settled, lasting peace. This was no time to marry or be given in marriage. At thirty-nine I was ordained Superintendent Bishop in America. Among the duties imposed upon me by my office, was that of traveling extensively, and I could hardly expect to find a woman with grace to induce her willingly to live but one week out of fifty-two with her husband. Besides, what right has any man to take advantage of the affections of a woman, make her his wife, and by a voluntary absence subvert the whole order and economy of the marriage state, by separating those whom neither God, nature, nor the requirements of civil society permit long to be put asunder? It is neither just nor generous. I may add to this, that I had little money, and with this little I administered to the necessities of a beloved mother till I was fifty-seven. If I have done wrong, I hope God and the sex will forgive me. It is my duty now to bestow the pittance I may have to spare upon the widows and fatherless girls and poor married

Asbury lived to see vast and wonderful changes in the State and the Church. He had seen the people of the American States increase in number from two millions to eight millions. He had seen them victorious in two wars with England. He had seen them rising rapidly in wealth and power, and he had learned to entertain a magnificent conception of the future extent and power of the republic.

When he landed on the American shores, the number of Methodists did not exceed six hundred, with some six or seven preachers. Before his death the number of members had increased to two hundred thousand, and the number of preachers to seven hundred.

It is, however, doubtful whether he had ever conceived of the degree of greatness and of glory to which his adopted country, and the Church to which he had devoted his life, would arrive in the course of one third of a century after his death; yet to such a mind as his there must often have opened prospects of surpassing beauty, extending through all the future. He must have seen, by faith, the embattled hosts of the Lord, marshaled under the bold and fearless leader who had been raised up by his own ministry, marching forth "conquering and to conquer" over all the mountains and valleys and plains of the American continent. He had been long anxious to see, before his death, the superintendence of the Church committed to some one of American birth—some Elisha, on whom might fall the mantle of Elijah. The Lord granted him the desire of his heart. In McKendree Asbury saw all he could hope, all he could desire. Nor did he overrate the virtues of that excellent man, the noble, the magnanimous, the chivalrous, the devout, the eloquent M'Kendree. And could he have seen the eloquent George, the amiable Roberts, and the learned Emory, to say nothing of the worthy men yet living, occupying, the Episcopal chair, he would have said, like the saint of old, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation." GUILE WITHOUT GUILT.

The following incident is extracted from the "Successful Merchant." It exhibits Mr. Burgett, the hero of the book, in one of the best aspects of his interesting character. He is seen employing zeal, skill and money in the work of human improvement—a fine example for every Christian, especially every man of business.

One Sunday evening he was preaching at a neighboring village. As he came home he saw a number of youths lolling about under the hedges in a lane—wild, rough, ignorant, idle, ill-mannered, with bad looks, bad habits, and every stamp of the accomplished good-for-nothing. His heart yearned for them; he thought how they had been passing that lovely summer Sabbath. He went up to them, and in his own neighborly way began to converse. He told them he was happy, and he should like to see them happy. "You have minds, and I should like to see you improve your minds; you ought to have something to think about, and to employ you usefully." So on he chatted until he had obtained some little hold of their attention. "Now," he said, "if I gave you a good tea, would you like to come and take it?"

"O yes! O yes!" was the cheerful answer.

"Then come up to the vestry of Kingswood chapel to-morrow evening; we are going to have a little meeting, and you shall have a good tea." This was a tea-meeting of the tract distributors. He paid for tickets for his new friends, who did not fail to be there; and after they had done their endeavor upon the eatables, he came up to them and said, "Well, have you had a good tea?"

"Yes, thank 'ee."

"I suppose you know many young men, just of your own kind, who go about the lanes on a Sunday night like you?"

"O 'ees!"

"Do you think if I promised them a good tea they would come?" He was encouraged to hope for their company on such terms; and soon his brother class leaders had a hundred tickets in their hands, to be given to the worst young men in the neighborhood, with the promise of a bountiful treat if they came to the great room on Mr. Budgett's premises, which served for a chapel and all good purposes. The tickets were taken rather shyly, for they knew well enough that Mr. Budgett was not gathering them without some religious end; so they said they did not want to go to Budgett to be hooked in for a prayer meeting, or something of that sort. However, the "good tea" went far. At last a compromise suggested itself to the youths; they would go, take the tea, and then 'bolt' before there was any chance of troubling them about religion. This stratagem, however, was met by a stratagem on the other side. The room was crowded; above a hundred came, and such a set of guests has seldom met under a decent roof—all shades of vice and recklessness were gathered there to feast and run away from good advice. It was plain that the ringleaders were in one corner, for thence proceeded all manner of odd and boisterous requests. To this point one of "the young gentlemen" betook himself, sat down beside the chief, made one of the party, and talked as familiarly as if he were quite on their side. The hero he selected had traveled and sailed as a stoker, and therefore was a notability among his associates. Neither the hospitality nor the cordial feeling had any effect upon his coarse and headstrong badness. He tried in all ways to disconcert his unexpected Comrade, and would not by any means tell him his name. After vain attempts to tame him into sensible conversation, his young host said, "I hope we shall spend a pleasant evening—what do you think we ought to do by way of enjoying ourselves?"

"You had better get up and make us a bit of a diversion."

but before they had got out of the way, Mr. Budgett ran up into the desk, and said: "I have asked you to come here for the purpose of doing something for you—something that will be of use to you. Now, just as a start, I will give you, among you, fifty pounds, and you must make up your minds what you will do with it."

The wild rogues were thunderstruck; they meant to run away from the prayer meeting, but it was quite another thing to run away from fifty pounds. Hats that had been taken up were replaced, and feet already at the door turned back. No sooner had the offer been made, than one of Mr. Budgett's sons, making himself as one of the party, said: "Fifty pounds! that's something; why, there are a hundred of us, and suppose we divide it amongst us, there will be half a sovereign apiece." This proposition would probably have been very acceptable to the company, but another, who was in the secret, at once rose and objected, saying he thought it would be very foolish to throw away such a sum as fifty pounds in that way; they had better put it to some use that would do them good for a long time to come. This was adroitly urged, until all seemed to come into that idea; then came a proposition to found a society for study and mental improvement, to be called the "Kingswood Young Men's Association." After due discussion, this was carried by vote, and Mr. Budgett was appointed treasurer. The youths had been insensibly led by the tact wherewith the affair was managed to take an interest in it; and when the final arrangements were placed in the hands of a committee, several of them, to their great exaltation, were placed upon the committee with the friends who had so cleverly conducted the first meeting. It was arranged that the weekly rendezvous should be the vestry of the chapel on Sunday evenings after the service. This seemed to the young men a very natural gathering place; but it was just the point which secured Mr. Budgett's object of withdrawing them from their demoralizing rambles on Sunday evening, and getting them to the house of God.

So far the success had been perfect: but now it remained to be seen how many would meet at the chapel. About sixty came; these were regularly met on Sunday night, after the public service, for religious instruction, and in the week for secular instruction. A good library was bought with the original donation, occasional lectures on scientific subjects were delivered by some of the masters of Kingswood school, and year by year a tea-meeting was given, at which rewards of very substantial books were distributed.

LUKEWARMNESS.

What are the evidences of lukewarmness?

1. When God has become less an object of desire. The soul does not go out after him in intense longings as it once did. "As the heart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after Thee, O God. My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God."

2. When God has become less an object of devout contemplation. "I remember Thee upon my bed, and meditate on Thee in the night watches." Once this was your language; how is it now?

3. When there is less delight in God. "Whom have I in heaven but Thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire besides Thee." "We will be glad and rejoice in Thee; we will remember Thy love more than wine." What is your daily experience?

4. When there is less inclination for communion with God. "Truly our fellowship is with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ." Is the closet less frequented? or is prayer engaged in more as a privilege than a duty? How is it?

5. When there are hard thoughts of God under the dispensations of His Providence; when the soul is restless and disturbed under them, and turns from one thing to another for relief, without quietly casting itself upon God, and waiting his time. When under trials and injuries, second causes are too much regarded, and the soul is disposed to consider the instrument, rather than the hand that wields it.

6. When there is a less tender conscience, less sense of God's presence, less circumspection and carefulness in the daily life; when greater latitude is taken, and there is less tender anxiety against displeasing God, and less holy, humble reverential fear of God.

7. When Christ seems less glorious in his person, and less precious in his work.

8. When there is a decay of love to Christians. "Every one that loveth him that begat, loveth him also that is begotten of him." "If any man love not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?"

9. When there is a decline in interest, and a slacking of effort to promote the cause of Christ. "He that is born of God, is created anew in Christ Jesus unto good works," Hereunto was he called. Do you attend the prayer meeting less frequently? Do you pray less for others? Do you make less effort to persuade men to attend upon the means of grace? Do you do less personally to interest others in religion? Does your piety flow only in one particular channel, and do you count zeal for party to be zeal for Christ? Can you read the news of the day with more interest than you can an account of the progress of Christ's kingdom in the world? How do you feel for sinners? As the Psalmist felt? "Rivers of water run down mine eyes, because they keep not thy law." As Paul? Who had great heaviness and continual sorrow in his heart for his brethren, his kinsmen according to the flesh.

I might enlarge, but enough has been said. Now what is the verdict? Cold? or Hot? or Lukewarm? [Alton Presb. Reporter.

Party Spirit and Whisky Drinking.

F. S. Key, the author of the "Star Spangled Banner" [illegible]

one of his letters to this eccentric and eloquent man, he deplored the influence of party spirit upon public interests, and urged the importance of "putting down party spirit." Quoting his language, Randolph replies:

"'Put down party spirit!' Put a little fresh salt on the sparrow's tail and you will infallibly catch him. You will put down party spirit when you put down whisky drinking, and that will be when the Greek calends come."

John Randolph wrote this before temperance societies were in vogue; but he had seen enough of the influence of whisky drinking upon political interests to enable him to speak the truth upon this subject, at least so far as the effects of whisky on party spirit are concerned. Who does not know what an immense control whisky and rum drinking exerts over the preparations for popular elections? Banish its use from the country, and more than half the evils of political life will be at once abated. [Meth. Prot.

ROMISH SECRETS OUT.

We do not rejoice in iniquity. It is indeed a painful duty to give enlarged publicity to such developments of iniquity as follow. But nevertheless it is duty. We have Romanism among us—with its beasting pretensions—attempting to plant its nunneries and kindred hiding places for sin in our land.

Mr. Connelly has figured somewhat in Mississippi and Louisiana, and has been brought before our readers on a former occasion. We take these DEVELOPMENTS of his from the New York Observer.

Pierce Connelly was an Episcopal priest in Tennessee. He went to Rome by the way of Puseyism, and his wife went with him. He was willing to be a Popish priest, but he had a wife. She went into a nunnery, he took orders in the Church of Rome. One day he caught a brother priest, while making demonstrations towards his wife in the convent, more free than, in his view, were consistent with the moral law, and the vows of the priesthood. He saw a good many other things in "Holy Mother" that startled him, and finally, when his eyes were wide open he saw so many things, that like a prudent man he quit the great charnel house, and wrote a letter to his Popish patron in which, among other things too hard to repeat, he says:

"I have seen priests and bishops of the Church of Rome, their own convictions disregarded, and all responsibility to God and to society thrown off in the instinct of hostility to man's natural relationships, (in spite, too, in one instance, of the private commands of the Pope himself,) I have seen them band together, for the mere sake of a legacy or a life interest, to break down laws which are looked upon, even by savages, as the most sacred of all, divine or human. I have known a husband taught and directed to deal double in the sacred matter of religion with his own high-born sister's wife, a brother with his own high-born sisters, wives with their husbands, and daughters without number with their trusting parents. I have known in Derbyshire, a young lady not eighteen years of age, the daughter of a widowed mother, the mother also a Roman Catholic, seduced into a convent under false pretences, kept there in spite of every effort of her family, with the approbation of the Papal authorities, and only delivered by my own public threat, as a priest, of application to the civil power and consequent fear of scandal. I have seen clerical inviolability made to mean nothing less than license and impunity. I have read to the pure and simple-minded Cardinal-Prefect of the Propaganda a narrative, written to a pious lay-friend by a respected Roman priest, of such enormities of lust in his fellow priests around him, that the reading of them took away my breath—to be answered 'Care mio, I know it, I know it all, and more, and worse than all; but nothing can be done.' I have known a priest (here in England) practice Liguori on his clientele simply as an amateur of wickedness, apparently without conscious malice, just as he would try poison upon dogs or cats; an Iago, without even an imaginary wrong from any body. I have known this creature get up, and very successfully, a miracle, (I have proofs in his own handwriting) at the very moment when, as a brother priest satisfied me, he was experimenting in seduction. But nothing could be done! I have known a priest received and honored at a prince-bishop's table, when the host knew him to have just seduced a member of his own family. But nothing could be done! I have been mocked with false promises by dean and bishop in denouncing a young priest in whose bed-room—and before there had been time for him to dress himself—in broad day, in England, under a convent roof, I had myself found a young man, apparently as much at home as her confessor was himself. I have been forced to let pass, without even ecclesiastical rebuke, a priest's attempt upon the chastity of my own wife, the mother of my children, and to find instead, only sure means taken to prevent the communication to me of any similar attempt in future.

"This is a part of what has come within my own experience. But it is not yet the worst of that sad experience.

"I have seen priests of mean abilities, of coarse natures, and gross breeding, practice upon pure and highly gifted women of the upper ranks, married and unmarried, the teachings of their treacherous and impure casuistry, with a success that seemed more than human. I have seen these priests impose their pretendedly divine authority, and support it by mock miracles, for ends that were simply devilish. I have had poured into my ears what one never be uttered, and what ought not to be believed, but was only too plainly true. And I have seen that all that is most deplorable is not an accident, but a result, and an inevitable result, and a consequence, from the whole system of Romanism with all its stupendous machinery of mischief. And the system is irrevocable and irremediable."

Herman Hooker, of Philadelphia, has published the letter in a pamphlet, and those who would know the mystery of iniquity that abounds in the priesthood of Rome, will find a revelation here that may well stagger belief. How long shall this system of horrible wickedness remain?

Importance of Doctrinal Preaching.

It was the constant practice of the apostles, and the best divines in all ages of the Church, to present with unwearied diligence the doctrines of the Gospel. And Paul's charges are most explicit and earnest to this effect. To Timothy he says: "I charge thee, before God and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and his kingdom; preach the word; be instant in season, out of season; reprove, rebuke, exhort with all long suffering and doctrine. For the time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine." And this prediction is too true of us. There is a growing disposition in the Church to undervalue and neglect sound, plain, practical, unvarnished explanation and enforcement of Bible truth.

And this disposition is in a great manner owing to this neglect, which is a sufficient cause of itself; (for the two things act reciprocally upon and tend to produce one another.) And is partly attributable to, if possible, a still more ruinous inclination yet. That which manifests itself in attempts to conform to a public sentiment produced by such as profess to have no special regard for, or experimental knowledge of, religion at all.

And we may rest assured that if we modify our religion to suit the popular ear and taste, we will rob it of its power, and have no more than they. For one of the best tests of true piety and good preaching is, that in proportion as men are wicked and unconcerned, they do not like it. Because the carnal mind is enmity against God. And just as we conform our lives and preaching to the holy Gospel of God, will they hate us, because they hate God. Consequently their notions and sentiments concerning religious instruction are to be no rule for us.

Proper knowledge is the only true foundation for correct sentiment; and correct sentiments or belief, the only proper and reliable basis and motive to right action. So we must know right before we can believe right; and we must believe right before we can do right. And if we suffer ourselves to forget, and our children to grow up ignorant of the great truths of the Christian religion, we will be ever liable to be taken by storm, by every little wind of doctrine that passes by, and ever to be betrayed into wrong conduct, for want of right knowledge.

This continued stream of doctrinal preaching and teaching, is like the great river which flowed quietly, yet mightily, through that ancient city, whose high battlements and frowning towers rendered her impervious to any foe. And no doubt this great river, which would have supplied the city with water in a siege of ages, to many of the thoughtless and stupid and selfish, was considered a trouble: to others, useless; and to more, a nuisance; but when its waters were turned aside from the city, it was done by the greatest enemy of her peace—and the channel of the Euphrates had not become dry before it was thronged with a terrible army of invaders, who recklessly murdered her citizens and king, and laid Babylon in ruins forever.

And so this majestic stream of doctrine, which for ages has supplied the Church with the water of life, may seem unsightly to some and troublesome to others; but it is to the Church both her support and defence; and whenever its channel is empty, it will not be less prophetic and alarming than the mysterious hand that wrote the alarming doom of ancient Babylon. WHO SHALL BE GREATEST?

It is recorded that in the time of our Saviour, when the disciples journeyed to Capernaum, they disputed among themselves which should be greatest; but although they received a prompt reproof, their example is not without imitators at the present day. In every sphere in life may be found the same unhallowed ambition; the same strife "who shall be greatest." Whatever may be the standard of this coveted greatness, the candidates for it are apt to indulge in envy of those above, and contempt for those below themselves in the upward struggle. The object may be wealth, or it may be simply the honor of occupying a certain position in society, and being numbered with the select, aristocratic and exclusive class; yet in either case, to how many ungenerous and unworthy feelings does it lead! In order to be enrolled with the "favored few," it may be necessary to break loose from old associations, and discard all connection with those beyond the "charmed circle." Then the claims of old friendship, of long years of intimacy, and even the ties of relationship are disregarded and forgotten, because, perchance, there is danger of losing "caste." worldly honor and greatness has crept into the Church; otherwise, why are the rich and exalted caressed and courted, while the poor but devoted disciple is overlooked and unrecognised. While visits of ceremony and flattering attentions are paid to the gay and fashionable, there is no time to visit the poor and humble; no sympathy to spare for the "fatherless and widows in their affliction." Can the Church reasonably hope to prosper and grow in grace, while there is such a lack of Christian unity and fellowship; while its members scarcely know each other by name, unless they are seen in "goodly apparel," occupying a high seat in the synagogue? Alas, this ought not to be so, especially in the country, where it is so easy for all the members of the church to be acquainted. It should be felt that there is a bond of union between all those who have named the name of Christ: and a common hope should lead them to feel a personal and kindly interest in each other's welfare, that the common aim may be, not "which shall be greatest," but which shall be most earnest and useful in advancing the Redeemer's kingdom. NEW ORLEANS:

Saturday Morning, August 7.

HOW THEY RECEIVED HIM.

In this city there is an honest mulatto man we wot of named Jack. He lived very quietly and as happily as falls to lot of most mortals, for about two score years, in the state of Onesimus. Jack is a preacher of moderate abilities among his colored brethren. In the last year or two he was seized with the progressive spirit of the age, and bought himself at a nominal price.

Not experiencing a rise at home corresponding to his new relations, Jack concluded last spring to take a trip to the "Nor'ard." And to the North he went. He had never seen any of his friends there, but had heard a great deal of their love and sympathy for the black man and the freed man, and he looked for a reception very cordial—almost amounting to an ovation.

Jack has returned quite chap-fallen. His account of his trip to "Nor'ard" is doleful. Those from whom he expected greetings and hospitalities, and a great shaking of hands, "didn't come a-nigh." He couldn't find the folks that had done all that beautiful talking. He did edge his way into one or two pulpits. "But then," says he, "they wouldn't allow me to take up a collection." As for caste and cold shoulders and all that, Jack found it to increase pretty much in proportion with the ascent of latitude. We give, in his own words, the whole history of his reception by his Northern friends: "They charged me like a white man, and treated me like a nigger, and that way o'doing aint fair."

NEW CONSTITUTION.—Next week will be published, for the benefit of our readers in Louisiana, a full copy of this instrument. They will have it before them long enough to consider its merits and make up their minds for voting. The Convention adjourned 31st July.

THE NATIONAL MONUMENT.—We are pleased to see the scheme of a monument to the signers of the Declaration of Independence occupying public attention in a manner promising its early commencement. The honor of having suggested this just tribute to true and great men, is by general consent given to Hon. J. M. Elam, of Baton Rouge, La.

UNHAPPY UNION.—In an editorial correspondence, the union between the New School Presbyterians and Congregationalists, was remarked upon. It was on the occasion of attending the General Assembly of the latter at Washington City. They do not get on so well together, as it would seem from this language held by the Puritan Recorder, a Congregationalist organ:

"The Old School Presbyterian Church and the Congregationalists, like Abraham and Lot, have wisely separated, and are keeping their flocks, each in their own pastures, and there is now no strife between the herdmen. But the New School are still pasturing their cattle with ours. And from the time this union of flocks commenced, there has been more or less contention; and that contention begins to be found like the letting out of water. It should have been let alone before it was meddled with. The only way now to stop this strife, is that recommended by Abraham to his nephew. 'Let us separate.'"

There will be service in the McGhee Church to-morrow, as usual, by the pastor.

LOSS OF THE ALABAMA.—A letter from Mr. F. M. Fisk, the owner of the steamship Alabama, has been received in this city. It will be remembered that the Alabama left this on the 6th inst. for New York. On the 12th, one day out from Key West, about eight o'clock in the evening, she struck a rock on Gun Key, and all efforts to get her off proved unavailing. About midnight on the night she struck, she took fire, and it was with great difficulty that the flames could be extinguished. For days elapsed before any assistance could be obtained, but the staunch old hull stood the banging on the rocks for four days before the sprung a leak. The crew refused to work, although offered one dollar an hour. Mr. Fisk states that if the water had done their duty, much of the cargo might have been saved. The ship was twenty miles from land, and the captain (Wells) had to send that distance in small boats for help, which he finally obtained, but only sufficient to load the passengers and crew. From Mr. Fisk's letter, it appears that he attributes the loss of the ship to negligence. She was going at the rate of ten knots when she struck, and the weather was clear. She went on at high water and on being lightened was driven still further on, and was lying in from eight to ten feet water. The passengers were taken to Kansas, N. P., from which place Mr. Fisk wrote. He remained there in the hope of saving something from the wreck. Neither vessel nor cargo were insured.

DUELING EXTRAORDINARY.—At Philadelphia, on the evening of the 25th ult., two young men of Maryland named William Gallagher and Anthony McGill, drank more than a pint of liquor each, on a wager. Gallagher won the race, having drunk the effects.

CENTENARY COLLEGE, LA.

MR. EDITOR: On Tuesday morning, 27th July, the Franklin Institute, one of the College Societies, held its anniversary. It consisted of six addresses ordinarily original, and ordinarily creditable to the speakers of the College, accompanied with music by the College orchestra. After which, the two literary societies were addressed by his Excellency the Governor of Mississippi, Hon. H. S. Foote. His theme was the incentives which the institutions of our country present to Education. His argument was drawn mainly from the unrestrained liberty of speech and thought which they afford, and from their stability, as seen especially in contrast with the civil institutions of other countries. His descriptions of Austrian and French policy were peculiarly happy. His first sentence struck me very forcibly, as coming from one who had spent a large part of the last two years amid the heats of party contention and the many and fearful difficulties of the Compromise Congress; that he felt unaffected pleasure in addressing an audience whose minds were free, in regard to himself, from illiberal prejudice of every kind. In the course of the address he made a happy allusion to the departed great Kentuckian, hushing the contentions of party, in the lines of Virgil:

"Tum, pietate gravem ac meritis si forte virum quem
Conspexere, silent, arrectisque auribus astant;
Ille regit dictis animos, et pectora mulcet."

I had the good fortune to be quartered with his Excellency, in the family of President Rivers, and do not know when I have met a more affable and interesting gentleman. It was not easy to realize that the personage so ready to talk and talking with the students, and all who were about him, but a little while since occupied a large place in the nation's councils and the people's eye, and could say of the greatest legislative measure in the history of the Union,

"Quorum magna pars fui."

The friends of the College were greatly delighted to see upon the platform the Governor of Louisiana, the Hon. Jos. Walker, and the Governor of Mississippi, sitting on each side of Dr. Winans, the President of the Joint Board—a noble trio. I do not wonder that the students occasionally forgot their speech, in such august presence.

On Tuesday night the Union Society held its anniversary. The speeches were more original and striking in thought than those of the morning. I was quite carried away by two of them—a "Tribute to Henry Clay," and "The Return of the Golden Age." The first contained some most touching and fresh passages upon a difficult, because an almost exhausted theme. I have from the President the promise of this eulogy for the Advocate. The second was equally striking. I can give one or two sentences of this speech; it evidently cost the speaker much labor, but for all which he must have felt himself amply repaid in the repeated and interrupting applause of the audience. He contrasted the ruin of the glorious empire of the past, with the vitality of the present and the probable achievements of the future: "Even the unrivalled Parthenon, glowing in polished marble, which cast for more than a thousand years its classic splendors from the summit of the citadel of Athens across the plain below, and far up and down the coast and headlands of the Adriatic, now lies crumbling into dust." Of that brighter and happier day springing from the present of liberty and science, he said: "Then will Reason trim her lamp, and dissipating those profound mysteries which now hang their solemn folds about the human intellect, will move forward the boundaries of thought to the very verge of infinity." * * * "The sublime astronomer will learn to leave the narrow bounds of the solar system, and veer his course down those shoreless rivers of light that gently wind their way across the placid bosom of immensity; visiting those far-off ports where brighter stars spangle the mantle of night, and more effulgent suns wake up the blushes of the morning; soaring from system to system of marshalling worlds, and by a slight sally of fancy gaze on those still more remote, which in whirling with their circumvolving retinue around the grand centre of the universe, the Throne Eternal, trace the periphery of Creation; beyond which lies the mighty void wherein power creative never yet has energized; where existence still reposes in the wild abyss of possibility."

THE COMMENCEMENT EXERCISES began on Wednesday, July 28, at 9 o'clock A. M., and were continued until after 1. The number of visitors this year was unusually large. The seats, aisles, windows and porch of the chapel were crowded. On the platform sat the Faculty, Trustees, Examining Committee, Ministers, and his Excellency the Governor of the State. It was easy to see that the audience felt the occasion to be far more momentous than that of the previous day. I know no more sober reality than a College Commencement. The amount of its fact overrules curiosity and idle admiration. Mothers and sisters scarcely able to support the fear of their hearts—fathers trying to be prepared for the worst—the Faculty, now on "a barrel of gunpowder," then proud and thankful as they hear a man, and remember that he was once feeble in his steps, that by little and little they have brought him to firmly developed thought, and commanding sentiment; the graduate, too, nerved to contend against all weakness, and to insist upon his own success, "this one time."

The solemn charm of the occasion was not even broken by the "music." Usually at Commencements the first note of the scraping bow quite dissipates the moral and the intellectual. Four or five red faces and greasy fiddles—looking like a tattered remnant of the Old Guard—have, time out of mind, constituted the sance of these literary feasts. On this occasion the exercises were relieved alternately by a choir of ladies and students, an orchestra, and a brass band, both composed exclusively of College students, under the conduct of Mr. A. E. Blackmar. The orchestra consisted of nine violins, four flutes, and a clarionet; the brass band of twelve horns, a piccolo and drum. I noticed that several of the graduating class were performers. The music was of admirable time and expression, though the students have been practicing only since February last. Two years ago the Trustees voted that such a band should, if possible, be formed, and money appropriated to purchase instruments. This year they have constituted a choir of vocal and instrumental music, and have elected Mr. A. E. Blackmar Professor. Accordingly, the rates of charge for instruction in that department will appear in the catalogue of the College. Prof. B. is a native of the State of New York, a gentleman of high moral worth, and a musician of universal genius.

Immediately after prayer by the Rev. J. C. Doremus, the choir sung the 24th Psalm—"The earth is the Lord's, and the fullness thereof," etc.

The Latin Salutatory (second honor) was then pronounced by Mr. W. L. Nugent, St. Landry, La.: its delivery was thoughtful, and remarkable for ease and correctness of pronunciation.

The second speech was by Mr. Marcus T. Carter, Minden, La.—"No Eloquence without Virtue"—a practical treatment of the subject—much earnestness of thought—clear conception—unaffected and plain language. He threw himself into his speech—evidently could not speak on any theme without first believing it. How important that such should always think right! The sentiment of Mr. Clay was introduced with power, "I had rather be right than be President."

A. C. Huff, Wilkinson county, Miss., "Mutability"—very smoothly done.

D. C. Montgomery, Washington county, Miss.—"Triumphs of Mind." Mr. M. was the youngest of the class—his speech was long, and was spoken with great readiness—the theme was so boundless, that the most of persons, in discussing it, would have been betrayed into great length; its thought was clear, and expressed.

T. J. Lane, New Orleans, La.—"Genius and Piety of Bunyan"—an unusual subject, and handled with success—style, plain and strong.

W. E. Montgomery, Washington county, Miss., (third honor)—Philosophical oration, "Physical Science,"—an earnest speaker—bold style—thought vigorous. I noticed that the audience listened to it with unusual attention.

W. L. Nugent—"The Bible—the Foundation of Government"—original in treatment, clear and harmonious in expression, sublime and beautiful in sentiment, graceful and appropriate in its delivery. It was to me the best performance of the Commencement: not so striking as that of the next speaker, but more impressive, more uncommon, and indicated genius of fine order.

Mr. Charles Spencer, Catahoula, La., (first honor)—"The Southern Graduate," "with Valedictory Addresses." Mr. S. had excellent manner and good command of voice. His theme was, the true State's Right doctrine—educating Southern youth in Southern Schools. He was remarkably self-possessed, warm and energetic in his delivery. The discussion of his subject indicated a high order of talent. His audience were controlled and moved by his thought and manner. The Valedictory was wanting in pathos. Surely it is an occasion that never grows ordinary. One is half ready to cry at the very sight of young friends parting, and next to the minister who was the means of my conversion, is the man who has kindly and patiently taught me. Still, I saw the ladies, many of them, and some of the men, with tearful eyes.

The best of all is, that four of the class are consistent Christians, and that three of that number professed religion since entering College. All the time while among these interesting youths, I was thinking which ones would be likely to make preachers of the Gospel. I could not but covet them for our own Methodist Church, and my own Louisiana Conference—few even of our best desires are pure from the alloy of self. The Lord call these noble young men to the noble calling of a minister in the Church of God!

The President next delivered the BACCALAUREATE ANNAESS. The subject of it was, the true aim of life and life's labor. He concluded by presenting each of the class with a personal momento—a Bible. President R. is one of the heartiest speakers I ever heard—an exemplification that "out of the fullness of the heart the mouth speaketh." If you can imagine his heart at such a moment, you have his speech.

The music immediately succeeding the address was a "Valedictory Anthem," composed by Mr. W. L. Nugent, and sung by the choir.

The degree of Bachelor of Arts was then conferred upon all the seniors, excepting Mr. Carter, who had not studied the Greek course. He received the degree of Bachelor of Science.

The degree of A. M. was conferred upon—

W. H. Scales,	J. A. Nettles,
A. J. Norwood,	D. B. Ross, honorary,
R. J. Baughman,	Hon. C. A. Gayarre, "
N. J. Pulmer,	Daniel Williams.

Mr. Gayarro gave an excellent response to his degree, which was honorary. He was sprightly, learned and pathetic, and without fault, saving too great length—an impromptu of one hour!

The degree of LL. D. upon his Excellency Governor H. S. Foote, and Prof. H. Tuttwiler.

And now, most extraordinary and mournful of all—tell it not in Gath—nobody was made D. D.—nobody honored, nobody encouraged—every body left to their fate—"Brother" so and so, and "Parson" so and so—it's very tiresome. As you are more popular up this way than the most of us, do make haste and be somebody, that the rest may have hope. Two or three matters yet remain to be noticed, and I am done. The address before the Alumni, on Tuesday, was by Mr. R. J. Bowman. The merits of the address were greatly marred by his half reading and half speaking it—"Truth, the only proper object of mental search"—or to that effect. It was in some parts excellent, but in the main too abstract to interest an ordinary audience.

On Sabbath, Dr. Light preached the Commencement Sermon, 1 John, 5:20, "And we know that the Son of God is come," etc.

The Doctor is a venerable, old time, Methodist pioneer preacher. He is in remarkable vigor of body and mind, and is stored with incident of the olden time. His voice is strong, and has no doubt often sent the truth to the sinner's conscience, with the execution of chain shot. He preached "with a rest," i. e., notes in full. For my part, more than once, while he was preaching, I wished the "thumb papers" in Guinea, and I have no doubt he did too. The sermon, as a whole, was equal to the reputation of the venerable Doctor.

I was constantly wishing that my friends of the city could have been present at this creditable, very creditable College Commencement—and why are they not, at least occasionally? The Professors and President and students deserved, and had great praise, I am sure, from all who were so fortunate as to witness its inspiring and improving exercises; for my part, I felt proud of the Centenary College of Louisiana.

The report of the Examining Committee spake well of the progress and scholarship of the students. It will probably be sent to you for publication. The conditions and prospect of the College, as it presented itself to the Board of Trustees, was never better: out of debt, except $1500 still due on the burnt building, and with increasing patronage. May it long send forth, upon all the land, its healthful, nutritious streams! K.

METHODIST PRESS.

NEW TREATISE ON BAPTISM.—The book agent J. Early, has just published a work by Dr. Summers, discussing the nature, the perpetuity, the subjects, the mode and use of Christian Baptism. The Appendix answers Dr. Howell's Evils of Infant Baptism, and exhibits the classical and scriptural use of baptismal terms. We doubt not it is a thorough and right-spirited production. Our Charleston contemporary speaks in terms of highest eulogy in announcing it as—

"A work which will take high rank in the polemical literature of the church, and leave nothing to be desiderated in the way of exposition or defence of views maintained by the large majority of professing Christians in the world."

PROGRESS OF ERROR.—The editor of Zion's Herald, discussing the importance of Home Missions in the church, an active, quick-sighted domestic evangelization of the masses that are pouring in upon the country from abroad with their German idealism and Irish superstition, and French infidelity, thus discourseth:

"Aggression on surrounding sin is the price at which the church must purchase her existence. For evil is active, error is potential. It will destroy good if not destroyed by it. It is like those insignificant mosses which grow on the bald brow of the mountain. There they insert their fibres into the tiniest crannies until they form a channel for the moisture which they attract. The process goes on unperceived for ages until, sinking into those crevices, the water is acted upon by the contracting and expanding forces of the winter frost until the mountain itself is divided an tumbled in huge masses among the debris of the valley. Such is error. Such are its effects on Christian institutions if allowed to flourish unwatched and unassailed."

LADIES AND CHILDREN.—The Observer, let ult., contains an interesting letter from its China correspondent. It speaks of still promising prospects for the golden land:

"San Francisco will soon be, not only one of the largest and richest, but most beautiful of American cities. The tide of immigration is almost overwhelming; and the best of all is, that the very ingredients of civilization and religion (ladies and children) constitute a good portion of arrivals."

SCHOOLS AND KENTUCKY CONFERENCE.—The Nashville and Louisville Advocate presents an encouraging list of reports from Conference Schools. One of the editors having been complained to by a correspondent for having noticed the Northern Kentucky Conference with such severe ridicule as might prove a spur to the new movement, thus vindicates his propriety"

"With regard to the enterprise, every sober minded person who understands the true nature of the case, must look upon the movement of our Northern friends, to form a Kentucky Conference, as supremely ridiculous—as unworthy of a grave notice, and so we have treated it. And, notwithstanding our brother's fears on the subject, we regard it still as the veriest burlesque ever enacted by a sober and discreet ecclesiastical council."

LITERARY NOTICES.

THE SUCCESSFUL MERCHANT; by William Arthur. Carlton & Phillips, N. Y. 1852.

This little volume, an American republication, has been for some months before the public, and met with a deservedly hearty reception. The author is an eminent Wesleyan minister. His book is a commercial epic. It shows how a man may get rich without sin—Does that strike nobody's fancy? And it shows how well business push and religious principle agree together. Though hard it is for rich men to enter the kingdom of heaven, some of them obtain an abundant entrance. The subject of this biography is a Bristol merchant, living out at Kingswood, and the biographer does his work with a warm heart and large mind. On first page the reader has a sample of the book.

The lovers of scandal have a dish of it here. The pamplet before us, claiming to be the only correct edition from the London Reports, bears an awful testimony against Rome. Its stench is worse than ripping up an old wound, or unsealing the mouth of a sepulchre. The examination of witnesses reminds us of the prophet digging into the wall—"Turn thee yet again and thou shalt see greater abominations that they do." Here are the doings of those sanctimonious, wifeless gentlemen in cowls—the Romish priests; and here are inside views of those retreats of chastity and piety—Convents. Convents! "The shark and the shark's prey are there."

BLACKWOOD, for July.

Those who would keep informed of the current British periodical literature, can not lay out $3 to more advantage than for the American edition of this Magazine, or $10 for this and the four Reviews. Address Leonard Scott & Co., 79 Fulton st., New York.

American politics, and the Chinese at home and abroad, are noticeable articles in this number. The first, on the Defences of England, is after the old croaking style of Blackwood. This article, written probably by Alison, the historian, contains the following item:

"Prince Louis Napoleon, like his uncle, is very superstitious, and always carries an amulet, taken from the tomb of Charlemagne, on his person. He is known to have said in this country, long before he left it to accept the Presidency of the French Republic: 'It may appear in me presumptuous to wear that amulet, but I have an inborn conviction in my mind that I am one day to be the ruler of France. When I am so, I shall first extinguish the license of the press in Paris, and then attack England. I shall do so with regret, for I have been kindly received there, and it contains many of my best friends; but I must fulfill my mission, and carrry out that which I know my uncle had most at heart—I owe that to his memory.' In pursuance of these views he has just decreed 80,000 men to his regular army."

CALIFORNIA CORRESPONDENCE.

SAN FRANCISCO, June 30, 1852.

DEAR BROTHER MCTYEIRE: I am snugly couched up in the office of the Observer, with the most excellent editor, writing at his table, right under the little boxes you call pigeon holes.

I am more than ever pleased with the soil, climate, beauties and resources of this wonderful country. Society is improving fast: you will see women and children in most houses in the country and in the cities; and like all other countries, preachers here think their little ones the most precious of all. Truly, we have some of the finest preacher's children here that any clime can boast of. Could you but see two, viz., little Isaac Boring and Anna Wynn. You would pronounce them precious, most precious gifts from above.

I sometimes get happy in contemplating the works of nature, and God visits me on the mountain top and in the valley. I am bound to California by stronger ties than the united strength of all the cables in the universe. I am bound by the cable of faith, to the discharge of the duties I owe my Master in this gold-cursed State.

I have been spiritually comforted this morning on hearing from a fellow passenger that the California missionaries of the M. Episcopal Church, South, are made the subjects of special prayer, at their prayer meetings in Quoboc, Canada. This is through the instrumentality of his wife, a member of the Presbyterian Church.

We made the special subject of the prayers of a sister Church! Why, the thoughts of such favor is enough to make even a backslider "thank God and take courage." While he held my hand and talked to me of such instrumentality, the fire burned within me, and I remembered the words of the Psalmist, "How good and precious it is for brethren to meet together in unity; it is like the dewe of Hermon," etc. And also the words of the Apostle, "The fervent, effectual prayers of the righteous availeth much." Then, thought I, if all the Christian people, of every name and order, the world over, would unite in their efforts of praying for the success of missionaries, and each individual Christian offer as many fervent prayers as he has given cents in money, (prayers don't cost a cent, though they are the purchase price of heaven,) then the missionaries would be more abundantly successful and happy. Nay, if our beloved M. E. Church, South, would manifest as much zeal for us in prayer, as they have in funding up money to send us, how much sooner would they receive of the Lord that which they have lent him, with compound interest to their souls, and in souls saved by grace. Brethren in the ministry and laity, have you ever found out how delightful it is to pray for the mission and missionary? Oh, try it, and keep trying. Have you yet formed special prayer meetings for their benefit? Would it not be pleasant and profitable to have missionary prayer meetings at each missionary two days' meeting, and at each protracted and camp meeting? Fan the missionary fire into a flame, and this ingathering will be seen now, and many days hence. I have Canada Christians outrun you in the discharge of your reasonable duty? or have you barely brought your gifts (collections) to the altar, and left them there, without praying the Almighty to accept the offering, and sanctify it to its intended use, in bringing sinners to repentance in these ends of the earth? Is not prayer the medium of communication between God and man? the vehicle which conveys our sighs, tears and desires to the throne, and which, in the plenitude of mercy, is sent back freighted with the riches of grace, the wealth of heaven, gold pure and tried in the fire? Prayer is the moral lever which, when supported by the fulcrum of faith, will lift the degradation, guilt and penalty of sin from our race; and can it be possible that believers, young and old, will withhold their weight from this means of ameliorating the condition of a sick people, and thereby miss the chance of taking stock in the grand enterprise of a world's conversion?

When we pray for the success of missions, we mean that the Gospel run and be glorified. Thy kingdom come and over all prevail, send out thy light and thy truth, push the victories of the Cross far and wide, save the purchase of a Redeemer's blood, etc. We thereby sow seed for angels' rejoicing over repenting sinners, and promote the glory of God. We thereby bathe our spirits in the fount open in the house of David for sin and uncleanness. It is more blessed to give than to receive.

In view of all this, is there no voice from the religious press? Of our Methodist Zion lifted up, calling aloud for the special prayers of the Church, in favor of the cause of missions! Is there no heart in our brethren the preachers, local and itinerant, no soul in class leaders and exhorters, no tears of Martha's and Mary's, which may be brought tributary to this, our common cause? Our Redeemer's cause, the cause for which he left the shining hosts above, for which he groaned and bled and gave up the ghost? Will you not soon make glad our hearts in learning that, (while we know you present us in secret to the throne of grace,) you in public, and at set times, meet often to unite in commending us to God? Then, when the Auron and Hurs are at their posts, the prophets will be placed on the rock of ages, their hands will not become feeble, and Israel will prevail, hell will miss her prey, and heaven will be peopled with the trophies of the Cross. Lord help us all to "watch and pray."

I think the condition of our work is prosperous, and our worthy Superintendent abundant in labors and excellent in council. You would be glad to see him, presido over an Annual Conference, where he can give universal satisfaction. The way he edits a paper is about right: and if you were here to see the thrusts made at him from certain quarters, and see him dispose of the Lion and the Bear, you would not only think of ruddy David rescuing the kid in the field, and Samson bowing down with a jaw bone, but you would also think of the latter feeling for the pillars, and next the crumbling edifice, and then the mighty crash and dying shrieks, and finally an end of all strife, which I think soon, very soon will be, and we will be permitted to go in peace in the labors of love. What would you think, dear Bro., if, as twin children, the N. O. Christian Advocate and the Christian Observer should be adopted by the next General Conference, dont be alarmed at our size. Spanish things grow wonderfully, and people learn magically, in course of a few years, in California. We can sustain our Observer even this year, but if you editors would stir up some subscribers for us, we would fry fish for you.

Brother Graham has arrived, and gone to his work in fine health and spirits. Camp meetings are becoming numerous and useful in this country. Brothers Lockly, Long, Wynn and myself expect to have a camp meeting each soon, and you shall hear from them when over. There has been much good done at such meetings already in this country. One native Californian, of the Catholic faith, has been truly converted to God, and others are seeking for the better way, some of whom are of the highest ranks of the Spanish here. May we not prophesy that these will be the Johns going before our Jesus, illumining the gloom of superstition, making the mountains of iniquity low, and the valleys of superstition high, thus making straight the way before Him, to the hearts of these benighted people. Lord, thou art able to save to the uttermost all that call upon Thee, of every grade and color. Oh! grant to pour out Thy spirit on the world that lieth in the wicked one, and especially on California; and may all who read and hear, say amen. Yours, in love,

DENIS P. LYNE.

BASTROP CIRCUIT, LA. CONF.

DEAR BRO. MCTYEIRE: We are getting along pretty well in this part of the world. We have some very interesting two days' meetings, every week, on my circuit. Our congregations have increased one hundred per cent, and there is a good state of interest manifested on the subject of religion. We have had some few accessions to the Church. Our class meetings have been revived, the members slip are alive, and praying for a revival of pure religion. We have established two Sabbath Schools, which are well attended; and, on the whole we are doing pretty well. To God be the glory.

We propose commencing our missionary meetings in the month of September. We expect to hold them two days in every Society on the work; on the second day we intend to hold a public meeting, then and there take up a collection for the advancement of this noble and god-like enterprise; and we have faith to believe that our efforts will be seconded by the people, and the amount of our assessment (one hundred dollars) raised on the Circuit.

On Saturday, the 10th of July, the question, "License or no license," was taken in the Parish of Morehouse, and resulted in a perfect triumph to the cause of temperance. The town of Bastrop, which was considered beyond the bounds of recovery, and was thought by the friends of temperance an impossibility to put down groggeries and dog-geries, as "King Alcohol" seemed to have taken up his residence there; but the "Sons" were not to be frightened; they made a rally, surrounded the ramparts of his intemperate majesty, and carried the day, to the sorrow and dismay of those who had long dealt out "liquid fire and damnation."

In one precint I was holding a basket meeting, and the church (or log house) where we preach is public property. A school is held there every week day, and we hold Sabbath school on Sunday. At this place all elections are held, all neighborhood difficulties settled, and all notices for stray animals, etc., posted up. Ten voted "No License," two voted "License." Some one made the remark that the ladies, if they had a vote, would vote "License," as they were in favor of a "wee drap." We considered it a slander, and during the recess of this meeting we took a vote, and the ladies stamped their feet upon the vile slander, by voting "No License." So you will perceive while "Hoe's pross" was striking off the triumph of "Liberty to retail cursing and do mischief" in Donaldsonville, we here, in North Louisiana, were driving the monster from our Parish. Thus, sir, you see the "bull is rolling on." Let it roll. Yours, etc.,

ARCOLA MISSION, ALA. CO

DEAR BROTHER: Since my last you we have had some success in this I have knowledge of some twelve con thirteen have joined on probation, tor, six adults and twenty-eight have been baptised; one has been by letter, one removed from the low to the church above, an old of the most faithful members on Shs was under the tongue of good all—servants, overseer and owners hours were peaceful and happy.

One more week day appointment added to the work. What a pity of the planters do not adopt the ing their servants preached to in The missionary could serve so appointments, and then his suppo full lighter on the patrons, it being ted among more of them. of time on the farms, any one who is acquainted with the effect of rest laborers, must know that one or two extra rest in two or three weeks, can b a beneficial effect upon the laborers then to think of the probability, certainty, that those hours devoted gious exercises will secure the salvation least one immortal soul—a soul worth upon worlds—does seem to be an inducement sufficient to move all Christian masters have their servants preached to upon day morning, if the man of God could them no other time. The prospect ing the Arcola Mission on a permanent by the close of this year, is still good expect to have a missionary house and support for him and his another year thence on from year to year. I am sa tain but Arcola is to be a model for not all the Alabama missions. I hope ever, others will take the hint and make to the important interest at stake. My desire and prayer to God for the mission cause at large—the colored mission especially—is, that they may have abundant oess.

WASHINGTON, July 23, 8 P. M.—In the U. S. Senate to-day, Wednesday, the bill from the House of Representatives granting the right of way through the public lands to all railroads, plank roads, etc., was reported, taken up and passed.

The bill making appropriations for the contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1853, was then taken up and the Senate adjourned.

The session of the House of Representatives was occupied to-day in the further consideration of the bill making appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors and rivers."

THE FISHERY DIFFICULTY.—A schooner has arrived at Boston from the Bay of St. Lawrence, which reports that a British steam frigate had been seen with two British fishing vessels in tow. Fourteen British vessels are also said to be cruising on the fishing grounds, and further advices are, it is reported, fitting out at St. Johns, New Brunswick.

On this subject, a Washington correspondent of the Charleston Courier says:

I find, from the State papers, that in 1818, while Mr. Monroe was still Secretary of State, and Mr. Adams was in London, the difficulty respecting the fisheries became very menacing. This Government had, in the previous year, which led to the treaty of Ghent, maintained for the rights of the United States to the fisheries now complained by war, and refused to enter into any negotiation other than those of the treaty of 1783. But the British Government considering that treaty as abrogated by the war, issued orders to expel the Americans by force from the fishing grounds. This Government proposed that the British Minister here, Mr. Monroe, in a letter to Mr. Adams, Secretary of State, Mr. Rasguet informed me of an order which had been given by Admiral Griffith to the British cruisers, to come on board fishing vessels from the coasts of those provinces, and that he would endeavor to have revoked pending the negotiation. His attempt succeeded." The affair is very differently managed now; and the British Government have closed the door to negotiation.

FROM THE WEST INDIES.—The St. Kitts papers contain a letter from the Rev. Mr. Rock, of Anguilla, wherein a most heart-rending picture is drawn of the wretched condition to which the prevailing drought had reduced the classes of the island. They are represented as literally starving.

Obituary.

Died, in Philadelphia, July 30th, John Bell.

The deceased was a consistent member of the M. E. Church. His disease was consumption, and his trip abroad was in vain search of health. As a publisher of sound literature, mostly moral and religious, he has left behind him many monuments of usefulness. He was cut down in the midst of life, but tho life he had lived had been lived well.

A Friend.

Sarah Jane Carmichael was the daughter of Rev. Noah and Sarah Lancy, and consort of the Rev. Dugald Carmichael, of the Alabama Conference. She was born in Marlborough Dist., S. C., June 7th, 1830, and died at the residence of John W. Jackson, near Clayton, Ala., July 16th, 1852, being about 22 years of age. She embraced religion in her 12th year, and became a member of the M. E. Church—the church of her father and the one of her choice. She possessed decidedly those qualities which can not fail to engage attention and secure esteem. From a child she was remarkably mild and sweet tempered. She filled the various positions of daughter, sister, wife, mother and mistress in a manner that secured the esteem of all who knew her. She was a faithful admiror of the Lord Jesus Christ, a patient sufferor, and a Christian conqueror in the last conflict.

The wife of an itinorant, she had to pass frequently through scenes of change and disappointment that try the souls of men, which none but those who have the work of God at heart and his grace to support them, are prepared to meet. Having been born while her father was engaged in the itinorant work, educated to love and respect the church, and being the wife of a traveling preacher, her life was one devoted to this work from its commencement to its close.

A short time previous to her death, she attended a protracted revival meeting in Marianna, West Florida, where she enjoyed life fully and religiously beyoad what was usual for her. Being blest of the Lord she spoke feelingly in love-feast of the powerful operations of his grace upon her heart, and was frequently heard to praise God in the highest for what He had done and was still doing in her soul; which appears as though God by special grace was preparing her heart and soul for the dreadful conflict through which she would shortly be called to pass.

She died of typhoid fever, and though her affliction was short and painful, it was endured with Christian fortitude and confidence in the power of God, until she fell asleep in the arms of Jesus, realizing the truth of the sentiment so often sung:

"Jesus can make a dying bed.
Feel soft as downy pillows are,
While on his breast I lean my head
And breathe my life out sweetly there."

She has gone, leaving a broken-hearted husband, an infant son, (aged one year and eight months,) with many relations and friends to mourn her loss; but the gracious declaration, "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord," &c., cheers our hearts that those who fall asleep in Jesus, God will bring forth with him.

Her remains are deposited in the cemetery at Eufaula, Ala., and her spirit is gone to rest in the Paradise of God forever.

J. L. Sanders.

Alabama Conference, 1852.

F. R. Singleton was born in Wilkinson county, Miss., and at his death was about 27 years of age. Left an orphan in early life, he was confided to the care of his uncle, from whom he received all a parent's fondness. Having graduated with distinguished honor, he settled himself as a planter in this parish. Subsequently he removed to Texas, resolved to connect himself with the future destinies of that growing State. To this period the subject of religion had claimed little of Mr. Singleton's attention, but while attending a protracted meeting, the simple truths of the Gospel reached his heart, and following the example of his wife, he attached himself to the church, and returned home with the knowledge of his sins forgiven.

Soon after this period he was appointed class-leader, the duties of which office he well performed till his death. And now, while all seemed bright, disease, with lurking tread, approached his peaceful dwelling and claimed him as its victim. Religion cheered and consoled him, and he could exclaim with the Psalmist, "Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for thou art with me, thy rod, and thy staff, they comfort me." He maintained his consciousness to the last, singing in the same hour he died every line of the beautiful song:

"Oh, sing to me of Heaven
When I am called to die."

Thus passed from time to eternity one who had sought for pleasure in the giddy circle of wealth and fashion, and found it was religion alone could satisfy the longings of an immortal soul. In a distant land far from family and friends, his wife and little ones reside, but the father of the fatherless, the husband of the widow is near to console them in their bereavement, and finally to conduct them to that better land—

Where sorrow's tears will never fall,
And death will never come.

Jeanerettes, St. Mary, La., J. W. R.

Fashion.—A letter from Paris says, "The new five-franc pieces, bearing the effigy of the President, have almost all been cut across the throat as soon as issued. You can scarce find one of those coins that does not bear this attestation of the good wishes of the public of Paris for Louis Napoleon."

The Pope.—Letters from Rome state that the Pope is threatened with dropsy, and that the state of his health gives great uneasiness to his physicians. Hitherto, every effort has been made to conceal his danger from the public. It is said, that in the event of his disease proving fatal, he will be succeeded by Cardinal Wiseman.

Consuls Recognised.—The President officially recognises Francisco de Arrangois as Consul General of Mexico, to reside at NewYork. Antonio Jose de Maranda Falcao has been recognised as Consul General of Brazil for the United States.

Rt. Rev. Bishop Connolly, V. O., of Halifax, as Bishop of New Brunswick, have been lately received from Rome by the Archbishop of Halifax. Dr. Walsh has also received the Pallium sents from the Eternal City, by which New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Cape Breton, Nova Scotia, and the Bermudas, are erected into a Roman Catholic Ecclesiastical Province, with Halifax as the centre and Metropolitan See. Letters patent have likewise been addressed by his Holiness, Pius IX, to the present Bishop of Halifax, constituting him the first Archbishop and Metropolitan of the new Province.

Free Colored Convention.—The Free Colored Convention at Baltimore was in session on the 27th ult. The committee appointed reported a preamble and a long series of resolutions, setting forth the platform and principles of the Convention. They declare all men born free and equal, and entitled to the pursuit of happiness; acknowledge the efforts of their white friends for their elevation, but declare that those efforts have been unavailing, and that their condition, both socially and politically, is worse now than twenty years ago—in the face of constantly increasing emigration and growing prejudices against them, they declare there is no present prospect of their being placed on a footing of equality in this country, and they then pronounced in favor of emigration to Liberia, as the only place where they can enjoy republican institutions and the right of governing themselves. The resolutions do not counsel all to emigrate, but recommend colored people to accustom themselves to the idea of emigration, as sooner or later their removal must take place. The resolutions were debated at much length, and were adopted.

Mutilated Bank Notes.—A suit was recently tried before one of the lower Courts of Pittsburgh to recover of the Exchange Bank the value of a five dollar mutilated note. The note had about an inch torn off the middle of it, which, it was contended by the officers of the bank, could, with a like amount from five other bills, form a sixth, and one equally as good and passable as that presented at the bank for redemption. The bank had offered to give four dollars for the note, but it was refused, and the full value demanded. The bank was sustained by the Court, which decided that the holder of the note was not entitled to the full value represented on its face.

A Great Blunder.—After all the dispute about the milleaga amendment to the Deficiency bill, insisted upon by the Senate, and after some opposition concurred in by the House. It turns out that the Committee on Enrolled Bills neglected to have it engrossed, and Mr. Speaker Boyd and the President of the Senate signed the bill without it; and, with this omission, it was sent to the President, who, of course, made it a law. Mr. Secretary Dickens walked up to the Treasury Department to get the fifty thousand, when, to his astonishment, it was announced that the appropriation was not in the bill. To remedy the negligence, the Senate have inserted the milleage amendment in the Military Appropriation bill.

Arrival of the Sierra Nevada.—The U. S. Mail Steamship Sierra Nevada arrived at NewYork on Friday night the 30th ult., from Aspinwall. She brought $110,000 on freight.

Flores was still three miles below tinynaqui, his further progress having been stopped by a French frigate.

Mr. Rice, the U. S. Consul at Acapulco, had been called to the City of Mexico by the American Minister, in order that some explanation should take place relative to his case. He was, however, subsequently re-instated and taken back.

The Free Soil Convention.—The free soil party are laboring to make an imposing show at their National Convention, to be held at Pittsburgh, on the 11th of August. The Messrs. Allen, of Massachusetts; Durkee, of Wisconsin; Giddings and Townsend, of Ohio, have signified their intention to attend the Convention; and Messrs. Sumner, Hale, Chase, and other distinguished free soilers are also expected. Twelve delegates from the slave States of Kentucky have been already chosen, and the meeting in Madison (Cassius M. Clay's home) is said to have been the largest and most enthusiastic ever held in that county. All the railroads of Northern Ohio, and all West of Cleveland, will charge delegates to the Convention only half price.

Fruit California.—The steamship Prometheus arrived at NewYork on the 29th ult., bringing dates from San Francisco to the 3d ult.

Ronchini advices at the 21st ult. give the particulars of a destructive fire at that place. Capt. Snow loses $50,000, which falls principally upon his consignees.

The brig Palmetto, from NewYork to San Juan, loaded with cont. was wrecked on the 8th on Courtown Banks. The vessel and cargo were a total loss. The crew were saved.

Business at San Francisco was good. Mixed tiji was selling to some extent at $10. Lard 42c. Flour $19 to $20. There had been some speculation in Pollor and the stock was heavy. Coal $50 per ton. Stocks firm.

The San Francisco papers are barren of news.

The steamer NewOrleans from Panama, arrived on the 28th, with 268 passengers.

In Mariposa, very summary measures had been taken to drive the foreigners from the mines.

The news from the interior is scanty. A lump of pure gold weighing 35 pounds was dug on the Yuba river.

Geo. Ford, of Missouri, was murdered near Yuba City on the 27th.

The Democratic county ticket had been successful in Sereena county.

The difficulties in Mariposa, between the French and Americans, continue. The former had been driven away, and had gone to San Francisco to lay their grievances before the French Consul.

The city of Sonora was being rapidly rebuilt.

Besides the usual number of murders, robberies, etc., the papers contain nothing further of interest.

It is stated in the San Francisco papers that the Americans had allowed the French miners till the 4th of July to decide whether they would leave Mariposa county. The inference is that if they did not peaceably depart by that time, force would be resorted to.

Later from the Cape of Good Hope.—By the bark Deem Wade, arrived at Boston, dates from the Cape of Good Hope to the 14th June, have been received. The papers are filled with accounts of outrages and murders in various parts of the Colony.

The warfare had assumed a guerilla character and there appeared to be no safety for life in traversing any of the public roads. Armies of Kaffirs 2000 strong, were located in the mountains, from which they descended to plunder, murder and destroy.

Some of the Colonists are so disheartened that they are about selling off their possessions and emigrating to Australia.

General Cathcart was about to make a general onslaught upon the Kaffirs in their strongholds. Fifty Kaffir women who had acted as spies had been captured by the English.

The Fishing Operations.—Telegraphic accounts of the latest dates from Boston, 28th and 29th ult., report there are 300 fishing vessels in the bay.

Capt. Layhold, of the British armed brig Halifax, was in the bay, and informed Capt. Weyian, of the American fishing schooner St Cloud, that his orders were to seize all vessels found fishing within the line laid down by the British Government. This line cuts off our vessels from fishing on all the grounds, except in the neighborhood of Canso and Magdalen Islands. The distance from this line to the shore, in some places, is fifty or sixty miles. Another restriction has been placed upon our vessels in the shape of an anchorage duty of six pence per ton in all the provinces. The fishing vessels have been obliged heretofore to pay a like duty at Canso, and now they are obliged to pay this anchorage duty at the other provinces, in addition, which is something never required before.

A schooner from the Bay of St. Lawrence reports that on the 23d a British war steamer was seen off Gaspe with two American fishermen in tow. There are fourteen British war vessels on the ground, and four others fitting out at St. Johns.

Advices from St. John State that the Court of Admiralty had tried the cases of the schooners Coral and Hyndas, for violating the treaty of 1818. Their owners offered no defence. Judgment was deferred until the 29th, when, of course, they will be condemned.

The Halifax papers of the 27th announce that the British sloop-of-war Buzzard had sailed to join the Cumberland off Newfoundland.

Advices from Newfoundland to the 13th state that great satisfaction is felt at the protection afforded by Government to the English fishing interests.

In commenting upon the fishing troubles, the New Brunswicker remarks:

Our Western neighbors may rest perfectly assured that their vessels are not likely to be seized unless they are found clearly within limits, and in places where there can be no possibility of dispute as to their infringement of the convention.

The same paper further says:

The commanders of Her Majesty's vessels employed in the fishery service have received special instructions to exercise a careful discretion in the very delicate office of interfering with vessels belonging to foreign and friendly powers.

Colonization Items.—We learn from the Colonization Journal for the present month, that an expedition of colored emigrants will leave NewYork for liberia on the 1st of October. Over one hundred applications are already on the list, including a number from Michigan.

An expedition will sail from Norfolk (Va.) early in November, and nearly two hundred emigrants are expected to take passage at that time.

The collections for colonization purposes on or near the 4th of July, have been far more numerous this year than ever before.

President Roberts, by the last accounts, had departed for England, with a view to the adjustment of the difficulties provoked by some English traders.

It was reported that an attempt had been made to renew the slave trade north of Liberia, near Sierra Leone; which rumor, says the above paper, "makes us feel an earnest wish to plant a settlement of five hundred people near Gallinas river, as an advance post to watch the pirates."

Wild Animals.—Large numbers of wild horses or mustangs roam over the plains between the Merced and the San Joaquin rivers, in California. Gangs of Mexicans and Spaniards employ themselves in catching them, and the business proves very profitable.

Death from Chloroform.—Mrs. John Davis, of Worcester, Massachusetts, died a few days since from the effects of chorotorm, which she inhaled for the purpose of having a tooth extracted.

The United States Treasury.—It is stated that after paying the appropriations in the Deficiency Bill, there still remains in the United States Treasury sixteen millions three hundred thousand dollars.

The Chinese Mission.—It is said that the Hon. Humphrey Marshall, member of Congress from Kentucky, was nominated by the President on the 20th ult. as Commissioner to China.

New Invention.—Mr. George Little, electric telegraph engineer, announces in the NewYork Sun that he has invented an instrument by which the use of the Voltaic Battery will be dispensed with for telegraphic purposes.

A machine is on exhibition in Steubenville, Ohio, for the manufacture of matches. It will produce either percussion or friction matches at the rate of 20,000 per minute, or 1,200,000 per hour.

Naval.—The United States ship St. Louis was put in commission, at Norfolk, on the 20th ult, and dropped down to the navel anchorage. H. N. Tugram is in command.

Fashionable Folly.—The annual grand dress and fancy ball at Saratoga, is mooted. It is expected to surpass any of its predecessors in splendour and extravagance. Costumes are now making that will cost three thousand dollars.

United States Bank Case.—Judge Allison, of the Common Pleas of Philadelphia, has decided that the trustees of the Bank of the United States are bound to receive, in payment of debts due to the bank coupons of bonds issued by the bank.

The Franking Privilege.—The Postmaster General has directed that documents and speeches may be franked separately and when tied in bundles, the direction on the outer document alone shall be required. This will save members of Congress, during the political campaign, an immense amount of labor and clerk hire.

Sailing of the Frigate Mississippi.—This noble vessel, Capt. W. J. McKinney in command, and bearing the broad pennant of Com. Perry, sailed from NewYork, under secret orders, on the 28th ult. She was to have been the flag-ship of the Japan expedition. The Fishing quarters are spoken of as her place of destination.

Gosport Navy Yard.—The steam-frigate Powhatan is nearly ready for sea. Orders came from Washington on Saturday, the 24th ult., to put her stores on board and fit her for the Mediterranean station.

The sloop-of-war St. Louis also lies at the yard, and is only waiting for her purser to go into commission. She is likewise bound to the Mediterranean.

The sloop-of-war Cyane, which has been in the dry dock undergoing some light repairs, is about ready, and will go to sea as soon as the court-martial, ordered for the trial of her commander and several officers, is over.

The steamer Alleghany has been hauled out and improved, having "Hunter's" propellers removed and a screw propeller substituted in its place.

The frigate Potomac, which has for some time past occupied the dry dock, undergoing very thorough repairs, is now receiving her copper.

The frigates Columbia and Savannah are also undergoing repairs at the wharf.

Labor Embezzlement.—A young man named S. Cohen Lopes, in the employment of Messrs. North & Scott, in St. Louis, has been arrested on the charge of embezzling funds belonging to the firm to the amount of $10,000. He was a book-keeper and cashier. Lopes was formerly a resident of Mobile, and has always borne a good reputation.

High Price of Fruits and Vegetables.—This year there is unusual complaint at Cincinnati of the high prices of fruits, vegetables, meats, and every other article purchased in market. There is a general advance in prices—fruit double, vegetables 50 per cent. Even blackberries, which last year were abundant at five cents, and the choicest but ten cents a quart, now sell at twenty cents.

Naval.—An order was received at the Brooklyn Navy Yard, on Monday morning, the 26th ult., to place the frigate Constitution in readiness for sea. Workmen were immediately placed upon her, and she was taken into the dock. The sloop-of-war Warren, brig Dolphin, and one or two other naval vessels lying at the yard, have been ordered to get ready for sea, within a few days past.

The Japan Expedition.—Commodore Perry is now in Washington. It says that the Japan expedition is not delayed for want of men—he has seamen and marines enough. But it is delayed, and is likely to be so for an indefinite length of time, by the inability of the persons employed to repair and refit some of the vessels to perform that service.

Mistress of Arts.—At the commencement of the Ohio Female College, at College Hill, near Cincinnati, recently, the degree of Mistress of Arts was conferred on the senior class, consisting of seven young ladies. The whole number of students during the last term was 102.

Telegraphic Items.

Progress of Louis Napoleon.

The tour of Louis Napoleon through the Provinces has been one continued scene of triumph, grand fetes, extraordinary demonstrations, magnificent illuminations, and constant enthusiasm, have marked his progress throughout. At Strasburg, where he arrived on the 18th July, a monster review was held, at which a sham fight formed part of the proceedings, and frenzied shouts of Vive l'Empereur were heard from the populace and the troops on all sides. Showers of bouquets fell upon him as he passed through the streets, and his reception there as at nearly all places was most enthusiastic.

Belgium.

LeBlanc has been called upon to form a new Belgian ministry.

American Squadron.

The American naval squadron was lying in the harbor of Naples.

Congressional Proceedings.

Washington, Aug 2

A bill was introduced to amend the postage law. By this bill letters are proposed to be charged two cents postage for all distances, when pre-paid. Newspapers sent any distance under 500 miles are to pay one-quarter cent; under 1000 miles one-half cent; over 1000 miles one cent; the circulation to be free within fifty miles of the office of publication. The bill abolishes the franking privilege. The House then concurred in the amendment of the Senate to adjourn on the 31st August. The House then passed the Senate's amendment to the deficiency appropriation, $50,000 for compensation per diem, and mileage of Senators, Representatives and Delegates, which had been accidentally omitted on the engrossment of the bill. The House then took up the Apportionment Bill, which was debated until adjournment.

The United States of America and the Republic of Peru mutually agree that there shall be reciprocal liberty of commerce and navigation between their respective territories and citizens; the citizens of either republic may frequent with their vessels all the coasts, ports and places of the other, wherever foreign commerce is permitted, and reside in all parts of the territory of either, and occupy dwellings and warehouses; and every thing belonging thereto shall be respected, and shall not be subjected to any arbitrary visits or search. The said citizens shall have full liberty to trade in all parts of the territory of either, according to the rules established by the respective regulations of commerce, in all kinds of goods, merchandise, manufactures, and products not prohibited to all, and to open retail stores and shops, under the same municipal and police regulations as native citizens; and they shall not in this respect be liable to any other or higher taxes than those which are or may be paid by native citizens. No examination or inspection of their books, papers, or accounts, shall be made without the legal order of a competent tribunal or judge.

From the Plains.—The St. Louis Republican of the 28th ult. has later news from the Plains. Several parties of Californians have arrived overland at Weston, Kanesville and other towns. Up to the 15th of July, 25,805 men, 7021 women, 8270 children, 483 horses, 5822 mules, 90,240 cattle, 24,230 sheep and 8166 wagons, had passed Fort Kearney. Mr. Thomas A. Stoddard reports having counted 600 fresh graves between Fort Kearney and Weston. The emigrants were getting along better than in any previous season.

Judge T. W. Smith and company arrived at Kanesville on the 15th, in fifty-four days from California. They made the trip from Fort Laramie in fifteen days, a distance of 700 miles. They packed through, and were in good health. They report the fourth side of the Platte, and represent that there was a little sickness on that side of the river, while there was many deaths on the south side.

Judge Smith examined the route with a view to the practicability of a railroad to the Pacific, and reports that the north side of the Platte is well lapted to the construction of a road, much better than the south side.

Two men from Boone county, Ky., the names of Beal and Bailey, quarreled near Bear river. Bailey was shot and killed. Beal was tried by a jury of emigrants and executed. They quarreled about a division of property, when about to separate.

On the 18th June, on the upper Pike river, a lady was found dead, with her throat cut from ear to ear. She was about thirty years of age, had on a finger a gold ring, marked on the outside with the letter W. E., which is now in the possession of E. H. Harry, California.

On the 20th June, a man and boy we found dead, supposed to have been murdered. The man had brown hair and sandy whiskers, was thirty or thirty-two years of age. The boy had red hair, and was eight or ten years old.

The Mormon train was getting along very well. A son of Col. J. C. Little, Mr. Dodge and Bishop Lane, are reported to have died.

Re-Appearance of the Sea Serpt.—It appears the sea serpent has turned up again, having lately been seen off Halifax, N. S., doubtless on his way to look after the interests of our fishermen. The Halifax Colonist gives the following account of the visit of the snakeship:

"The monstrous critter was seen by Geo. Osborne, of Cow Bay, on Saturday, as he is willing to testify on oath it was quite near to his boat, and thus described by Mr. Osborne: 'Its head was exactly the shape of a serpent, and being above water, appeared to be about five feet in length, by about seven feet in circumference; the body, which was principally underwater, could not have been less than 60 or 70 feet in length.'"

Mr. Tobie Miller, of Westchester, Pa., is the father of seven sons and two daughters, all of whom are living except one, who died within a year. The following is the weight of the survivors: 252 lbs., 238, 196, 210, 190, 230, 199, 200 and 204. The father still lives, at the good old age of 76. The joint weight of the father and eight children is 2254 lbs. A newspaper family than the nine Miles will not be found in fifteen miles.

The Montreal Herald says "hundreds of persons who never saw Montreal, or have seen it only at a distance of have resided in a part far from the scene of our recent disaster will probably peradventure, Canada, and some parts of the United States, representing themselves to be distressed fire-sufferers from our city. Now, each one of these is an errant impostor, and should be treated as such, for there is abundant relief for all who seek, provided they are actual sufferers. We will thank newspapers at a distance to notice this.

Mr. Hebert, of the Paris Hippodrome, throws Van Amburgh in the shade. He has tamed eighty-three lions, besides an indefinite number of hyenas, panthers, tigers, etc. He declares that he is afraid of no fourlegged animal that walks, but he cannot be induced to go within gun shot of a balloon. One of the aeronauts thought it would be an attractive announcement to make that he was to execute his next ascension in company with a lion and applied to M. Hebert for his consent and co-operation. But that gentleman refused flatly, and said he would rather be shut up in a cage with a dozen lions and rhinoceros, than to get into a basket under a balloon.

From the London Illustrated News we learn that on the night of the 27th of June, Mr. Hind, the astronomer at Mr. Bishop's private Observatory, in Regent's Park, London, discovered a new planet on the borders of the constellation Aquilla and Serpens, about five degrees east of the star Tau in Ophiuens, which shines as a fine star of between the 8th and 9th magnitude, has a very steady yellow light and at times during the night, which was not favorable for high magnifiers, appeared to have a disc.

It is stated in one of the biographies of John Randolph, as an instance of his critical knowledge of the English language, that while Dr. Parrish attended him as medical adviser, during his last illness, the following scene occurred. While the doctor was reading for Randolph, the word "impetus" occured. Dr. P. pronounced it "impetus," laying the accent on the second syllable. Randolph, weak and dying as he was, immediately interrupted him with—"Wrong, Doctor; impetus, if you please." Shortly afterwards, while reading a chapter in the Bible, he read the word "omnipotent," accenting on the third syllable. Randolph exclaimed, "Wrong again, Doctor; omnipotent is the word."

Foreign News by the Europa.—The Charleston Courier contains the following telegraphic summary of the news brought by the steamer Europa:

Great Britain.—The elections are over, and the papers state that as far as heard from the Derby Administration had only 187 votes against 481 of the opposition. The latest election returns, however, received just prior to the sailing of the Europa, are said to show that the Ministerial minority is only 66. The majority against it in the last Parliament was estimated at 82.

Serious election riots have occurred in Cork, Limerick and other parts of Ireland, which the military have had to quell, and many lives have been lost.

Belgium.—The Belgian Monitour states that the resignation of the Ministry had been accepted, and that a new Cabinet was about to be formed.

Austria.—Many persons have been arrested in this country, in consequence of letters from M. Kossuth having been seized in Italy and sent to the Austrian Government, as their contents implicated certain parties residing under its jurisdiction.

Switzerland.—The Treaty of Commerce between Switzerland and the United States has been completed.

India.—The British troops have carried by storm the town of Bassain, which is one hundred miles west of Rangoon, previously captured. Eight hundred Birmese are said to have been killed on the occasion.

Advices have also been received, which state that a terrible battle had taken place between Yar Mehomet and Candahar, in which the latter had been defeated, with a loss of 2000 men.

A ministerial crisis was threatened in Spain. Gen. Pavia, it is believed, will succeed Bravo Murillo as President of the Council.

There had been immense new discoveries of gold in Australia.

Steamboat Runners.—The Albany (N. Y.) Register gives the following scene from real life, which is rather rich, but at the same time melancholy, as the idle predictions in reference to the steamer Henry Clay soon after proved too true:

There are lively times among the "runners" of the opposition day boats, early these fine mornings. People who have a fancy for reading rare chapters in the large and interesting volume of human nature, may be accommodated by spending half an hour at the new steamboat landing, or at the foot of Hamilton street, between 6 and 7 o'clock A. M.

Your true Runner is "an odd stick"—a "peculiar institution"—unlike all the "rest of mankind"—generally plump, always lively and energetic, and charged to the muscle with the most intense regard for the welfare and baggage of every man, woman and child who may be intent upon perpetrating a journey. One moment he is cursing the "opposition" Runner, and apparently ready and willing to throw him into the dock, and the next he is one vast, unbroken smile, politely retailing to a chance customer with a carpet bag in his hand, the palace-like accommodations and dog-cheap fare of "our boat."

Just for the pastime of the thing, we will follow the fortune of the "Man with the Carpet Bag" till he gets off to NewYork. He wants to go—no mistake about that—and he desires to go as cheaply as possible. The boats advertised are the Reindeer and the Henry Clay—fare 50 cents by each. Reindeer Runner meets him pretty well up Broadway.

Reindeer Runner—"Goin' to York, sir?"

Carpet Bag Man—That's my intention, sir.

R. R.—Better take the Reindeer, sir—smartest boat in all creation, fare only 50 cents.

City Banker—Don't you do no sich thing, sir, if you vallo your life.

C. B. M.—Why not, sir?

C. R.—Oh, the Reindeer has a fashion of running ashore and blowing up about every day, that's all. Besides, they'll charge you $1 when you git aboard. We carry for 50 cents—not a cent more—splendid boat, sir—750 feet long, new this summaer, and the tallest kind of feeding aboard.

C. B. M.—Well, I guess I'll go along with—

R. R.—We'll take you for 37½ cents, friend—here's your ticket—all easy and tight—he lies ubont our boat—he's paid for it, and don't do nothin' else.

C. R.—I say friend, if you want to go to New York this week, take the Clay. Here's a ticket—only 25 cents, sir; for you and your carpet bag, and perfect safety insured. The Reindeer aint fit to run. She's got a hole in one of her boilers big enough for you to crawl through, and they'll charge you a dollar when they secure you.

C. B. M.—Well, I'm tired of this pulling and hauling. Give me the ticket for 25 cents, and I'll just—

R. R.—Here, take my ticket at a shilling, and say nothing more about it. The Clay never'll get to NewYork if she starts, for she broke one of her wheels all to pieces yesterday, and the moment she gets under way she'll run side ways, and go ashore.

C. B. M.—Well, well, I'll take the Reindeer, and run—

C. R.—On to the overslaugh in spite of yourself. The Reindeer sticks on the bar, sir, three or four hours every morning, in sight of the city. And then the fodder, sir!

C. B. M.—The what?

C. R.—The fodder, sir; the dinner. Tainted steaks, last summer's eggs, cheese that runs nlone, break—

C. B. M.—Oh, bother on your dinner! I've got half a peck of sandwiches in my carpet bag, besides cookies.

C. R.—That's right, sir; nothing like economy in these hard times.

R. R.—There goes the last bell, sir. What do you say? Only a shilling fare by the Reindeer; now's your chance, sir.

C. R.—He's like a trooper, friend; he'll stick you for a dollar if he gets you aboard, and stick you on the bar besides. Come, go with me at a shilling, and say nothing more about it.

EVENING MEDITATIONS....By C. D. Cranwell.

Alone! I am alone! the sun is setting,
Pensive I gaze upon the brilliant sky!
A year ago—ah! there is an forgetting—
A year ago I had a mother nigh.

Alone, I am alone! night's shades are falling.
The silent birds unto their nests are gone:
The dove beneath her wing her young is calling.
They have a mother, they are not alone.

And in the hour to me—mine eyes are filling
With bitter tears that will not be repressed;
This sorrow ever new, my heart is thrilling.
Until it quivers wildly in my breast.

Alone, I am alone! by hope forsaken.
Life has no joy for me since she is gone:
Love in this heart can never more awaken—
Sad is my fate—alone, I am alone!

THE SOUTH-SEA MARAUDERS.

CAPTURE OF PANAMA IN 1672.

It used to be a common phrase among the great roving and wild class of sailors, that there was no peace south of the line. This was certainly the case during the chief part of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, when the tropical regions of the West were so dreadfully infested by buccaneers or pirates. These desperadoes belonged to mostly all European nations, but were chiefly English, Dutch and French, and the whole burden of their cruelty and rapacity fell upon the Spaniards. Against the "Dons," as they called them, they waged a continual war, and, as it appeared, on the specious pretence of revenging the cruelties which the Spanish nation had committed upon the Indians. So much did the Spaniards suffer in this way, that they at length adopted the inglorious expedient of desisting from carrying on an intercourse with their South American colonies. This, however, served but to excite instead of allaying the plundering propensities of the buccaneers, who now landed from their ships and attacked the colonists in their cities. Curiously enough, these depredations met with little attention in England, or in any country to which the pirates belonged. At this period, the English and other courts of Europe generally winked at the evil deeds of the buccaneers, except when pressed to convict and punish them for their murders and robberies on the high seas. So far as the English were concerned in these enterprises, these can be little reason to doubt that the antipathy which both the nation and the Government had to the Spaniards—an antipathy originating, in a great measure, in the attempt of the Spanish Armada on the country, in Queen Elizabeth's time, and which lasted even up till the middle of last century—was one of the prevailing causes of the piratical aggressions and the impunity with which they were committed.

One of the most audacious piratical leaders, about the middle of the seventeenth century, was Henry Morgan, a Welchman, who contrived to gain the favor and patronage of Charles II. Morgan levied war on his own account, and that of his companions, on a great scale. In 1670, he undertook a grand expedition against the Spanish South American colonies, with 37 sail of vessels and 2000 men, the vessels being well provisioned, and the crews armed to the teeth. After holding a council of war at Cape Tiberoon, it was determined to proceed to attack and plunder the rich town of Panama. But this city was situated on the Pacific coast of the South American continent, and the vessels of the pirates were in the Atlantic. It was hence proposed to leave the ships on the coast, and march overland to the place of meditated destruction. The daring project, which would have daunted less resolute men, was instantly put into execution. Morgan landed at Fort San Lorenzo on the West India side of the Isthmus of Darien. Having captured this stronghold, in which he left a garrison of 500 of his men, and having committed the charge of the ships to 150 more, the advance towards the shore of the Pacific was commenced. At first, like our own Californian emigrants, the party ascended the river Chagres in canoes, which took them a certain length. After surmounting incredible difficulties, both on the river and on land, and enduring dreadful fatigue in carrying along their artillery over huge mountains, as well as suffering from famine, they at length, on the ninth day, saw the expense of the Pacific, or South Sea, spread out before them. As evening approached, they came in sight of the church towers of Panama, when they halted, and waited impatiently for the morrow. At this period Panama consisted of 7000 houses, and was a place of considerable magnificence and wealth.

When the buccaneers resumed their march at an early hour next morning, the Spaniards at once guessed their desperate intentions, and determined on giving them battle. They marched out from the city to meet them, preceded by herds of wild bulls, which they drove upon the adventurers to disorder their ranks. But the buccaneers, as hunters of these wild animals, were too well acquainted with their habits to be discomposed by them, and the attack of the van does not seem to have had much effect. The Spaniards, however, must have made an obstinate resistance, for it was night before they gave way, and the buccaneers became masters of the city. During the long battle, and indeed all that day and night, the buccaneers gave no quarter to 600 Spaniards fell. The loss of the buccaneers is not specified, but it appears to have been very considerable.

When masters of the city, Morgan was afraid that his men might get drunk, and be surprised and cut off by the Spaniards. To prevent this, he caused it to be reported that all the wine in the city had been expressly poisoned by the inhabitants. The dread of poison kept the fellows sober. But Morgan had scarcely taken up his quarters in Panama when several parts of city burst out into flames, which, fed by the cedar wood and other combustible materials of which the houses were chiefly built, spread so rapidly that in a short time a great part of the city was burned to the ground. It has been disputed whether this was done by design or accident—by the buccaneers or by the despairing Spaniards; but it appears that Morgan, who always charged it upon the Spaniards, gave all the assistance he could to each of the inhabitants as endeavored to stop the progress of the fire, which, however, was not quite extinguished for weeks. Among the buildings destroyed was a factory-house, belonging to the Genoese, who then carried on the trade of supplying the Spaniards with slaves from Africa.

The licentiousness, rapacity, and cruelty of the buccaneers, had no bounds. They spared, in these, their cruelties to no sex or condition whatever. As to religious persons, monks and nuns and priests—they granted them less quarter than others, unless they procured a considerable sum of money for their ransom. Detachments scoured the country to plunder and to bring in prisoners. Many of the unfortunate inhabitants escaped with their effects, by sea, and reached the islands that are thickly clustered in the Bay of Panama. But Morgan found a large boat aground in the port, which he launched, and manned with a numerous crew, and sent her to cruise among those islands. A galleon, on board which the nuns of a convent had taken refuge, and where much money, plate, and other effects of value had been lodged, had a very narrow escape from these desperadoes. They took several vessels in the bay. One of them was large and admirably adapted for cruising. This opened a new prospect that was brilliant and enticing; an unexplored ocean studded with islands was before them, and some of the buccaneers began to consult how they might leave their chief, Morgan, and try their fortunes on the South Sea, whence they proposed to sail, with the plunder they should obtain, by the East Indies to Europe. This diminution of force would have been fatal to Morgan, who, therefore, as soon as he got hint of the design, cut away the masts of the ship, and burned every boat and vessel lying at Panama that could suit their purpose.

At length, on the 24th February, 1672, about four weeks after the taking of Panama, Morgan and his men departed from the still smouldering ruins of that unfortunate city, taking with them 175 mules loaded with spoil, and 600 prisoners, part of whom were detained to carry burdens across the Isthmus, and others for the ransom expected for their release. Among the latter were many women and children, who were made to suffer cruel fatigue, hunger and thirst, and artfully made to apprehend being carried to Jamaica and sold as slaves, that they might the more earnestly endeavor to procure money for their ransom. When these poor creatures threw themselves on their knees, and, weeping and tearing their hair, begged of Morgan to let them [illegible] to their families, his brutal answer was, that he came not there to listen to cries and lamentations, but to seek money." This idol of [illegible] indeed; he sought from his comrades as [illegible] capable, and in such a manner that [illegible] they did not lose his brains out.

back to San Lorenzo, the buccaneers divided their spoil, and soon after separated with their vessels, most likely to go upon new expeditions. As for the arch-villain, Morgan, he subsequently went to England, and received the honor of knighthood from the hands of Charles II., who afterwards sent him to Jamaica to fill a judicial office. Here he behaved with his wonted cruelty, and in a few years was transmitted home a prisoner at the instance of the Spanish court; but no charge being preferred against him, he was liberated. Circumstances such as these give us a curiousin sight into the state of morals towards the conclusion of the seventeenth century.

The plundering of Panama by Morgan fired the imaginations of the buccaneers, who now planned similarly daring expeditions to the South Sea, the coasts of which, and their cities, seemed to them like a newly-discovered mine of wealth—a place where gold was to be had for the gathering. This became known to the Spaniards, and gave rise to numerous forebodings and prophecies, both in Spain and in Peru, of great invasions by land and sea.

After one or two ineffectual attempts of parties of pirates to cross the Isthmus of Darien, an expedition was planned in 1680, by a set of English adventurers, who found means to procure the friendship and co-operation of the Indians who inhabited the line of route. The buccaneers who engaged in this expedition were the crews of seven vessels, amounting altogether to 366 men, of whom thirty-seven were left to guard the ship during the absence of those who went on the expedition, which was not expected to be of long continuance. There were several men of literary talent among the marauders, who have written accounts of the proceedings, which have the most romantic interest. These were Basil Ringrose, Barty Sharp, William Dampier—who, though a common seaman, was endowed with great observation, and a talent for description—and Lionel Wafer, a surgeon provIdently engaged by the buccaneers.

It was on the 16th of April that the expedition passed over from Golden Island and landed in Darien, each man provided with four cakes of bread called "dough-boys," with a fusil, a pistol and a hanger. They began their arduous march, marshaled in divisions, each with its commander and distinguishing flag. Many Darien Indians came to supply them with provisions, and to keep them company as confederates. Amongst these were two chiefs, who went by the names of Captain Andreas and Captain Antonio.

After enduring tremendous fatigues, the party at length reached Santa Maria, a town situated on a river which falls into the South Sea. This place they plundered, and put to death numbers of the inhabitants. As their booty was not great, they resolved on pushing onwards by the river to the ocean. On the 17th of April the expedition embarked, and fell down the river to the Gulf of San Miguel, which they did not reach until the following morning, owing to a flood-tide. They were now fairly in the South Sea! The prophecy of the Spaniards was accomplished, and the buccaneers looked across that magnificent expanse of waters with sanguine hope. On the 19th of April they entered the vast bay of Panama, and captured at one of the islands a Spanish vessel of thirty tons, on board of which 180 of the buccaneers immediately threw themselves, overjoyed to be relieved from the cramped and crowded state they had endured in the canoes—though of a certainty even now, so many men on board so small a vessel could leave little room for comfort.

It would be tiresome to recite minutely the adventures of these marauders. By means of their boats or canoes, they had the boldness to capture several vessels lying in the bay of Panama, and in less than a week from their appearance on the coast, they possessed a tolerable well-equipped fleet. In the battles by which they had captured these ships, they lost a number of men; still this did not discourage them. They chose a new commander, one Richard Sawkins, in the room of their deceased leader, and prepared for a cruise. Panama was, luckily, now well fortified, and held out against their attacks. After staying ten days here to no purpose, they retired to the island of Taboga, in the neighborhood. Here they stoped nearly a fortnight, in expectation of the arrival of a rich ship from Lima. The ship came not, but several other vessels fell into their hands, by which they obtained nearly 60,000 dollars in specie, 12,000 sacks of flour, 2,000 jars of wine, a quantity of brandy, sugar, sweetmeats, poultry, and other provisions, some gunpowder, shot, etc. Among their prisoners were a number of unfortunate negro slaves, which tempted the Spanish merchants of Panama to go to the buccaneers, and to buy as many of the slaves as they were inclined to sell. The merchants paid two hundred pieces of eight for every negro, and they sold to the buccaneers all such stores and commodities as they stood in need of.

Ringrose, one of the buccaneers, relates that during these communications the Governor of Panama sent to demand of their leader "Why, during a time of peace between England and Spain, Englishmen should come into those seas to commit injury? and from whom they had commission so to do?" Sawkins replied: "That he and his companions came to assist their friend, the King of Darien, (the said chief Andreas,) who was the rightful Lord of Panama, and all the country thereabouts. That as they had come so far, it was reasonable that they should receive some satisfaction for their trouble; and if the Governor would send to them 500 pieces of eight for each man, and 1000 for each commander, and would promise not any farther to annoy the Darien Indians, their allies, that then the buccaneers would desist from hostilities, and go quietly about their business." The Governor could scarcely be expected to comply with these moderate demands.

Tired of waiting for the rich ship from Lima, the buccaneers in a short time sailed on a cruise, determined to take whatever fell in their way. Generalizing the account of their expeditions, it may be stated that they, from time to time, fell in with and captured both richly and poorly laden vessels; but quarrels among them about the division of the spoil were incessant, and they lost to one another, by gambling, their hard-won plunder. Diminished in numbers by their encounters to a crew of seventy men, under a new leader, Barty Sharp, they at length bethought themselves of returning to the Atlantic. While in this mind, they had the "good fortune," as they termed it, to pick up three valuable prizes.

The first ship was called the San Pedro, with a lading of cocoa-nuts, and 21,000 pieces of eight in chests, and 16,000 in bags, besides plate. The money in bags, besides all the loose plunder was immediately divided, each man receiving 234 pieces of eight. The money in chests was reserved for a future division. Their second prize was a packet from Panama bound to Callao, by which they learned that in Panama it was believed that all the buccaneers had returned overland to the West Indies. The third was a ship called the San Rosario, which made a bold resistance, and did not submit till her captain was killed. She came from Callao, with a cargo of wine, brandy, oil, and fruit, and had in her as much money as yielded ninety-four dollars to each buccaneer. Through their ignorance of metals they missed a much greater booty. There were 700 pigs of plate, which they mistook for tin, on account of its not being refined and fitted for coining. They only took one of the 700 pigs, and two-thirds of this they melted down into bullets, and otherwise squandered away. After having beaten along the coast, coming at times to anchor, making a few discoveries, and giving names to islands and bays, but taking no prizes, they sailed early in November from the shores of Patagonia. Their navigation hence was more than could be imagined; it was like the journey of travelers by night in a strange country without a guide. The weather being very stormy, they were afraid to venture through the Straits of Magellan, but ran to the south to go round Terra del Fuego. Spite of tempests, clouds, darkness, and immense icebergs, they doubled in safety the redoubtable Cape Horn, after a cruise of nearly twelve months' duration.

These ocean-robbers had the fortune to be left in quiet possession of their spoils. Two or three were tried and hanged; but on this, as on other occasions, the bulk of the party were never called to account, or if they were, they found means by bribes to escape a well-deserved punishment. Some had even the impudence to write and publish narratives of their piratical expeditions; and a sort of apology for their crimes has been hazarded in modern times, on account of their discoveries in the South Seas.

The foregoing sketch is presented with the view of giving our readers an idea of the lawless state of society at a period as late as the close of the seventeenth century, and, therefore, of showing in contrast the improvement which has since taken place in national manners. For-

Mr. Llaguno firmly believes that had it not been for the friendly interference of Mr. Belt, an old acquaintance of his, that he would have been hung.

The consequence of this renewal of distinctive laws for foreigners residing in this State is easily foreseen. The most immediate will be revenge. These poor creatures, relying on American justice, and the treaties with their governments, came to California to labor in the mines. They are driven out, persecuted, and compelled either to starve or rob. Many of them will unite to attack innocent and unwary teamsters and travelers, and our journals will be filled with accounts of murders and robberies. The next consequence will be a return of all the good men among the foreigners to their native countries, to create a feeling of hostility to Americans and free institutions.

Mr. Llaguno is well known to some of the most respectable merchants of San Francisco and Stockton, and has in his possession the most flattering testimonials from prominent men in Mazatlan and San Francisco, of his character as an honest and industrious man. He has arrived here with nothing but the clothes he has on, having been compelled to sell his watch and abandon every thing to the rapacity of the Americans. He is on his way to San Francisco, to lay the whole matter before the Spanish Consul.

The Stockton Journal of June 20 says:

The following note, without date, we have received from Quartzburg, through Todd's Express:

"A party arrived in this vicinity this morning, and gave Mexicans and other foreign miners orders to leave this county by to-morrow at twelve o'clock. The Americans who compose the party are from Mariposa. They give no cause whatever for the proceeding."

Mr. Joseph Hill, of Hill's Ferry, on the Merced, who left Mariposa on Friday and arrived here yesterday, has given us the following information: A number of Spaniards and a few French and Kanakas, had some mining claims on the Mariposa, their right to which was disputed by the American miners in the neighborhood, who ordered them off. The foreigners, headed by a few Frenchmen, challenged the Americans to meet them at 2 o'clock on Thursday, and Mr. Hill was informed that at the appointed time there were 700 foreigners and 500 Americans under arms at Mariposita. We think, however, that the number was exaggerated. A parley was held, and the foreigners agreed to abandon the place. Some twenty or thirty were taken prisoners, but were afterwards released. Subsequently all the Spaniards, French, Kanakas and Chinese, were driven from the county.

Railroad Scheme.—A meeting of the citizens of Sacramento was held on the 26th June, for the purpose of organizing a company to construct a railroad from that place to Merysville. Several thousand dollars were subscribed and a board of directors elected.

From the Mines.—The news from the mines is encouraging, although operations at many places are retarded for want of water.

Two Irishmen, who had not been in California more than two weeks, dug up at a canon, Yuba river, a lump of gold weighing eighty-five pounds! A correspondent of the Herald saw the specimen packed on a mule.

The Relief Train.—The command of the Relief Train has been transferred to Gen. Estell, who has appointed George Wilkes, late of the New York Police Gazette, his aid.

Defalcations at Sacramento.—Large defalcations in the city government at Sacramento have been discovered. A letter in the Placer Times and Transcript says:

I hasten to inform you of the result of the investigations of the Council, about the affairs of our city. The committee has found, as I am told by reliable persons, a deficit against Hardenbergh of $10,000; against the City Treasurer McCracken, $17,000; against L. Curtis, City Clerk, $15,000. Curtis has promised to come up this week with cattle to sell so as to pay arrears. On a certain day in April, I believe the 8th, no entry was made in the books for licenses, whereas it is known that one was issued on that day to a peddler for $50. During another month, entries for some 200 and odd dollars were made, whereas there had been paid over $1200. Collections of fees for city taxes to the round sum of $3000 and over, which Mr. Curtis has kept for his own benefit, which should have been paid to the city, as the City Collector is not entitled to them, and a number of other precious items are detected—God only knows how many not found out—many to be, perhaps, numbers not to be.

Masonic Celebration.—The anniversary of St. John the Baptist was celebrated by the Masonic fraternity of San Diego on the 24th June, with a procession, addresses, supper, etc. The affair was a great novelty to the natives of the place.

Lower California.—The San Diego Herald of June 27 says:

A Mexican gentleman from the Southern country, informed us yesterday that Melendrez, the head of the insurrectionary force, is going it with a high hand in Santo Tomas. He has [illegible] and raised [illegible]

Arrival of the Falcon.

The steamer Falcon, Lieut. Rogers, U. S. N., commanding, arrived Monday from Aspinwall, the 23d, and San Juan the 20th ult, bringing California dates to the 1st of July.

Lieut. Rogers reports that the steamship Columbia, from San Francisco, arrived at Panama, on the 20th ult., with eighty-eight passengers, and the mails of the 1st of July.

The Falcon brought twenty-two of her passengers to this city. The rest took passage on the Sierra Nevada, for New York.

Lieut. Rogers says that everything was very dull on the Isthmus. The Falcon put into San Juan de Nicaragua for passengers.

The following vessels were in port at Aspinwall on the 23d: ship Afghan and bark Voluntoer, discharging coal—the latter to sail for New York on the 25th ult.

Arnaud Chapoulior, a passenger, belonging to New Orleans, died on the evening of the 27th ult.

Difficulty in the Mines.—Expulsion of Foreigners.—The San Francisco Herald publishes a letter, dated at Stockton, June 27th, which says:

A Spanish gentleman, named Don Jose de Llaguno, arrived this morning from Mariposa, and states that he and about fifty other foreigners, comprising Spaniards, Chinamen, Manilamen and Mexicans, were forcibly expelled on the 25th of this month, from the claims they had been working for the last five months, and which were just beginning to pay. He had erected machinery at a cost of $1300, and had to abandon all to save his life.

It seems a meeting was held on the 18th inst. at the crossing of the Agua Frio and Fresno roads, at which it was resolved to expel all foreigners from the district, and under no other authority than the resolutions passed at this meeting, have these poor inoffensive men been forced to abandon their works, and Mr. Llaguno's life spared him on condition of his immediately leaving the State of California.

The first step of these aggressors was to demand a surrender of their arms from the foreigners, and their having refused to comply was the pretext for driving them away, although the sheriff was in their favor. Mr. Llaguno brings the following passport.

"The bearer of this has been under arms to resist the lawn of American miners, and his life and liberty have been granted him with the express understanding that he leaves the State of California. Americans are requested not to molest him on his way out of the State.

"By order of a company of miners commanded by Capt. Reynolds.

"Mariposa county, June 25, 1852."

He also brings the following:

He furthermore states, that they prohibited any one from furnishing the foreigners with supplies of any description; and one trader who had always furnished them with provisions was also forced to quit—and an American at that.

Mr. Llaguno is well known to some of the most respectable merchants of San Francisco and Stockton, and has in his possession the most flattering testimonials from prominent men in Mazatlan and San Francisco, of his character as an honest and industrious man. He has arrived here with nothing but the clothes he has on, having been compelled to sell his watch and abandon every thing to the rapacity of the Americans. He is on his way to San Francisco, to lay the whole matter before the Spanish Consul.

The Stockton Journal of June 29 says:

The following note, without date, we have received from Quartzburg, through Todd's Express:

"A party arrived in this vicinity this morning, and gave Mexicans and other foreign miners orders to leave this county by to-morrow at twelve o'clock. The Americans who compose the party are from Mariposa. They give no cause whatever for the proceeding."

Mr. Joseph Hill, of Hill's Ferry, on the Merced, who left Mariposa on Friday and arrived here yesterday, has given us the following information: A number of Spaniards and a few French and Kanakas, had some mining claims on the Mariposa, their right to which was disputed by the American miners in the neighborhood, who ordered them off. The foreigners, headed by a few Frenchmen, challenged the Americans to meet them at 2 o'clock on Thursday, and Mr. Hill was informed that at the appointed time there were 700 foreigners and 500 Americans under arms at Mariposita. We think, however, that the number was exaggerated. A parley was held, and the foreigners agreed to abandon the place. Some twenty or thirty were taken prisoners, but were afterwards released. Subsequently all the Spaniards, French, Kanakas and Chinese, were driven from the county.

Railroad Scheme.—A meeting of the citizens of Sacramento was held on the 26th June, for the purpose of organizing a company to construct a railroad from that place to Merysville. Several thousand dollars were subscribed and a board of directors elected.

From the Mines.—The news from the mines is encouraging, although operations at many places are retarded for want of water.

Two Irishmen, who had not been in California more than two weeks, dug up at a canon, Yuba river, a lump of gold weighing eighty-five pounds! A correspondent of the Herald saw the specimen packed on a mule.

The Relief Train.—The command of the Relief Train has been transferred to Gen. Estell, who has appointed George Wilkes, late of the New York Police Gazette, his aid.

Defalcations at Sacramento.—Large defalcations in the city government at Sacramento have been discovered. A letter in the Placer Times and Transcript says:

I hasten to inform you of the result of the investigations of the Council, about the affairs of our city. The committee has found, as I am told by reliable persons, a deficit against Hardenbergh of $10,000; against the City Treasurer McCracken, $17,000; against L. Curtis, City Clerk, $15,000. Curtis has promised to come up this week with cattle to sell so as to pay arrears. On a certain day in April, I believe the 8th, no entry was made in the books for licenses, whereas it is known that one was issued on that day to a peddler for $50. During another month, entries for some 200 and odd dollars were made, whereas there had been paid over $1200. Collections of fees for city taxes to the round sum of $3000 and over, which Mr. Curtis has kept for his own benefit, which should have been paid to the city, as the City Collector is not entitled to them, and a number of other precious items are detected—God only knows how many not found out—many to be, perhaps, numbers not to be.

Masonic Celebration.—The anniversary of St. John the Baptist was celebrated by the Masonic fraternity of San Diego on the 24th June, with a procession, addresses, supper, etc. The affair was a great novelty to the natives of the place.

Lower California.—The San Diego Herald of June 27 says:

A Mexican gentleman from the Southern country, informed us yesterday that Melendrez, the head of the insurrectionary force, is going it with a high hand in Santo Tomas. He has [illegible] and raised [illegible]

Old Drinking Habits in Ireland.—If on any occasion a guest left the room, bits of paper were dropped into his glass, intimating the number of rounds the bottle had gone; and on his return he was obliged to swallow a glass for each, under the penalty of so many glasses of salt and water. It was the practice of some to have decanters with round bottoms, like a modern soda-water bottle, the only contrivance in which the could stand being at the head of the table, before the host. Stopping the bottle was thus rendered impossible, and every one was obliged to fill his glass at once, and pass the bottle to his neighbor, on the peril of upsetting the contents on the table. A still more common practice was to knock the stems off the glasses with a knife, so that they must be emptied so fast as they are filled, as they could not stand. Some times the guests, as they sat down, pulled off their shoes, which were taken out of the room; and the emptied bottles were broken outside of the door, so that no one could pass out till the carouse was over. War.—Voltaire thus expresses himself on the subject of war: "A hundred thousand mad animals, whose heads are covered with hats, advance to kill or be killed by the like number of their fellow-mortals, covered with turbans. By this strange procedure, they want, at best, to decide whether a tract of land, to which none of them lays any claim, shall belong to a certain man whom they call Sultan, or to another whom they call Czar, neither of whom ever saw, or will see, the spot so furiously contested for; and very few of those creatures, who thus mutually butcher each other, ever behold the animal for whom they cut each other's throats! From time immemorial this has been the way of mankind almost over all the earth. What an excess of madness is this! And how deservedly might a Superior Being crush to atoms this earthly ball, the bloody nest of such ridiculous murderers."

The New Jersey and Delaware Peach Crop.—It is stated there will be a very light crop of peaches in New Jersey this year; and in the vicinity of Delaware city the crop, it is alleged, will be only about half the usual quantity. The Wilmington Republican, however, says that in that section of the State there will be a full crop. Some 60,000 baskets were sent from Delaware City last season, and it is thought as many will be sent the present season from all appearances. From 50 cents to $1 is expected to be realized per basket, and the buyboldz, it is reported, are unwilling to engage in advance even at $1 a basket. The early fruit will be in market in a week or ten days.

The Lawyer's Sick Mother.—This story is related of a lawyer who has since attained eminence in his profession. A case in which he was engaged as counsel for the defendant came on at a certain day. As he was insufficiently prepared, he was very anxious to have the case postponed a few days, that he might have further time for this purpose. Unfortunately, there was a great press of business, and he knew that this motion would be overruled, unless some extraordinary reason was alleged. Under these circumstances, he bethought himself of an expedient. Rising with his handkerchief to his face, he addressed the Judge in accents of great apparent emotion:

"May it please your Honor, I have just been informed that my mother is at the point of death. My emotions are too great for me to proceed in this case. I move that it be postponed until day after to-morrow."

The request would, of course, have been granted by the Court, whose sympathies were strongly excited in his behalf; but at this moment the discomfiture of the lawyer, and the amusement of the audience, the shrill voice of his mother was heard issuing from the gallery:

"Isabod! Ichabod! how often have I whipped you for lying?"

The case wasn't postponed, nor was it gained by the afflicted counsel.

Connecticut Banking Law.—The General Banking Law passed at the recent session of the Connecticut Legislature, is published in the New Haven papers. It provides that associations for banking purposes shall consist of not less than twenty-five residents of the State, with a capital of not less than $50,000, or more than $1,000,000, but to be paid in before commencing operations and the remainder within one year. The circulating notes are to be countersigned in the office of the Treasurer of the State, and issued to the associations, upon the deposit of the stock of the United States, either of the New England States, the States of New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Virginia and Kentucky; the cities of New York and Boston, or of any incorporated city in the State of Connecticut; all such securities to be taken not above par, and to be one equal to one per cent. stock. Upon non-payment of the notes on presentation, they may be protested; and if not paid within ten days thereafter, with costs, the Treasurer must sell out the stock, and call in the circulation; the holds of the notes being entitled to 12 per cent. interest until they are paid. The Treasurer and school Commissioner of the State may require additional security to be deposited, or part of the circulation to be withdrawn, by giving due notice to the parties. The stockholders are made individually liable for all the debts of the Apportionment of Representation.—Under the act of Congress, which was recently finally passed, the whole number of Representatives will be two hundred and thirty-four, distributed as follows, viz: Maine 6, New Hampshire 3, Vermont 3, Massachusetts 11, Rhode Island 2, Connecticut 4, New York 33, New Jersey 5, Pennsylvania 25, Delaware 1, Maryland 6, Ohio 21, South Carolina 6, Georgia 8, Florida 1, Alabama 7, Mississippi 5, Louisiana 4, Virginia 12, North Carolina 8, Tennessee 10, Kentucky 10, Missouri 7, Arkansas 2, Indiana 11, Illinois 9, Michigan 4, Wisconsin 3, Iowa 2, Texas 2, California 2. Total 234. The whole number of Presidential electors—adding the 62 Senators—will therefore be 296, making 149 necessary to a choice.

Minors may be Marines.—Judge Thompson, of Philadelphia, on Saturday, the 24th ult., decided the case of a youth named Engle, a recruit in the marine service, (whose father applied for his discharge on the ground that he was a minor at the time of his enlistment,) by remanding the recruit to the custody of Major Harris. The act of Congress declaring the enlistment of minors unlawful, relates only to the army. The English common law governs the enlistments in the naval service, and it has been held in England that a minor may contract an obligation to serve the State, which cannot be set aside by the power of the parent. In such cases the parental authority is suspended during the period of service, although not destroyed.

Railroad Accident.—On the evening of the 29th ult., a train of cars on the Hudson River Railroad ran off the track a few miles above the city of Hudson, and the locomotive, tender, baggage car and one passenger car were precipitated into the river. A large number of passengers were seriously injured, and it is astonishing that no one was killed. The water at the place where the accident occurred is twenty-five feet deep, and had not the passenger car lodged on top of the locomotive and baggage car all the passengers must inevitably have been drowned. Carelessness on the part of the switch tender is said to have been the cause of the accident.

Loss of the British bark Charlotte.—The British bark Charlotte, Captain Rea, hence for Liverpool, cleared from this port on the 27th ult., with a cargo of 1084 bales of cotton and 2000 staves. The Charlotte was towed over the bar by the towboat Ocean on Saturday last, at 12 o'clock M., when she was discovered to be on fire in the maintop, and every exertion to extinguish the flames proved useless. The captain and crew abandoned her and arrived in the city yesterday. Captain Rea states that when he left the ship the masts were all gone and deck falling in. There were several towboats about her endeavoring to save something from the wreck. Captain Rea thinks that if they scuttle her, in all probability, some few bales of cotton in the lower hold would be saved. It is supposed that the vessel is insured in Liverpool. The fire was communicated to the maintop by sparks from the chimneys of the towboat.

From Santa Fe.—Dr. Hammond, Surgeon in the U. S. Army, arrived in St. Louis on the 26th ult., and left the same day for Harrisburgh, Pa. He brings but little news. Col. Sumner, now acting as the military commander, and also as civil Governor of New Mexico, has formed treaties with all the Indian tribes, and peace and security was expected. The two bands of the Apaches were the last to treat, but the establishment of forts in their territories, and in the country of the Navajos, has produced very favorable results. The last treaty was concluded but a very few days before the departure of the mail. Colonel Sumner was in Santa Fe, actively pressing forward his plans in the various sections of the Territory. On the way in, Dr. Hammond met a very large number of Camanches and Kiowas, and received no molestation from them.

An Item for Geologists.—A letter from Lake Superior says that a wooden skid was lately found twenty feet below the surface, upon which was resting a mass of copper weighing more than five tons. Two copper tools and several hammers of stone, together with coal and ashes of wood, were lying around it, as fresh to all appearances as though they had been made last year; and yet there was six feet of vegetable so

THE CATHOLIC AUTOMATON.

A rich mechanician retired from business, and took a country house. The Cure of the place, whose church stood hard by the garden of the new parishioner, came to call upon him, and after the accustomed introductory speeches, the conversation took the following turn:

"I hope," said the Cure, "to have in you not only a good neighbor, but a good parishioner."

"I, for my part, do not share that hope."

"How! will you not come to mass?"

"For what purpose; since you celebrate it in Latin, and I do not understand a word of that language?"

"Never mind that, it suffices to hear it."

"Oh, if to hear it be all, the thing is soon done."

"Of course. But you will also do well to come to vespers."

"I shall not understand a word of them."

"Still, you will be present."

"So be it. Thus, by listening to mass and assisting at vespers on Sundays, I shall become a good parishioner?"

"Oh, but during the week you will also have duties to fulfill."

"What are they?"

"Why, for example, you must not eat meat on Wednesdays, Fridays and Saturdays."

"I do not see what good that will do my soul or my body—it will make me neither fairer nor holier."

"Never mind that, the church enjoins it."

"I hope, then, that three days in the week will satisfy you, and that you will leave me the other four."

"Without doubt; except indeed the forty days in Lent, the Ember Week, and the vigils at which seasons abstinence and fasting are incumbent."

"But what connection is there between these fasts and holiness of heart and life?"

"I have already told you that the church enjoins them."

"I own that I fear often to fail in my obedience to the church."

"In that case the church will not deal hardly with you; she will cancel your faults at the cost of a certain number of Paternosters and Ave Marias."

"But surely, sir, thus to repeat the same words twenty or thirty times, is a very sure way to my them without attending to them; it is to degrade ourselves below a parrot, which at least thinks about the sound it utters, even if it does not understand it."

"You constantly revert to your fixed ideas of thinking, feeling and understanding. The main point is the doing, executing, accomplishing. Whether you think about them or not, your Ave Marias are no less actually repeated."

"Good! good!"

"And besides," said the Cure, looking down demurely, "there is in every parish a pious man, whose prayers may be substituted for yours; and masses——"

"What! Latin words, rapidly chanted by an inattentive priest; can these have a certain efficacy in the matter of my salvation?"

"Certainly they can. The rapidity has nothing to do with it, nor has the inattention; the one thing necessary is, that the priest's primary intention should be to do what the church does; and provided that he do not look off the book, or omit one word of the service, he may get on as fast as he likes. The work accomplishes itself alone. In fact, our grand principle is just this: the value of an action depends upon its material accomplishment, and not upon the moral dignity of the person who accomplishes it; or, as our theological treatises express it, 'Ex opere operato, et non ex opere operantis;' which means that the value of a sacrament depends upon the action done, and not upon him who does it. Here is a case in point, quoted by one of our doctors: a criminal priest, being pursued by order of his bishop, took refuge in a baker's shop, and there, by way of revenge, he consecrated all the dough that it contained. Do you know what happened in consequence?"

"No."

"All that dough was transformed into the body of Jesus Christ."

"What! at a baker's?"

"Yes."

"By the hands of a priest who was a criminal?"

"Yes."

"In spite of the spirit of revenge which led him to think of such a consecration?"

"Yes, yes, yes—our theologians affirm it."

"And who are those theologians?"

"Those whose doctrines are taught in our colleges."

"Here again, I have nothing to say in reply—and indeed, I begin now to understand the spirit of the church. For instance, this explains to me the virtue of baptismal water, of wax tapers, etc."

"Exactly so."

"Well then, sir, I must tell you, that I have a cousin in England."

"What! In England? he is a Protestant."

"Of course."

"You must convert him."

"That would not be very easy; and, indeed, I was just going to tell you that I have heard him laugh at Catholicism a hundred times, and advance somewhat cogent arguments against its doctrines."

"In that case there is another method of conversion."

"What is that?"

"Look here, get this medal sewn inside his coat, without his knowledge, and be sure that sooner or later he will feel its good effects."

"In converting him?"

"Yes."

"Without his knowledge?"

"Certainly."

"But, in order to change one's opinion, one must think!"

"I tell you, once more, that the medal operates of itself, and that the main point is, that it should operate, and not that your cousin should think!"

"In this case I have no more to say. I own myself conquered."

"And your family, my dear neighbor, will, I hope, follow your example."

"Oh, as for my family, they will be sure to do as I do."

"Thus, then, you are converted."

"We shall see. Good morning, sir." And without waiting for an answer, the mechanician withdrew. As for the Cure, who, during this conversation, had been passing a rosary through the fingers of one hand, and with the other carelessly lifting, every now and then, a medal to his lips—he, now withdrew, perfectly convinced that all this had acted ex opere operato.

After this conversation, days, weeks, months passed without the mechanician availing himself of his nearness to the church to go to mass or confession. Nevertheless the Cure had not lost all hope, for his neighbor had sent to ask him for a medal, and in the meanwhile was spending his time in fabricating a master piece of mechanism, placed in a pavilion, at the end of his garden, built up against the church. This piece of mechanism was one of those men made of wood, iron and leather, which, being set in motion by springs and counterpoises, move and speak like living beings. It was, in short, a first-rate automaton. The Cure came a second time to visit his neighbor; the conversation again turned upon religion.

"Well, my dear sir, you are not often to be seen at mass; you have not yet been once to confession; and moreover, I see the butcher enter your gate daily. I thought you had promised me that you would fulfil your religious duties."

"Sir, I always perform my promises."

"What! you have heard masses and assisted at vespers on Sundays?"

"Yes."

"In my church."

"Yes."

"You have confessed and performed penances?"

"Yes, yes. I have done all that you required."

But how then happens it, that I, the only priest in the parish, have not been aware of it?"

"You shall soon learn; come along with me."

The Cure followed his neighbor to the end of the garden, and there found himself face to face with a magnificent automaton, of five feet six inches, kneeling on a vesper-chair, with its ear close to the wall of partition between the pavilion and the church.

"What means this?" asked the Cure.

"It means that this automaton hears mass in my place each time you celebrate it in your church."

"You are jesting."

"By no means. Did you not tell me, that to understand mattered little, and that to hear was enough? Well, then, I can assure you that my automaton and I alike knew nothing at all about Latin. The words of the mass strike upon my ear without entering my mind, or touching my heart, and in the very same way they strike upon the ear of my automaton, without entering into or touching his mind and heart."

"But——"

"Wait a moment; this is not all, allow me to push in this knob."

The mechanician pressed a spring, and instantly the lips of the automaton moved, and these words proceeded from them: "Deus in adjutorium."

"What!" said the priest, "he chants vespers?"

"Certainly, and he does it in my stead."

"But it is not the same thing at all——"

"Excuse me; for my automaton chants in my stead exactly as I should chant myself; that is to say, without understanding or feeling any thing whatsoever; he makes a noise, and I should do no more. You see I remember your grand principle: Ex opere operato. All depends upon the accomplishment of an action, and nothing upon the moral dignity of him who accomplishes it."

"But, sir, even if this held good with regard to mass and vespers, that is not enough, for your butcher's daily visits convince me that you neither fast nor refrain from eating meat."

"You are mistaken; my automaton fasts daily, for he never eats any thing at all, and consequently always refrains from meat."

"But it is you, sir, you yourself, and not your automaton, who ought to fast and abstain from meat, and, in case of forgetting these duties, to perform penance."

"As you shall see, all that is provided for." The mechanician pressed a second spring, and the automaton began to repeat an Ave Maria, gratia plena, from beginning to end, passing a chaplet through its hands the same while, and doing this no less than ten times."

"But, sir, you do not think——"

"On the contrary, it is the automaton that does not think. Have you not told me that thought was not necessary? Have I not seen a hundred times, a rosary told by devotees who were thinking about other things, looking in different directions, and even listening to a conversation? Is it not in the case of such a devotee as in that of my automaton! Ex opere operato."

"But what, then, have you done with the medal you sent to ask from me?"

"Here it is; I have sewn it in the trowsers of the automaton, in order to convert my cousin in England."

"But again you are jesting."

"Not at all. Since the medal operates of itself, it can operate here as well as in London; and since it can convert a man who wears it without his knowledge, my automaton may very well stand in my cousin's place, for I assure you he has not the least notion that he is wearing it."

"But at least it is essential that the person who sews the medal upon another, should do it with intention."

"So I thought, and hence in sewing it I had much intention; it is the same thing as

"My dear neighbor, I see that it is useless to hope to bring you to a better way of thinking; but at least think of your family."

"Sir, in constructing my automaton, I have thought of my wife and children as well as myself. My automaton replaces us all; its continual fasts suffice for my whole family. I wind it up every night; it goes twenty-four hours without stopping, and like the most pious devotee, repeats mechanically masses, vespers, prayers, and all the rest."

"Well then, I catch you in your own words. In order to say mass, it is necessary to be not only a devotee, but also a priest."

"That need be no objection; my automaton is an automaton Cure. If your criminal and revengeful priest was able to change dough into God—that is to say, if the evil sentiment existing in his heart offered no impediment to transubstantiation, still less will the absence of all impediment impede it. If the mass of a wicked priest is valid, why should not that of a wooden priest be so? Thus, my automaton not only says mass for me and my family, but it is capable of doing so for all the sinners in the village."

"What do you mean?"

"I mean this—that I have understood that one priest could depute another priest to perform the masses he himself was engaged to perform, and that thus, without knowing any thing about the sinner in question, the officiating minister no less effected his salvation. Thus I hope, sir, that you may be induced to make over to my automaton the completion of some of your masses."

Not a bad idea, thought the Cure. "Nonsense!" said he, aloud. "And besides, to catch you in your own arguments, I may tell you, that your automaton, even were it able to replace you, could do nothing towards representing your family."

"You are much mistaken. I have baptized my automaton by all the names both of my wife and of my children. It is called John, Baptist, Peter, Francis, Julius, Eleanor, Adolphus, Durant."

"But one never baptizes wood!"

"You often baptize iron."

"How so?"

"Thus you baptize bells."

"But in order to baptize, it is necessary to be a priest."

"Not so. Your church affirms that baptism is valid, even when administered by a heretic; and every day it is customary for midwives to sprinkle new-born babes; and you say that that shuts them out of limbo."

"In spite of all that you can say, I repeat, that your automaton does not think."

"Nor does the priest, who rapidly runs through masses."

"It does not understand."

"Nor does the worshipper, who listens to the mass, without understanding one word of it."

"It does not feel."

"Nor does the devotee, who tells her beads half-asleep."

"It does not feel any love."

"Nor does the man who fasts and refrains from eating meat, without having a converted heart."

"It does not believe."

"Nor does my cousin, who was to be rendered believing in spite of himself, by the influence of your medal. Nor do the baptized bell, the holy water, and the consecrated taper. All of them, like my automaton, act on the principle—Ex opere operato. All those people and all those things are put in motion, without thinking or feeling, and their actions are good, you tell me, even when performed mechanically."

"But, sir, admitting that the duties of the mass, of prayer, and of penances, do accomplish themselves mechanically; at least, there is always a primary intention in the person who performs them; even if he does not think of them while doing them, he does so before he begins them. There may not be sustained attention, it is true, but there has been, at first, an intention of doing what the church does, and that is enough."

"Very well, reverend sir: and now I assure you, that if there has not been sustained attention on the part of my automaton, there has been in me a first intention each time that I pressed the spring that sets the machinery going. Thus both priest and devotee have had, in the first instance, intentions of working out their salvation, and that of others, and afterwards they have allowed their feet, their hands, and their tongues, to operate mechanically. Well, I have done the very same. I have had the intention of working my salvation, and that of others; my intention set my finger in motion, my finger pressed the spring, and the spring once pressed—with intention, be it understood—the automaton does the rest."

The Cure was silent.

"But enough of this," said the mechanician. "I hope you have understood my purpose. I never wished, reverend sir, to convert you to my faith, you who sought to win me over to your side. I have wished to prove to you the absurdity of your principle, Ex opere operato. I have wished to make you perceive the real worth of a church, where all proceeds passively, under the impetus given by a spring; where you believe, not because you have examined, but because you are told to believe; where you act, not spontaneously, but because you are driven to act—not by love, but by compulsion. Yes, the clergy of the church of Rome is a great automaton, where faith and action are communicated as motion is to a machine. The Pope says, 'No salvation out of the pale of the church;' and the bishops—mere echos of his voice—repeat, 'No salvation out of the pale of the church;' and the Cure says after them, 'No salvation out of the pale of the church.' The Popes, formerly Arians, are Trinitarians at present; and the bishops, formerly Arians, become at present Trinitarians in the same way that the Cures, formerly Arians, now profess themselves Trinitarians. If the Pope lift hand or foot, the bishops lift hand or foot, the Cures lift hand or foot. Is this life? No: it is mechanism! Are these men? No: they are automatons! Ah! reverend sir, I have no more confidence than you have in my compound of wood and iron; but in constructing this machine, I have sought to convince you that you ought no more to trust to mechanical acts, performed by hands of flesh, than to those performed by hands of wood. For my part, I believe that, in itself, an action has no value apart from that which feeling gives. Thus, St. Paul says, 'Though I give all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, I am nothing.' (1 Cor. xiii. 3.) In short, if you want a decisive, a Divine sentence, listen to that of Jesus Christ himself:—'Not that which enteroth into, but that which cometh out of the mouth, defileth a man.' (Matt. xv. 11.) You see that it is possible to put meat into our mouths without being defiled thereby. But would you knew what it is that proceeds from man and defiles him? Jesus shall give the reply:—'Murders, adulteries, thefts, false witnesses, blasphemies.' (Matt. xv. 20.) These are the works of which man is capable, this is what he can accomplish; and hence his works—far from saving—destroy him!"

"In this way, then, all men are lost by their works?"

"Without doubt, they are. But if they feel this, they can, at least, be saved by Jesus Christ."

"Thus, then, according to your system, as well as mine, man is saved by another than himself?"

"Yes; but by another who has felt, loved, suffered! Saved by God dying on the cross, and not by the mechanical performances of a priest. The salvation which Jesus confers fills me with gratitude; that which you profess to accomplish by your careless hands, your thoughtless lips, prompted by your corrupt heart, inspires nothing but disgust. Then I am told that Jesus so loved me as to pardon me, and confer upon me heaven. Then I feel, on my part, that I love Him, and that loving Him, I am led to do His will. But you, who look for salvation from passive actions, material ceremonies, from a body without a soul, you can but remain unmoved after such mummeries, or else grow proud of having performed them, since, in your eyes, they rank as good works. Christ gives me life, and the gift appeals to my generosity; while you sell your services, and that also only awakes my avarice. A mechanical work, done for me by a priest, cheats my conscience without changing my conduct; done by myself it excites my self-complacency, and makes me forget that which it stands in lieu of, to wit—holiness of heart. Yes, here is the great danger of your mechanical performances—they leave the man as impure as ever; they acquit his conscience without quieting his passions. By putting the material actions in the room of the spiritual impulse, you kill morality, and you replace it by mere outward movements, mere sounds, which have only an appearance of morality. Man becomes, beneath your hand, a mere corpse, inflated with air, or stuffed with straw—seeming alive, but being dead! Ah! leave man to himself: let him feel his sins, let him suffer from them: let him cry and weep till the very anguish of remorse bring him to the feet of Jesus Christ. Give him the Bible—that Word of God himself—and let him learn in its pages that a Saviour has died for him, pardons him his sins, gives him heaven, ensures to him immortality! And he may see that the man who believes this, will do something more than mere mechanical works; better than burning wax tapers, gabbling Latin, sprinkling holy water, refusing meat on Saturday, to ask a double portion when Sunday comes.

"Deeply moved by the sacrifice of his God and Saviour dying to obtain heaven for him, that man will feel a necessity of imitating his Master, of sacrificing himself as He did, of loving God, and loving his brothers also; and that love will produce works far better, far holier, than those of this automaton—this faithful copy of your Roman Catholics."

I do not know whether the Cure understood these words spoken by his Protestant neighbor, but I have only to hope that the reader will know how to understand them; and if, as yet, their meaning be somewhat obscure, let him seek for a fuller comprehension of it by the assiduous study of his Bible, and by fervent prayer to God.

PRIVILEGES OF THE SABBATH.

The Sabbath is the day when you may sit down to the Bible without fear of disturbance. It is the day when, with our sinless progenitors, you may take the tour of Paradise, and listen to the anthems of a newly-created world. It is the day when, alongside of Enoch, you may feed the flame of devotion, and try to divine the wonder, and imbibe the ardor of a walk with God. It is the day when, according to your various mood, you may mourn with Abraham at Machpelah, or meditate with Isaac in the fields of Mamre, or go down into Egypt to view Joseph in all his glory. It is the day when you may bid Jacob's star twinkle anew, and Zechariah's fountain flow amain. It is the day when you may fill your ear with draughts of melody from David's sounding lyre, or let your spirit ride aloft on Ezekiel's flying wheels. It is the day when you may take a pleasant walk to Bethany or Emmaus, or, a fourth disciple, ascend Tabor with Peter, and James, and John. It is the day when, with Mary, you may clasp that cross which quivers no longer, and look up to those plain and painless lips, which need never repeat, "It is finished," and gaze on that countenance, in deathless divine, and beneath its thorny crown so full and so benign, till it says to you, "Be of good cheer, thy sins are forgiven." It is the day when, in the upper chamber, you may listen to a sermon of Paul; or, a pilgrim of Emmaus, along with the beloved disciple, see Jesus again. And it is the day for your quiet chamber another—a closet within a closet, when you may surely shut out the world, and get very near to God; the day for looking back, for confession, for eyeing the Lamb that was slain; the day for looking forward, for self-dedication, for holy resolutions, for obedience begun anew. And it is the day for public worship, when the glad bells say, "Go ye up to the house of the Lord," and the willing worshipper answers, "Thy face, Lord, will I seek." And it is the day for Christian converse; when, coming from the house of God in company, pious friends take counsel one with another; and when, under the quiet roof, they read, or go over the sermons, or commune together. And it is the day for family instruction, when the hymns are said, and the chapters read, and the truth in Jesus expounded; and when the father affectionately strives to leave the lessons of heavenly wisdom imbedded in filial love. It is the day for the Sabbath-school, and the prayer-meeting, and the visit of mercy. It is the day when, so that you do not exhaust yourself or overtask others, you may give every moment to the one thing needful; the day which is best employed, when the soul gets all, and heaven gets all, and God gets all.

THE BEACH BIRD....By Henry T. Tuckerman.

Between old gable roofs afar
I watch the shadows on the bay,
When o'er it hangs the morning star
Or steals the glow of parting day.

Like marble gleams its crystal blue
Beneath the sky's unclouded dome,
While every breeze awakes to view
A thousand crests of pearly foam.

I watch the sail across it glide
And vanish like a wing in air,
Or, mirrored in the glassy tide,
The anchored craft sway idly there.

I see the vagrant zephyrs play
O'er clover bloom and twinkling grass,
Amid the poplar leaves delay
That turn to silver as they pass.

Through clinging mists that, as a shroud,
Its mottled limbs float dimly o'er,
Like a huge spectre wrapt in cloud,
I watch the dying sycamore.

From fancy's trance awakened soon,
I hear the ancient steeples chime
Break on the golden hush of noon,
To summon back the thought of time.

But when the level sunbeams fling
Their rosy flush along the deep,
And to the restless spirit bring
The vigil that it loves to keep.

Then musing by the shore alone,
While near the shelving billows rise,
I list their dreary monotone,
As, with each lapsing wave, it dies.

Or from yon green and craggy height
Gaze forth upon the boundless sea,
That spreads beyond my eager sight,
The emblem of infinity.

NOTES OF AN ITINERANT.

MR. EDITOR: In my last I had gotten to the close of my first tour in South Alabama. I returned to Madison county to a camp meeting on the circuit I had left, where I met my P. E. and my colleague. We had quite a joyful meeting. I went to Conference in Nashville, from which place I was appointed a missionary to Cotton Gin neighborhood, on the Tombigbe, and down toward St. Stephens. I made my way on to the lower end of the Tennessee Valley, where Russellville now stands, but there had to stop and turn back, for Indians were killing people on their way to the West. I changed my course and went back up the Valley; got to Gandie's Cove, and from that took a trail across the mountain to the Bear Mead Cabin settlements, and joined Brothers Stringfield and Kesterson.

We traveled the circuit I had formed the year before, enlarging it until it was a full six weeks' work. We continued on for some months, when the P. E., Thomas D. Porter, came on and sent Brother Stringfield to the field I had been appointed to, and I continued during the year. The Lord poured out his spirit on us graciously. The difficulties of traveling were lessened, and the means of accommodation increased; but still we had many rough scenes to pass through.

I made my returns to the Tennessee Conference, held in Nashville, in October, 1819. From here I was appointed to the same field on the Bigbe river as the year before. This was quite a new country—only two settlements of much importance—the Cotton Gin and Wise's settlements. I had to form the most of the field of my labor. I had a preaching places where Columbus now is. I went down the Bigbe for some forty miles below Columbus, and up some sixty miles, and back into Alabama some considerable distance. I also went across the river and preached to the Choctaw Indians, through Major John Peachland, the United States interpreter. This I found to be a difficult matter, for I did not understand their language, but I did the best I could.

Sometime during the year an old Indian said he wished to talk with me. He said, through the interpreter, that he thanked me for the good talks I had given him and his people, but said it would not do him much good, putting his hand on his grey head and bending toward the ground, and saying he should soon sleep in the grave; but he then put his hand on the head of a little boy, and said do puss cuss good; they learn books and be wise. I then inquired of him what they thought of a future state? He said it was the opinion of his people, as far back as he could learn, that good Indian, when he die, go to a good place to live well and easy; it would be a place open and free from bushes, briars and thorns, and that the good Spirit would send them deer and game of every kind—plenty, without their hunting for them. Also he had heard would go to a bad place, bad hunting ground, and find no game. I then told him he would find the situation of the children. He said puss cuss go to good place, and he said so to one heap for her puss cuss, for fear it would suffer from the time it take [illegible] some friend or relative in the other country would find it, to

This year I passed through one neighborhood, going up and also going down the circuit. I had a rest day there both ways. I here collected all the children in the neighborhood, and taught one day in every fortnight. They progressed as fast as I had known children at a day school. This I did because they were destitute of schools.

Late in the fall I, in company with Bro. Meredith Reneau, having a transfer to the Mississippi Conference, put out through the Indian Nation. We made our way toward the seat of the Conference, which was held at "Midway Church, in the thick woods," so called, in Wilkinson county. This Conference was held in December, 1820. We had no Bishop, and we chose Ashley Hewit as President. We had some sixteen to twenty preachers to cover the ground from the Chattahoochee river to the Sabine. From this Conference I was appointed to the Wilkinson Circuit, embracing a portion of Louisiana, and some of Mississippi. Here I had some difficulty in exercising discipline, for in those days the preachers felt it a duty to enforce this rule on rich and poor, free and bond. Just about this time the preachers began to leave off the uniform of a Methodist Preacher; for up to this time a Methodist Preacher was known by his dress. The members too, hankered after the fashions of the day, and commenced dressing gay, and putting on jewelry; but now Methodists and Methodist Preachers wear just what they wish to wear, and the preachers say nothing to them; and yet we have the same Discipline and the same Bible, both of which condemn the course. I do not feel just as pleasant as I could wish about these things. When the great day of accounts shall be called up, I fear many will be found on the left hand—yes, Methodists and Methodist Preachers too.

This year was a pleasant year to me. Here I formed an acquaintance with Wm. Winans, D. D., and his family; made his house my home in some sort. He was then local. In the fall of that year I had visited farther into Tennessee, and also Alabama, and attended Conference at Washington, Mississippi, in December, 1821, and here I was ordained Elder. EBENEZER HEARN.

Alabama Conference, 1852.

HOW SHALL WE TREAT

A TRANSFERRED PREACHER?

The question is not unimportant. Our treatment of the brother may have much to do with his happiness and usefulness, and something to do with our own reputation, both as individuals, and as a Conference. Nor is the question impertinent. It would seem that some lack the knowledge or the disposition to qualify them to give such a preacher becoming treatment. Too many appear to regard him, at the outset, with unbrotherly suspicion. In their hearts, they proscribe him, if not openly. They require that he be put on trial, for a few years, or serve a sort of apprenticeship, before he be judged worthy of entire confidence. They look upon him as an intruder, who has no right to be among them. They regard him as in the way of their own elevation, as a man who has come to compete with them for the best appointments. Every thing in his case in the least doubtful, they construe, not as much as possible in his favor, but as much as possible against him. He may, perchance, have had some trouble in his first appointments—(appointments, by the way, to which he never should have been sent, and which must have been exceedingly trying to any man's feelings, under like circumstances,) but eternity may disclose the fact that others were vastly more to blame for these troubles than he himself. Remember this, ye who are so ready to charge him with "imprudence," or "bad management." No man, who is a man, and a consistent minister, can occupy some fields without trouble.

We must sometimes have war before we can have true peace. And we honor the man who refuses to give up his conscience, his views, and his self-respect, for the sake of an ignoble peace. Such a price is too great, even for popularity. Who would not despise the wretch who should consent to make a bridge of himself, for a horse and carriage to pass over, on condition that he became the owner of the horse and carriage? We are not then to repudiate the transfer because he has striven, in what has seemed to him a proper way to maintain his manhood, and his fidelity. No, rather let us respect him for his consistency, and try to copy him. Doubtless he has faults, and who has not? But let us beware how we judge him, "for with what judgment we judge we shall be judged." And if the brother be named in connection with a desirable post, let us not say, "we admit his qualifications for the place, but then, he's a transfer!"

What if he is a transfer? Does that disqualify him? What are circuit lines, or district lines, or even Conference lines, to the true followers of him who exclaimed, "The world is my parish!" The objection is utterly unworthy of a Methodist preacher. Methodism is one family, one holy brotherhood, the world over. Every Methodist preacher, therefore, known to be in regular standing, should at once and every where, throughout the whole Church, be received with open arms. No suspicion should be indulged, no confidence withheld. 'Tis enough for us to know that the new comer is in good standing in the itineracy. Why should we inquire farther? But how shall we treat the transfer? If he come to us, properly, honorably? Have we good reason to believe that he comes to us in good faith, and from worthy motives, as an itinerant minister?

Let us, then, receive him as a "brother beloved," and make him to feel that he is one. [illegible] surely, if we have gone so far as to vote in open Conference for his transfer, we may not regard him as an intruder. Nor are we to regard his transfer, as in itself against him. Some of the best and strongest men of the Church [illegible] vantage of our cause: nor did they leave their own Conference because they could not have prospered at home. Let us then, receive our brother, "but not to doubtful disputation." Let us, at first, assign to him an appointment, neither of the highest nor of the lowest class, but simply a respectable one. No reasonable man would consent to take more. Give the brother fair play. Give him a chance to show what he can do for the Church. He may do as much good, if we do not hedge up his way. Let us cheer him by our sympathy and prayers. He is in a land of strangers, and he must, at times, feel lonely and sad. O let us encourage his sinking heart! So, in like circumstances, we should rejoice to have others do by us. Let us suspect no unfriendly competition, no obstacle to our own success. We are all brethren, all self-denying itinerants, laboring and suffering for the salvation of souls. Our departure is at hand. Let us away with all envy and strife. Let us, help, and not hinder each other. Let us treat as sacred, each other's reputation. O for more of the spirit of our calling!

One word to our transferred brother. Brother, take courage. Strive not to be great or popular, but faithful and useful. You may expect that the Conference will soon learn to love you, and appreciate you, if you are worthy. Try to feel at home. Trust in God and do your best, and all shall be well. You shall not labor and suffer in vain. God richly rewards the faithful. [N. C. Adv.

Falling Off in the Roman Catholic Church in the United States.

The Bishop of Cashel, at a recent public meeting, said:

"There is an immense work, more than we have any conception of, going on among the Irish population in America; there is a great falling off in the Roman Catholic Church in that part of the world. I stated an important fact the other day, in the House of Lords, and I will re-state it here, because I wish to give my authority. I have here The Annals of the Faith, the great Roman Catholic book, for the details and statistics of the Romish Church. This work contains, among other things, the statistics of that church in the United States; and it appears that the sum total of Roman Catholics in the whole of the United States is 1,663,500.

They did not much like the result, it appears, when they had made it out, for in a note it is added, that 'the real total far exceeds that amount;' and it is added, that the Roman Catholic population of the U. States is generally estimated at 2,000,000. For my purpose, I would just as soon call it 2,000,000 as 1,663,500. A lecture was given at the end of last year by a Mr. Robinson, at a place near New York, on the statistics of the United States. That gentleman estimates the population of the United States at 30,000,000. He further states, that there are in the United States 3,000,000 of born Irish, and 4,500,000 of the descendants of the Irish: so that there are in all 7,500,000 Irish, or 1,000,000 more than are now supposed to be in Ireland. Yet not 2,000,000 of the whole population which came out of a Popish country now belong to Romanism.

"I have another authority. Here is a letter from a priest at New Orleans, dated February, 1852, to the priests of Ireland, on the subject of the dreadful falling off in the Catholic Church in the United States. The writer says: 'That, considering the number who came over, there ought to be 3,970,000 Roman Catholics in the United States, whereas there are only 1,980,000.' He is a little under the 2,000,000. I do not quarrel with him about the excess over the other Romish statements. Well, he says the number lost to the Roman Catholic Church is 1,990,000; so that, in round numbers, 2,000,000 are confessedly lost to the unscriptural Church of Rome, even according to this statement. What this priest acknowledges is doubtless vastly under the reality; yet it is a startling revelation, especially when it is remembered that these 2,000,000 of Irish Roman Catholics have been lost to the Romish Church in less than a quarter of a century."

MASON'S REPLY TO THE SCOFFER.—To a young infidel who was scoffing at Christianity because of the conduct of its professors, the late Dr. Mason once said:—"Did you ever know an uproar to be made because an infidel went astray from the paths of morality?" The infidel admitted that he had not. "Then dont you see," said Dr. Mason, "that by expecting professors of Christianity to be holy, you admit it to be a holy religion, and thus pay it the highest compliment in your power?" The young man, of course, had no reply to make.

TRUE PHILOSOPHY.—I saw a pale mourner stand bending over the tomb, and his tears fell fast and often. As he raised his humid eyes to heaven, he cried

"My brother! oh, my brother."

A sage passed that way, and said:

"For whom dost thou mourn?"

"One," replied he, "whom I did not sufficiently love while living; but whose inestimable worth I now feel."

"What wouldst thou do if he were restored to thee?"

The mourner replied "that he would never offend him by any unkind word, but he would take every occasion to show his friendship, if he could but come back to his fond embrace."

"Then waste no time in useless grief," said the sage, "but if thou hast friends, go and cherish the living, remembering that they will die one day also."

RELIGION OF SUNDAY SCHOOLS.

There is talent, a great deal of talent, in the aggregate now idle in the Church that might be well invested in establishing and maintaining Sunday Schools. This conviction is gaining upon our mind every day. A great want of the already established schools is devoted, practical teachers. Young men and young women, aye old ones too, are "standing all the day idle" for whom God has a work to do here. The prejudice of the age has so far yielded that it is easy to fill a Sunday School Room with children. Teachers are now the demand.

The Sunday School teacher is one of the best evangelists of the day. Especially when, in destitute places, he opens a school that in time proves to be the nucleus for the Church. On this point let the reader peruse and digest the testimony, the facts presented by our Paris Correspondent, in this week's interesting letter.

Ex Opere Operato.—It is against both our taste and judgment to insert very long articles, but we hope the reader will not be deterred by the length of the first on first page, from a careful perusal. It could not be well abridged. Moreover, our local position calls upon us often for demonstrations in that line.

And Protestants need reminding that going through the forms of worship in the absence of a hearty understanding and spirit, is vain as it is formal. "God is a spirit; and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth." Let us beware that we be not automatons in church and in closet in making the round of devotion, and practically relying on the ex opere operato doctrine, while it is doctrinally disclaimed.

☞ We have often heard of the beauty of natural scenery about Lagrange, Alabama. A friend (Judge S——, of Miss.,) once said to us, that he never saw "a sunset properly done up" till he saw it from the mountain there. This scene of classic beauty will be much enhanced by the improvements, of which the following is official notice:

La Grange College, Ala.—The fall session of this Institution will commence Aug. 25. Some delay in opening the session is found necessary in consequence of the repairs on the buildings not being entirely finished. The repairs are in a good state of progress, and will be complete by the day appointed for the session to begin. The patrons of the College will please observe that the session opens August 25.

Building Committee.—F. C. Vinson, J. S. Spier, D. Mayes, J. W. Hardy.

Lagrange, Ala., July 26.

Mississippi University.—The Commencement exercises began the 12th ult., and continued until the Friday following. Diplomas were conferred on eleven young gentlemen who had completed their collegiate career. A Baccalaureate address was delivered by President Longstreet. The ceremonies of laying the corner stone of the University Chapel, were conducted by the Masonic Fraternity; and an address was pronounced by W. F. Stearns, Esq., of Holly Springs. On Friday, Col. Jefferson Davis, who had been invited to address the two Literary Societies, delivered an oration, admirably adapted to the occasion, to a large and attentive auditory.

Political Abolitionists.—Sometime ago a New York paper published an item like this: "Sarah C., a woman of color, died in T—— alley, on 2d inst., of starvation."

The Boston Post republished that precious news item, adding: "We never heard of a Southern slave woman dying of that disease."

The latter paper has the following, which we republish, not only because of its truth, but the region it comes from:

"Nobody under heaven cares less for the black man as a man than your political abolitionist. He chuckles over every case of cruelty to slaves as so much political capital, and glories in the commission of rapine and murder by negroes upon whites, notwithstanding such deeds end in the punishment of the black man by tortures and death, and the tightening of his chains. The political abolitionist is so depraved that it is difficult to tell from his conduct which he hates the most, the black race or his own."

Appropriations for American Missions.—The following is a list of appropriations made to the United States last year by the Society for the Propagation of the Faith. The amount is stated in francs:

Bishop of Nesqually, 10,000; Mission of the Oblates of the Immaculate Mary, in Oregon, 17,500; Mission of the Society of Jesus, in Oregon, 7500; Archbishop of Oregon City, 10,000; Bishop of Dubuque, 12,000; Bishop of St. Paul of Minnesota, 12,000; Coadjutor Bishop and Administrator of Detroit, 7000; Archbishop of Cincinnati, 12,000; Bishop of Cleveland, 12,000; Bishop of Philadelphia, 12,000; Bishop of Pittsburgh, 11,500; Bishop of Wheeling, 4000; Bishop of Richmond, 14,000; Bishop of Hartford, 12,000; Bishop of Albany, 8000; Mission of the Priests of Mercy of New York, 3000; Bishop of Buffalo, 23,500; Bishop of Nashville, 5500; Bishop of Louisville, 2837; Mission of the Rev. Remigian Fathers, Wisconsin, 5500. [Catholic Herald.

Progress of Steamboating in the West.—Thirty-eight years ago, there were but four small steamboats running on the Western waters. During the last year, (1851,) no less than three hundred and twenty steamboats were constructed—at Pittsburgh 112; Wheeling 46; Cincinnati 111; Louisville 31. The aggregate tonnage amounted to 64,000 tons. The total number of passengers carried on these steamers during the year, was 3,500,000. The marine insurance effected on the hulls and cargoes amounted to 70,000,000. For the six months of the present year, there were [illegible] steamboats built or in progress of construction. THOUGHTS ON LEAVEN.

"Another parable spake he unto them. The kingdom of Heaven is like unto leaven, which a woman took, and hid in three measures of meal, till the whole was leavened." Matt. xiii. 33.

The leaven was put in the meal, so the spirit of life which was in Christ is put in man, and is that life of which Paul speaks: "The life which I live in the flesh." Lifeless dull meal could not produce leaven. It must come from another source. And man fallen, earthly, cannot think, live, or meditate himself into divine life; life comes from above, and is the gift of God.

Leaven works outward from within. And religion, real goodness, begins at the heart, in the heart—and works out in the life, "in all holy conversation and godliness." The order is the tree first, and then the fruit. "First make the tree good."

Leaven in its working is secret and mysterious. So is the dealing of God with a human heart, and the hidden exercises of a broken spirit in its seeking after God. Away in the night, while his disciples were rowing on Galilee, Christ was in the mountain, alone, in prayer. The battles of the Temptation in the Wilderness, and of Gethsemane he fought alone. Wife nor husband, parent nor child can aid; but as Moses first left the seventy on the mountain, and went farther up with Joshua, and then left Joshua and went up higher alone to meet God, so, all alone, beyond and above the reach of friends, the sinner draws nigh to God in prayer.

The fact of the process of leavening we know, but not the process itself. Who can tell how leaven works? not all the philosophers in the world; or else it could be told how the spirit is life. So mysterious a process is yet so easily apprehended that all know the bare fact, and are just as well persuaded of it, as if they knew the process in its causes and laws. "Marvel not that I said unto thee, ye must be born again."

The great law of leaven is to spread—all-absorbing, all-engrossing—it never stops until the whole is leavened. Leaven would cease to be leaven, if it were to cease spreading. Religion at a stand still! No, verily; "The righteous also shall hold on his way, and he that hath clean hands shall be stronger and stronger." It grows from blushing morn to brilliant noon; "The path of the just is as the shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day."

"Till the whole was leavened." All life, all light, "an Israelite, (nay a Christian) indeed, in whom there is no guile." Leaven as certainly leavens all as it leavens any. Who is it that says, "The kingdom of God is not like leaven, because the whole cannot be leavened." "Three measures" of meal can as well be leavened as one measure; the mind, the heart, the body—the whole; for it is the leaven, not the meal, that works mightily. "And the very God of Peace sanctify you wholly; and I pray God your whole spirit and soul and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ."

THE MEETING OF RUM SELLERS.

For several days a conspicuous placard has figured upon the walls and tall fences which were not inscribed "Stick no Bills." It was to this effect, "The Consolidated Association of Coffee-House Keepers, &c., will meet at the Hall over the Pearl, on August 9th, at 8 o'clock precisely, to take into consideration the oppressive and onerous license under which we suffer. The owners of billiard rooms and distilleries are invited to be present, and aid in devising means to repeal the tax imposed upon us against all laws of right and equity."

Could there be any earthly convocation which his Satanic majesty would delight to attend, it must have been the meeting called together by this placard. How he must have have "grinned horribly a ghastly smile," when he visited that meeting, and heard the words "law, equity, right," bandied about by men who should wear lightning rods on their heads whenever they approach the places where justice is administered. How he must have chuckled at the even more than diabolic impudence of men who could talk of a reduction of their taxes, when not a week has passed since the State was involved in hundreds, perhaps thousands of dollars of expense by the coffee house fight in Theatre Alley, that resulted in the murder of Weymouth. And when too, they must know, if they know any thing but how to compound poisons, that ninety-nine hundredths of the police and criminal court expenses, result directly from their honorable an "equitable" trade. No one can estimate the cost of ardent spirits to the State in the increase of poverty and crime—filling our hospitals and prisons with its victims—paralyzing the strong arm of industry, and turning power, skill and labor into useless weights upon society. We speak not of the incalculable expense, public and private, consequent upon sending out into the world the children of drunkards, whom paternal example fits only for the penitentiary and the gallows. We refer only to the ordinary police expenses of these coffee-houses.

The meeting was well attended, and some "spirit-stirring" speeches were made. The proceedings have not been published, but the resolutions could not have been very different from these.

"Whereas, the Consolidated Association considers that the tax of two hundred and fifty dollars, imposed upon bar-rooms for license, is against all law and equity, and a burden upon the honest followers of our useful and honorable calling:—

"Resolved, That we request the authorities to remit all fines, and make an appropriation from the public treasury, to enable us better to prosecute our noble labors.

"Resolved, That the effort which is now being made to close the bar-rooms at dark, because of the increasing number of riots and murders committed in them, is both wicked and misguided, for in what better way can society be relieved of its burdensome members than by sacrificing them upon the altars of 'right and equity,' erected in every bar-room.

"Resolved, That bar-rooms are quiet and useful institutions, and that we are the conservators of public "spirit, justice, and honor."

It would not require much effort of imagination to picture the eloquent and indignant speech of some groggy member, but it would require a strong effort to see the "right and equity" of the hydra who has dared to "advance his miscreated front" into the highways, and call upon public opinion to help it poison still more fatally the fountains of social peace.

North Bossier Circuit, La. Conf.

H. N. McTyeire: Rev. and Dear Brother—By reference to the Minutes of the last Conference, you will see that North Bossier was left to be supplied. I am on the circuit by the direction of Bro. Sanders. I find it an interesting circuit, and am proud to say to you that the Lord is here in his Spirit's power. Since my last quarterly meeting I have received thirty-six on probation, and twenty-eight have professed religion, and there are many more who are saying, "O, that I knew where I might find him—that I might come even to His seat." I have some reason to think that this infant circuit will prove a friend to the cause of missions. We intend to pay at least the amount assessed to us.

Brush Creek Circuit, Ala. Conf.

Brother McTyeire: The Lord is reviving his work on the Brush Creek Circuit. On the 28th day of July I closed a protracted meeting on Five Mile Creek, at Liberty Church, which resulted in the conversion of about thirty souls and twenty-four accessions to the Church.

On last Saturday and Sunday our third quarterly meeting was held, at Mt. Nebo. Our Presiding Elder, Brother Koger, was present. We had an interesting meeting—the amount subscribed for missions more than sixty dollars. The following persons were made life members: Father Blackburn, the oldest Methodist on the work, and Rev. Wm. Vaughon and lady. W. V.

Belmont Circuit, Ala. Conf.

Rev. H. N. McTyeire: Dear Brother—It will be encouraging to you and the friends of Zion to know that the Lord is reviving his work on the Belmont Circuit.

First Fruits.—Our second quarterly meeting was held at Brewersville, in May. The church is comparatively small, and does not occupy as prominent a position as some of her sister societies. But when the claims of missions were presented, the congregation, in cash and subscriptions, raised $126. This I then regarded, and now believe, was the first fruits of a rich harvest.

The Full Harvest.—We commenced a meeting in Brewersville on Saturday, July 17, and closed the 26th. Twenty white and nineteen colored members were received in the Church, and I think the same number was converted. This revival was the most remarkable one I ever attended. Generally two thirds of the penitents are females, but here the work was mostly confined to young men—men of fine promise. Since the meeting closed, they have a prayer meeting weekly for the young men. I have no doubt but some of them will preach Jesus and the Resurrection. Would all God's people were prophets.

The conversion of souls gladdens the heart of Christians; but our protracted meetings accomplished much for the Church apart from this. It is virtually bringing together a succession of Sabbaths. The Church assembles—the word is preached—prayer is offered up—the songs of Zion are sung—the people rejoice—their souls are refreshed, and on these occasions persons obtain the power of godliness. This was the case at the above meeting. Three good substantial members, two had been members of the Church for years, the other about one year, were made partakers of that salvation which caused them to rejoice. One gave us his experience; it was as follows:

About eight years since he was deeply convicted of sin, and went to the altar for days. Several professed and praised God aloud. He finally came to the conclusion they were sincere, but deceived. He joined the Church and settled down with the belief that religion consisted in leaving off his sins, and doing what God required in his word; and the evidence one had that he was a Christian, was, that he prayed, attended church, etc. He was encouraged to seek for a special blessing, and while praying God converted him. He was filled with joy, and was actively engaged, until the close of the meeting, to have others partake of the same fulness.

The real benefits of a revival are felt and seen after the meeting closes. The close meeting is now well attended. The family altar is again raised—new ones are erected—love and friendship pervade the town or community where coolness and prejudice were manifest but last week. The house of God is filled. In view of these and many more benefits, no wonder the Church prays for a revival, the preacher preaches for one and all unite in the prophet's petition, "O Lord, revive thy work." W. J. Powers.

An East India Princess Baptized in England.—The New York Post states that the Princess Gauramma, daughter of the ex-Rajah of Coorg, has been baptized into the Christian faith; this personage is one of the dethroned princesses of India. The East India Company have been paying for a long time to her an income of $60,000 a year. This favorite daughter, one of eleven children, is described by her father as a "pigeon among crows." The Queen is going to take charge of her education, and has appointed Mrs. Drummond to attend upon her. She is eleven years of age, very intelligent and but little darker than many Europeans. A younger sister, the Princess Gungahmah, was married, or rather betrothed, to the Napaulese Prince, Jung Bahadoor, about a year ago, and is now educating at Nepaul.

Literary Notices.

Gleanings and Groupings from a Pastor's Portfolio. By Rev. J. N. Danforth. New York: A. S. Barnes: 1852. 12mo., pages 360.

This volume is miscellaneous, and affords much pleasant reading. It is well for the improvement of odd hours and half hours to have such as it about. The author's spirit is the sort that any reader may well seek communion with. He has an eye for the love and beauty that sparkle in domestic life, and sets off these modest charms in a style decidedly inviting to purity and virtue. Now he paints a scene, now draws a portrait not remarkable for skill, but all inclining to goodness. The publisher has done his work very neatly. For sale by J. Ball & Co.

Mathias' Manual. Hogan & Thompson: Philadelphia. 18mo., pp. 125.

This is not a very recent publication, but is for the first time in our possession, and we are glad to have just such a book as it is. The rules of order for conducting business in town meetings, societies, boards and deliberative bodies generally, are here digested and laid down. One may arrive at a definite mastery of that vague term, parliamentary usage. The compiler has drawn upon Jefferson's Manual and the Congressional and British Standards. His work has high recommendations from numerous and distinguished men. To conduct public meetings with dispatch, and keep them from confusion and entanglement, it is important that the rules planned by the best wisdom be well understood—especially by officers. It saves time, saves speech, saves feelings, saves temper, and more than saves the price of this Manual. For sale by J. Ball & Co.

PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

Paris, July 22d, 1852.

Since my last letter I have had the pleasure of witnessing the beneficial results of Sunday Schools, in a part of France, where five years ago, there was no Christian life. I allude to the former province of Poitou, now the Department of Vienne, about 200 miles from Paris, and at no great distance from La Rochelle, where was drawn up the declaration of doctrines which served for many a year as the confession of faith of the Reformed Protestants. This country has ever been the strong hold of Protestantism, as to numbers, for in some of the villages, there are scarcely any Papists; but at the same time there is perhaps no province where exists more spiritual slumber and death. When the ministers have preached once a week, or in some cases, once a fortnight, they seem to think their duty is done, and they quietly stop at home, unless when called out for baptisms, marriages or burials. The religious training of the young is altogether out of the question; visiting the flock is unheard of, and the result is that in some places, out of two or three thousand Protestants, only from fifteen to forty attend public worship.

Such was the state of things in St. Souvant, when, about three years ago, a young minister, full of zeal and of the Holy Ghost, arrived in that village. After his conversion from popery, for he had been a Roman Catholic, in religion, he had visited England, and there imbibed a little of that Sunday School spirit, which pervades the British people. Undounted by difficulties, he set to work, and a fortnight after his arrival, he opened a Sabbath School in his own house, and placed it under the direction of his wife. Some time after, he transferred it to the church, and, as he wanted teachers, he collected together some unconverted young men (there were no converted ones,) whom he told they must become teachers. "But sir," said they, "we dont know what we have to do." "Make the children read the Bible, and explain it to them." "Explain it! why, we dont know how." "Well then, you must learn, and set about it at once." There was no denial possible; so they began to study the Bible, the minister giving them the required help. The Bible converted them, and a few months after, the Sabbath School was nicely organized, with a staff of pious, zealous and happy teachers. The children did not find it hard to love them, and when they returned home after the school, they used to be so full of what they had heard, that the parents felt a great desire to see the wonderful place. They came; they were put into adult classes, to read the Bible, and hear it explained; their taste for religious things was awakened, and they began to attend public worship.

Still, many Protestants had not been reached. The parish being a large one, some of them resided in hamlets at a distance of three or four miles from the village in which the church is built. As they did not care to come to the Sunday morning service, and thus never attended any means of grace, it was thought necessary to take to them what they would not fetch. The minister asked his school teachers to go and exhort in these hamlets. They consented with pleasure, and thus became local preachers, holding every Sunday evening small meetings in barns, kitchens, or in the open air, to such of the peasants as would attend. These peasants have been awakened in great numbers, and are now seen worshipping in the church, which is now often filled, though it contains from seven to eight hundred seats, while formerly there were sometimes only from fifteen to twenty attendants.

The Sabbath School now reckons, with two or three auxiliaries, about three hundred children, and through the blessing of God, it has been the means of renovating the whole parish. Many real conversions have taken place, the attendants on public worship are numerous, regular and attentive; old persons are learning to read, in order to study, themselves, the Bible; a numerous staff of teachers and local preachers are busily employed, almost every day, in announcing to sinners Christ crucified, and lastly, the peasants, who are generally very poor, are beginning to contribute to the Missionary, Bible and Sunday School causes.

This is the place which it was my happy let to visit three weeks ago, as a deputation from the Sunday School Society, in order to be present at the School Anniversary. I was much pleased with the order of the school, the answers of the scholars, and the happy looks of the teachers. Some of the neighboring ministers, who had been invited, were so struck with the results I have mentioned, that they resolved to "go and do like wise," and new schools have been opened since in the neighboring villages.

The former peculiar dress of the peasants, which has disappeared in many localities, still exists there. All the men wear blouses, even the local preachers when in the pulpit. All the women and girls are dressed in short petticoats, of a vivid color, and their large heavy head dress, made of strong pasteboard covered with muslin or lace, gives them a most extraordinary appearance. But all this was soon forgotten, when I heard them speak with raptures of their dear minister, of their beloved school, and of the good they had received in it. God bless them all, and make our piety as simple, as real as theirs.

I have thought it worth while to enter into these details (which the "Sunday School Visiter" might perhaps copy,) because we have here the first instance in France of so much good being done by Raike's noble institutions, which, as you are well aware, are but in their infancy in this country. However, we trust it will not be the last, and the day cannot be far distant when Sunday Schools will be no more considered as an English or exotic plant, but will flourish upon our soil as well as any where else.

The good example given by government in not allowing any of the operatives it employs to labor on the Sabbath day, as I mentioned last month, has produced some beneficial results, and should the current continue in the same direction, we may hope that, without the interference of a special law, business will soon be generally suspended on the Lord's day. Last Sunday, having to walk over the principal business streets of Paris, I was surprised to see nearly one-third of the shops shut, although it was scarcely mid-day. Similar efforts have been made in provincial towns, such as Metz, Besançon, Marseilles, &c. At Lyons, one hundred and twenty-five important houses have entered into an agreement not to transact business on the Lord's day. From Bordeaux, a petition has been sent, signed by eight hundred and twenty-five respectable persons, requesting that a law be passed on the subject. Although this movement is not a Protestant nor a religious one, and will tend to stop business, but not pleasure, still it will be useful in giving more time to the few who may wish to hear the word of God, and more frequent opportunities to ministers and evangelists.

I think the pressure of matter prevented my mentioning earlier the formation of a society called "Society of the History of French Protestantism." Its aim is to bring to light the documents which relate to the history of French Protestant Churches. It will make researches not only on the internal affairs of the Churches, but on their relation with government, on the life of eminent Protestants, on their literary, scientific and artistic labors, and on all that relates to the origin of the French Reformation, and to the state of French Protestantism in the 16th, 17th and 18th centuries. It will publish monthly papers on the doings of the society, and a Quarterly Magazine, in which will be inserted the most interesting documents. Guizot has consented to be honorary president of the society, which has already enlisted the sympathies of all the Protestants, and of some Catholics, such as Michelet, &c. As New Orleans was founded by the French, and belonged to them for nearly fifty years in the last century, I should think traces of Protestantism might be found amongst them, and in the town registers, and the society would feel exceedingly obliged to the Editor of the Advocate, or to any other person who could transmit to them any interesting documents on the Protestant founders, if any, of your city.

Our readers will doubtless have heard, ere this, of the religious persecutions going on in Tuscany, and Madiai and his wife, who were accused, nine months ago, of having gone to a Protestant place of worship, and of having more respect for the Bible than for the (Romish) Church. They have just been judged by the tribunal in Florence, found guilty, and (will it be believed?) condemned. Madiai to 56 months hard labor, and his wife to 45 months of the same punishment. The time they have already spent in prison is to be deducted from the punishment.

About thirty witnesses were heard against them, and not an example of their competence and truthfulness, I need only say that one of them declared upon oath that "the Protestant churches only admitted eight commandments instead of ten, and that the Gospel called Colvin."

The martyrs of Florence, for such really are Madiai and his wife, have shown a patience, a charity and a firmness of faith truly edifying. Did space allow, I would give a translation of a letter of Mrs. Madiai to her husband, the day before the sentence was passed—a letter in which she exhorts him to take courage, and rejoice even, since they been thought worthy to suffer for the great King.

This is only one instance out of many, of the persecuting spirit of Rome, in Italy, and wherever she has the power. I begin to be seriously afraid that in France she will again be the mistress, and destroy what liberty of worship we have until now possessed. The priests are laboring hard to obtain this. The other day a Protestant died in a small village at some distance from Paris, where nearly all the inhabitants are Catholics. With the permission of the Prefect and the Mayor, he was buried in the parish cemetery, by the Protestant minister of a neighboring town. But the priest, indignant at this, complained to his Bishop that the cemetery and the church, which it enclosed, had been polluted by the corpse of a heretic, the bishop therefore placed an interdict over both, declaring that they could not be used any more for the rites of the Romish religion. Upon hearing this, the whole of the population rose in a body and proceeded to the Mayor to give orders for the body to be disinterred, and buried in the place reserved to criminals and suicides!

But here is something more serious. Dr. Cook and the Rev. C. de Boinville, our Wesleyan ministers in this city, have each received this week notice, from the Ministry of Police, that they are not to exercise any more their worship in France, not being Frenchmen. The law on which this notice is based, declares that none but Frenchmen can become ministers of the Protestant State Churches in France. But the Methodists having nothing to do with the State, that law evidently does not apply to them. Our ministers have therefore refused to submit to that injunction, and yesterday evening Dr. Cook preached as usual, to a large congregation. Three police officers were present, but said nothing. We are determined, if necessary, to go to law on the subject; a similar case was decided six months ago by the supreme court of justice, against the Government, and we hope therefore that justice may be done to us. If not, it will be ascertained that there is no more religious liberty in France.

There is little to say about the political world. The grand topic of the day is the opening, by the President himself, of the Strasbourg railway, which connects Paris with Germany. It is the largest unbroken line of railway as yet in France, since it is 380 miles long; that distance will be traveled over in nine hours. It appears that Napoleon was received with the most enthusiastic cheering. Some arrestations were, however, made, the reason of which is not yet known.

I regret having misrepresented your London correspondent. I had no intention of doing so, but simply of stating what I thought and still think, to be the truth. Shall I also say that he misrepresents my opinions, when he asserts that I uphold Napoleon? What I said in his favor was not because I am one of his partizans, but because I think that the devil himself ought not to be painted blacker than he really is. But I shall not enlarge, it would not be proper. I shall say that if to be well informed, it is necessary to be au courant of the best London news, I have had and have still daily access to the "Times," the "Daily News," and the "Chronicle" not to mention other organs of the English press. But I think I had the advantage, in being able to see also the Government papers, and the Swiss and French papers, so that I have studied both sides of the question. My taking the side of Bonaparte, whenever I could conscientiously do so, will give more weight to my words should I have to accuse him, as I fear I must, very soon.

The weather was oppressively hot last week, and the thermometer rose higher than it had done for the last fifty years. Many dogs became mad and, caused serious accidents, so that the police issued strict orders to destroy all which were found in the streets. Hundreds have since been put to death. Two or three thunder storms have now cooled the atmosphere.

Indian Interview with the President.

The National Intelligencer of the 5th instant, thus describes an Indian interview with the President:

The four Pueblo Indians who arrived here on Saturday from New Mexico, in charge of Capt. W. E. Love and Mr. David E. Whiting, yesterday made their first visit to the Indian Bureau, and thence called upon the President of the United States. Before being admitted to the President, they remained some time in the East-room, where their admiration was excited to a high pitch by the size of the apartment, and the magnificence with which it is furnished. On being introduced to the President in his official room up stairs, each of the party shook hands with the President and the Secretary of the Interior. The names of the Indians, who are from the Pueblo of Tesuque, about twelve miles North of Santa Fe, are respectively Jose Maria, Carlos Vigil, Juan Antonio, and Jose Abeytn. The Indians spoke in Spanish. Mr. Whiting acted as interpreter.

The President having signified his disposition to listen to anything they might have to communicate, Jose Maria, after a few minutes of modest delay, said he solicited permission to speak to the President on two or three subjects. He had, he said, traveled very far to see the country and people of the United States, and what he saw greatly astonished him. He had heard a great many strange things of the habits and customs of the people of this country, but now he saw for himself. Much that he had heard he did not believe, but now he saw more than ever had been told him, with his own eyes. He lived, he said, when at home, in a poor country; he and his people suffered a great deal of trouble, but he looked upon the President as his Great Father, and the father of his people, as well as of his white brethren, and as such he should look to him for help and succor. His people wished to live according to their own habits and customs; but his country was a very poor one; living was very high there, and if he spends a dollar, so much of it goes for food that he has nothing left to buy clothing with. Owing to mismanagement, or something unfavorable, there were a great many thieves in this country; this would sometimes lead to bad results; but for his part and his people's, they wished to live in peace and quietness. He complained of his Mexican neighbors, by whose dishonesty his people had lost several animals, which he wished to have restored.

The President replied by expressing the gratification he felt in meeting them. This was the first time in his life that he had the pleasure of seeing a Pueblo Indian. He knew how long and tedious a journey they had traveled; he knew that they would have to pursue the same journey home; but he hoped [illegible] bless and [illegible] the Great Spirit would sustain them till they again returned to the bosoms of their families.

After another shaking of hands, the Indians retired, and soon after were conducted to the Capitol by their agents. With one exception, all these Indians are of small stature. They can all read and write. Jose Maria is really a pleasant speaker, the Spanish sounding very softly and smoothly as it flowed from his lips.

About to Make Him Pay Up.—Foreign papers state that the French Government is about to make the Pope pay for the military protection they afford him. Austria charges, and a pretty bill she renders, sixteen thousand pounds a month, with occasional extras, running into hundreds of thousands. The French military police think they are as much entitled to pay as the Austrians, and they intend to present a bill which will leave the Pope's purse rather empty.

The French Navy.—It is said that the appropriation for the current year, in France, puts in commission one hundred and twenty vessels, of which seventy-one are steamers—this portion of the force being nearly twelve times the number of steamers belonging to the United States Navy.

THE DEATH OF SAINTS.

By Woodsman,

Not many days since I was called to witness the death of a very dear friend, who died in the prime of womanhood. It was a sweet hour—the hour of her departure. My dying words of Wesley and McKendree to her lost: "The best of all is, God is with us." "All is well, all is well," and then with a smile which seemed like the borrowed light a ministering angel, her spirit fled, though the impress of its spiritual loveliness was left behind. Whilst lingering near the scene of her triumph, the sentiment of the Psalmist occurred to my mind a train of profitable and [illegible] solitary reflections. "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints." The Christian, then, is the peculiar object of heaven's care; he is the subject of [illegible] guardianship, and around him are thrown the dispensation of kind and bountiful Providences. It is for sufficient cause—for wise purposes, and for the accomplishment of [illegible] noble ends that the believer dies; and it is for which makes his death precious in the sight of the Lord—so precious that Divine wisdom has spared but two of these moral gems from the jewelry of our faith. Strong and mighty were the reasons that exempted Enoch from the throes of mortal dissolution, and [illegible] the "chariot of Israel and the horsemen thereof," at the command of Elijah; but these, no consideration has ever been adequate to the purchase of such an [illegible].

An obvious reason why the death of saints is so highly set by, is that it affords a most eminent manifestation of the consequences of sin. By sin death entered the world, and mortality in all of its aspects, is an unmistakable record of its advent and reign. We have to look for exceptions to the universality of the doom, we should turn to the Christian and the subject from whom the penalty could be most justly remitted. This ungodly and impenitent could not be thus regarded—possibly the pure and holy might; but the saint shared with the sinner this common experience, and [illegible] declares to the world how terrible and abominable are the results of moral [illegible].

The death of saints is precious for the display of Divine love and mercy. The manner and attendant circumstances of the Christian's dying hour are often mercifully disposed. Reason, peace and friendly sympathy are permitted to ameliorate and smooth the passage in a mild and repulsive way. The hope of eternal life and present joy and assurance are given, and the terror and sting of death are removed. Herein the justice of God is attempered with mercy, and the benignant smiles of His face light up what would else be an unrelieved scene of gloom. Perhaps the Lord highly regards the death of his saints because it illustrates his grace and truth. It is a universal conviction and feeling with us that death is an occasion when extraordinary grace is required. The thought may be instinctive—one of those mental intuitions which come into the mind, self-clothed with authority, and that require neither the confirmation of reason nor the [illegible] of facts. But however its origin may be accounted for, the universal impression is undoubtedly right. This supposition seems to find in that climax of David's faith, "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff, they comfort me."

And it is reasonable enough, too, that the largest measure of divine help should be necessary in order to patient suffering, to the sundering of earthly ties, to the assoulte of Satan, and to sustain in the last all-involving crisis. Death is the eminence, the occasion of grace—its most equipoised test; and those scenes of triumph and dissolving glory, witnessed in connexion with the saint's departure, affect the world its brightest illustration. A full and invaluable end is accomplished in the Christian's death, by its confirmation of the truth of Revelation. Ample and [illegible] as are the other evidences of Christianity, this exceeds them all in striking and overwhelming power. The words of the dying are the oracular responses of eternity, occupy a position midway the two worlds, whilst they can not open wide the unseen to our gaze, we feel that their ebbing [illegible] faint but clear articulations of its realities.

Their testimony, of whatever character it has more than the confirmation of an oath. To entertain the thought that the fluttering spirit should perjure itself, near the judgment bar, would be the climax of boldness. Now the peaceful and happy decease of the believer seals the truth of the Gospel. The life of immortality is brought to light, is reflected and exhibited, and the special promises are forcibly set forth and vindicated. Every such death speaks with trumpet tones the truth of the Bible. It comes on ineffaceable corroboration of the sublime doctrines of the Scriptures, and writes the sentence of conviction upon the memory that it can not be erased.

Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints, as a lesson of piety, of godliness to the living. It is a providential dispensation to a benevolent end; that end in part at least, is the moral improvement of the survivors. All means and instrumentalities for good to men, are precious in the sight of infinite beneficence. Viewed in this light, the death of the Christian is so especially impressive, when the victim dies in youth, beauty and health, and is hastened from the tenderest ties [illegible] of friendship and love [illegible] a shining mark." The [illegible] trite saying, well-nigh thread-bare [illegible] in the economy of Divine providence [illegible] a reason why it is so—why it is required. To be a warning to the giddy and thoughtless, death must be felt; it must make them feel that it is near, and near to all; and no one they could least spare, and the one they could least expect, should be called away. Some must be taken from them. Hence death must be taken as well a shining target, and he must fall amongst the subjects of his cruel shafts, those who are most eminent for piety and worth. The death of such a character is frequently a potent message of conviction to the impenitent. The exhortations of the departed saint are rarely forgotten, and the vows which are made on such occasions are felt to be sacred and binding obligation. Every circumstance speaks eloquently and convincingly to the unawakened sinner, and [illegible] brought more nearly and really home to his thoughts than ever before. Every [illegible]

he may drive his seriousness away. A fugitive from truth, he may revel in worldly and criminal dissipation; but here he must think—he must feel, he must believe. Such a death is a chosen instrument of good to the most direct and profitable application, and by them it should be most carefully studied and laid to heart. To some its language is that of admonition and rebuke; to others it is a trial of faith, and to all an incentive to diligence in prosecuting the race for glory. It also confirms the faith of the Christian and inspires him with joy.

Religion is new no longer an experiment, but a tried and sure dependence. The bark which has been sailing by the chart and compass of the Gospel is soon at length to make the port. Solicitude and doubt are removed, and the scene inspires joy unutterable. Strange paradox! that joy and sorrow, smiles and tears, should thus commingle. But Christianity has its paradoxes—and blessed too. So I thought when my heart was filled and thrilled with holy, pleasurable emotions at the sight of my dying friend!

But let us tarry for one more reflection. Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints, because it is the occasion of their deliverance and glorification. This is one of the many uses to which death is appropriated, and it is not the less a reason of preciousness, that it centres in the bliss of its subject. To the saint death is the means of deliverance from a world whose elements are all unfriendly to grace; it is the exodus from the flesh, whose infirmities and pains have nearly borne the spirit down, and it is a safe and final escapement from the wiles and machinations of Satan. The valley of shadows opens out into the plains of life and immortality. To him it is the tunnelled avenue to the skies, through which he advances with faltering steps to the realms of heavenly glory. Already the life immortal disports its rays upon his path, and ho is lost from sight upon the brow of the celestial hills. With him, at last, the trial-state is over—the work of faith is fought, the race is run, and the crown of life glitters on his brow; and the crosses of probation, the armor of battle, and the exertions of the Christian stadium, are exchanged for the joyous fruitions of heaven. But the secret of this preciousness may chiefly lie in the fact that the Savior receives the purchase of his blood, and the Almighty Father a son redeemed.

There is joy in heaven over the penitent sinner, and how much more over the glorified saint! The former is only conditionally safe, the salvation of the latter is placed beyond any contingency, and by so much as certainty is better than doubt, by so much may we suppose the joy of heaven over the dying saint exceeds that which is felt over the conversion of an immortal soul.

Precious then in the sight of the Lord, and precious in the sight of his angels, and precious to all the realms of light is the death of the saint; and we who are left behind in the world of graves, are invited to dry our tears and join in the joy of the sacred throng; to wave a glad adieu to the parting spirit, and mingle our congratulations with the hierarchs of heaven.

Thus ended my revsrie, for my friend was dead. The angel of the Lord broke up his encampment betimes, and took his charge up to the pavillions above.

Obituary.

Died—In Philadelphia, on the morning of the 30th of July, JOHN BALL, of this city, in the 30th year of his age.

The deceased was a native of Philadelphia, and there permanently, until within the last two years. His health failing, he was induced to try a more Southern clime; but that fatal disease, consumption, had fixed him for a victim, and his health has been gradually declining since his sojourn here.

The subject of this sketch was well known in the reading community of this country. At the age of eighteen he commenced publishing books, moral and religious, and has been actively engaged in this noble work ever since. Often, while living, has the writer heard him say, "That it would be a pleasing reflection, when he came to die, that he had been the means of putting forth to the world nothing that he regretted, or was afraid to leave behind him." Such works as Bunyan, Milton, South and Burkitt are immortal, and one might well be proud of having such momentoes.

Mr. B. had been an active member of the M. E. Church for a number of years; and all his sickness, when his body was racked with pain, he submitted with Christian patience, feeling conscious of a blessed reality. A friend writes, who sat by the bed-side and saw him breathe his last, as the messenger of death came to call his spirit away, he raised his eyes and —— ——heaven." And thus the soul of him who had fought the good fight and kept the faith," passed from earth to heaven.

"Thou art not in the grave confined—
Death can not claim th' immortal mind;
Let earth close o'er its sacred trust,
But goodness dies not in the dust."

H.

Died—August 1, at Shreveport, La., Mrs. MARTHA J. COOKE, consort of Robt. Cooke, Esq., in the 22d year of her age. The deceased joined the M. E. Church in her 12th year, and has lived an exemplary and devoted member from that time until her death. Her last illness was of short duration—only five days, and her death was marked and triumphant.

L. PARKER.

Cholera.—In Rochester, N. Y., on the 5th inst., there were twenty-four new cases and seventeen deaths; on the 6th, eleven new cases and eight deaths. In Buffalo, on the 6th inst., there were fourteen cholera deaths, and on the 7th, the disease was supposed to be rapidly disappearing. In Chambersburg, Pa., and in Sandusky, Ohio, there had been several cholera deaths, and on the 6th inst. many citizens were leaving both places in great fear. In Hagerstown, Md., something like cholera had made its appearance on the 4th inst.

Mortality among Physicians.—Drs. Parrish, Stewart and Hunter, well known and highly esteemed physicians of Philadelphia, are dead. Their deaths occurred within a few days of each other.

General Intelligence.

Later from Mexico.

By the arrival of the brig Josephine we have files of papers from the city of Mexico as late as the 31st ult. We give our usual summary.

The Pronunciamento of Tehuantepec.—This insurrectionist appears to have given the Mexican Government great trouble. Retreating upon Huatusco, he has met and vanquished a small party of Government troops compelling them to retreat upon Orizaba. Subsequently he entered Cordova without striking a blow. His course appears to have been a triumphant one, supported by the people of his section and urged forward by a large armed force. He and his adherents protest fidelity to the constitution, but demand the abolition of the alcabalas, the abolition of laws concerning the National Guard, and the separation of the District of Orizaba from the State of Vera Cruz. At the last accounts, he was ready to fall upon Jalapa. The affair seems to be a serious one.

Other Pronunciamentos.—A pronunciamento has been made at Guadalajara, and one is reported to have taken place at Tampico.

Foreign Consuls.—The American Consul at Acapulco was in the city of Mexico, and it appears that the English Consul at the former place had had his official letters broken open by Mexican officials.

Indians.—The savages appear to continue their depredations and barbarities with unmitigated ferocity and unchecked success. Durango, Coahuila and Tamaulipas chiefly suffer in loss of life and property. A general subscription, to provide means for punishing the savages, seems to meet with favor.

The Isthmus of Tehuantepec.—It would appear, from an announcement in the Constitucional, that the Mexican Government has taken some curious and decisive, if not arbitrary and dishonest, action, in reference to the opening of the Isthmus of Tehuantepec to trade and travel. It calls for bids or propositions for the privilege of accomplishing this result—the same to be "paragraphed" by two notaries, to be made under seal, and to be received only if presented by the 15th of August. After examining them, the Government will decide which shall be received. All past propositions (or agreements?) are to be considered null and void. The propositions are to be confined to opening a road; the subject of a canal to come up hereafter and separately; and any proposition accepted by the Government, to be subject to the approval of Congress.

Consuls at City of Mexico.—Mr. George Illibon has succeeded Mr. Mackintosh as the English, and Mr. Jose Lopez Bustamente is now the Spanish Consul, at the city of Mexico.

Alabama Elections.—From the returns so far received, it is evident that there will be an immense majority against the proposed State Convention. A few only of the eastern counties give majorities in its favor.

The following are the names of the persons elected sheriffs in the counties heard from:

Montgomery—Henry Peebles; Macon—C. B. Nuckols; Mobile—J. W. Lyon; Perry—Wm. W. Stokes; Madison—George W. Carmichael.

Butler County—E. H. Tickens elected county clerk, and G. W. Thagard sheriff. For Convention 101; against it 1007. Dallas—Harris sheriff. For Convention 143; against it 854. Sumter—J. H. Short sheriff. Convention, no returns yet. Greene—Majority against the Convention 388. Autauga—James A. Lawler sheriff; county treasurer J. Findlayson; for Convention 152; against it 852). Coosa—The majority against the Convention supposed to be between three and four hundred. Chambers—E. H. Muse reelected clerk of the circuit court. Majority against the Convention about 300. Herbourne—The majority against the Convention is 1670; McNab, circuit clerk. Russell—Askew is elected sheriff. The majority for the Convention is 150. Tuscaloosa—The Monitor says this county went against the Convention by about the proportion of three to one.

Treasure in New Jersey.—The Mount Holly Mirror tells an almost incredible story, that some of Capt. Kidd's treasure has been found among the Pines, and that the occupants of that region are in a state of intense excitement. A man dreamed for several nights successively that he should find this treasure, the place to be indicated by four iron bars projecting from the earth. He went and found his dream realized. Two hundred and forty thousand dollars had been discovered up to Monday night, buried in iron chests, and the people have turned out with their pickaxes in further search for the treasure.

New French Minister.—A report comes from Paris, that a son of the ex-King Jerome will be sent to the United States, in the capacity of Embassador of France.

The Sufferers by the Henry Clay.—A subscription has been started at New York for the purpose of enabling those who lost friends or property by the destruction of the Henry Clay, to sue the proprietors for damages.

Australia.—Australia is about 15,000 miles from New York, which distance is accomplished in from ninety to one hundred days; fare, from $125 to $225 in sail vessels, no steam communication having yet been established from an American port.

Hudson River Railroad.—The receipts for the Hudson River Railroad, for July, exceed $50,000, an increase of thirty-one per cent. on the June earnings. One hundred and thirty thousand passengers were transported over the road during the same time.

Copper.—At Mr. Pethrick's mine, near Valley Forge, in Pennsylvania, a vein of copper has been struck, of unsurpassed richness. At the Chester county Mining Company's works they are working a vein of pure galena of sixteen inches. The company is mining 800 tons weekly.

The Cochineal Crop.—Advices from Guatemala, under date of the 14th of June, received in Boston, in relation to the cochineal crop, state that it has been nearly destroyed. The quantity secured is about 3000 bales, against 14,000 last year; and many vessels have been obliged to leave the coast without being able to secure a cargo.

Late from Porte-au-Prince.—Dates from Porte-au-Prince, Hayti, to July 22, have been received at New York. The yellow fever had made its appearance in several of the ports, and was proving very fatal.

A disease resembling the plague had also broken out, and was carrying off large numbers of the lubebitants.

New Feature in Trade.—The Boston Courier mentions that sixteen cars, loaded with eight sticks of timber, for ships' masts, eighty-four feet in length and three feet in diameter, loaded in Buffalo, were on Tuesday brought over the Buffalo and Rochester Railroad, etc., to Boston, and thence over the Eastern Railroad to Portsmouth, N. H., 826 miles, without change of cars.

Boot Manufacturing.—In Milford, Conn., boot manufacturing is an immense business. It is estimated that not less than one million five hundred thousand pairs will be manufactured there this season. The business is now in a very flourishing condition, the manufacturers are receiving orders as fast as they can be filled, and the workmen realising good prices for their labor.

A New Zinc Mine.—A zinc mine has recently been discovered in Pennsylvania which is said to be superior in quality to any yet known. A chartered company is being formed and it is expected they will immediately commence the manufacture of paint which will equal, if not surpass, that made by the New Jersey Zinc Company, and which has already gained a wide spread reputation.

A Large Train.—A few days ago a train of cars, containing 1700 persons, passed over the St. Lawrence and Atlantic Railroad, from St. Hyacin to Montreal, the object of the visit being to see the ruins of the great fire at the latter place. All the fare collected was given for the relief of the sufferers. Another party, quite as large, subsequently left Montreal in the cars, to enjoy a temperance pic-nic.

The Massachusetts Liquor Law.—Several persons in Massachusetts have been arrested for violating the liquor law; indeed, arrests, it is said, take place daily. The proprietor of the Exchange Coffee-House, Lowell, has been convicted on three complaints; the penalty for the third offence is not less than three months' imprisonment. The Justices at Cambridge grant warrants [illegible] lance, and Constables [illegible] reluctance to serve them unless they are indemnified. In Boston, the Constables waited on the Mayor in a body, and informed him of their resolution not to serve a single warrant, unless the city would stand responsible for all damages.

Advance in the Beef and Pork Market.—There has been a gradual advance in the prices of pork and beef in the New York market for some weeks past; and the figures, as now quoted in the daily commercial report, are higher than they have been for twenty years past. The stock on hand, just now, is said to be very light, but the advance is not attributable to this fact so much as to an adequate supply from the West. Since last spring, mess beef has gone up from say $11 to $18 50, and mess pork from $14 to $20. The export to Europe is not much greater than is ordinarily the case.

English Blunders.—A late number of the London Illustrated News says the democrats refused to nominate Rufus King for the Vice Presidency at the late Baltimore Convention, and that the white balloted tardily for Douglas for the Presidency. It says, also, that Albany contributed $300 to the Kossuth fund, while "the State of New England" "forked over" $1000.

An accident occurred a short time since at Schenectady New York, by which a young Indian from the Choctaw Nation, and now a student in Union College, was injured by the explosion of a pistol. He was present at an exhibition of an itinerant juggler, who requested one of the audience, as is frequently done, to fire a pistol for him. Wright complied with the request. The pistol was, of course, of a peculiar construction, and owing to his having placed his hand over a concealed barrel, the flesh was torn and shattered by it when he fired. With genuine Indian fortitude, he betrayed no symptom of pain, even by an exclamation or a look, and it was not until it was noticed that his arm was motionless and bleeding, that any one knew that an accident had occurred. Shortly afterwards he fainted from pain and loss of blood. A physician, who was present, attended to him, and he is now doing well.

Arrival of Gen. Uhlazy.—On Thursday evening last Ladislaus Uhlazy, late Governor of Comorn, Hungary, and Capt. Pomuta, arrived in this city on his return from Texas to fix Hungarian colony in Iowa. It will be recollected that the Governor and his companion left this city with the Kossuth troupe for New Orleans, in March last. From there they embarked for a point near the river Nueces, in Texas, where a gentleman had donated to Kossuth one thousand acres of land, for the purpose of forming a Hungarian colony. After an examination of the land and the country adjacent, the two started on their return to St. Louis, and have traveled the whole distance through Texas, Arkansas and Missouri to this city, on horseback. The journey has occupied nearly two months, and has been rather fatiguing, though the Governor, notwithstanding his advanced age, (seventy-three years,) has stood the journey well. He returns in a few days to Iowa, when it will be decided whether the colony will sell its possessions in Iowa and move to Texas or not. [St. Louis Intelligencer, 2d inst.

Destructive Fire in Savannah.—A dispatch from Savannah to the Charleston Courier, dated the 3d instant says: "A most destructive fire broke out in the Western part of this city, known as South Oglethorpe, at four o'clock this (Tuesday) afternoon, which is still burning, though its progress has been fortunately checked. In consequence of the wind being high and water scarce, from sixty to seventy houses were consumed, and one hundred persons deprived of their homes. The houses were all frame, however, built of wood and principally old. The loss is estimated at $75,000. Great distress is experienced in consequence of so many being left homeless. A great quantity of furniture has also been destroyed. The burnt section extends from Habby street, North, to Margaret street, South, and from Laurel street, East, to Canal."

Gerrit Smith Robbed.—Gerrit Smith, after advancing $10,000 for the hall ($10,000 in all,) of Chaplin, of Maryland, and $2,000 of the $6,000, for his bail in Washington, sets it down as a clear case of robbery on the part of the abolitionists, who have failed to indemnify his advances. This is proof positive that these same abolitionists are a pack of thieves. In the matter of Chaplin, he was their agent in stealing off several slaves from Washington, the property of Messrs. Tombs and Stephens, of Georgia, and next they rob Gerritt Smith of his money.

Cheap Travelling.—The Panama Herald states that in consequence of competition between the steamers Golden Gate and Winfield Scott, on their last trip to San Francisco, many passengers were taken at $25 each. A voyage of 4000 miles for $25 and found.

Going it Strong.—In March last, three men (!) in the city of Springfield, Ill., agreed together to drink themselves to death. The Register of that place says the first died in April, the second in May. The survivor, on the happening of the last event, showed signs of breaking the contract; and kept sober two or three days afterwards; but honor revived, and he died in the month of June. This is literally true.

Steamboat Accidents and Loss of Life.—Since the 1st of January there have been twenty steamboat disasters in the United States, attended by the loss of 428 lives and the injury of 100 others. This does not include the killed and wounded by the explosion of the Glencoe, at St. Louis, or the Fitzer Miller, on White River. The number lost by these two calamities is unknown, but would probably swell the aggregate of killed to 500.

Arrival of a Hungarian in China.—The Friend of China notices the arrival at Hong Kong, in the Golden Gate, of Col. Berzicszki, the Hungarian exile, who, it will be recollected, left Washington city while Kossuth was there, with the intention of opening a communication with a tribe of Tartars, who are said to be of the same origin as the Hungarians, and speaking a language very similar, with a view of procuring their aid in an attack on Russia.

Accepted.—Dr. Wm. Carr Lane, of St. Louis has accepted the Governorship of New Mexico, and will leave St. Louis in a few days.

Real Estate in New York.—Capitalists in New York are exhibiting an extraordinary anxiety to invest in real estate. It is said that a change in the monetary system is apprehended at no distant day, and that in the event of a depreciation in the value of gold, a corresponding rise will take place in real estate.

Complimentary.—The London Athenæum, in a critique on Hawthorne's new book called "Blithedale Romance," says, "it puts its seal on the reputation of its author, as the highest, deepest and finest imaginative writer whom America has yet produced."

Hudson River Railroad.—The receipts for the Hudson River Railroad, for July, exceed $50,000, an increase of thirty-one per cent. on the June earnings. One hundred and thirty thousand passengers were transported over the road during the same time.

Corn.—In Prairie county, Ark., corn can be contracted for at twenty cents per bushel.

Large Loan.—The Barings, of London, have negotiated a million loan for the Boston Water Company at 4½ per cent.

U. S. Army.—The standing army of the United States numbers 10,129 men—commissioned officers, 896; non-commissioned officers and privates, 9233. The number of buglers employed is 60, and the number of musicians 258. The headquarters of the army are at Washington, D. C. The number of commissioned officers in the militia is 74,962, and of non-commissioned officers, musicians and privates 2,105,524, making a total of 2,180,486 fighting men.

We clip the following from the Planter's Banner, a paper published at Franklin, St. Mary's Parish:

Rayne Tribune, July 29, 1852.

A True Fish Story.—Mr. Editor: If you deem it worthy of notice, you can give to your readers the following remarkable circumstance, and though it be a fish story, I can vouch for the truth of it. Yours respectfully,

DAVID E. MEADE.

"On Saturday the 24th July, Mr. A. Perigot, who lives on the east side of the Bayou Teche, some two or three miles above Pattersonville, was fishing in the Bayou, when he caught a catfish about three feet long, the abdomen of which he observed was extraordinarily large. The old gentleman being very fond of fish eggs, was congratulating himself on the prospect of a fine dish of the same, when the cat's belly was, from all appearance, likely to afford. He accordingly set to work in preparing the fish for his supper, and on opening its abdomen, lo! and behold! instead of eggs, he found 'Hays's Medical Journal' for July, 1852.

"Mr. Williams, my manager, on the Wednesday before, in returning from the Post-office at Pattersonville, had occasion to cross the bayou opposite Mr. Perigot's residence, and in the act of crossing, he unknowingly let fall the Journal in the bayou. The cat, it seems, in search of his daily food, came across the volume, and unconscious of its real nature, swallowed it for nourishment. Your readers are probably aware that 'Hays'' Medical Journal' is in the octavo form, each number containing from three to four hundred pages of [illegible] matter containing from three able size. The [illegible] thus forming a book of considerable [illegible] Journal, when taken out of the stomach of the fish, was very little injured; though doubled up and completely wet, few of its pages were burt, and the print remains entirely legible."

A Bear Fight.—The Portland (Me.) Argus, of the 26th ult., gives the following account of an immense bear fight which occurred in Oxford county, in that State, a few days previous:

As Erastus Bean, a young man of twenty years, was haying in his field, accompanied by a boy of twelve, named Dunn, he looked up and saw near him a large black bear, of the white-faced breed, the most savage of the black variety. Having taken his gun with him to shoot partridges, he caught it up and fired at the brute, but with little effect, as the bear immediately began to close upon him. Bean fell back slowly, loading his gun the meantime, when just as he got his charge in, his heel caught against a twig, and he fell backwards, and Bruin leaped upon him! His situation was now a frightful one, but his coolness did not forsake him, and he immediately fired again, but with no visible effect. The bear at once went to work, seizing his left arm, biting through it and lacerating it severely. While thus amusing himself, he was tearing with his fore paws the clothes and scratching the flesh on the young man's breast. Having dropped his arm, he opened his huge mouth to make a pounce at his face. Then it was that the young man made the dash that saved his life. As the bear opened his jaw, Bean thrust his lacerated arm down the brute's throat as far as desperation would enable him. There he had him. The bear could neither retreat nor advance, though the position of the besieged was any thing but agreeable on so warm a day as Thursday last.

Bean now called upon the lad to come and take from his pocket a jack-knife and open it. The boy was a fitting companion for this brave young man. He marched up to the work boldly. But before he could get at the pocket, he had to crawl the bear's head over a little to get at it—the beast meantime not being at all easy with such a huge mouthful in his throat. Having got the knife, Bean with his untramelled hand, cut the bear's throat from ear to ear, killing him stone dead while he lay on his body!

He then threw the beast off, notified his friends, had his wounds dressed and is now comfortable. It was judged the bear weighed nearly four hundred pounds! One of his paws, which our informant saw, weighed two pounds, eleven ounces.

During July, 2301 persons were committed to the New York city prison.

Arrival of the El Dorado.

17 DAYS LATER FROM CALIFORNIA.

By the arrival of the El Dorado yesterday morning, forty-seven days later intelligence has been received from California, but not a single San Francisco paper came to hand.

The El Dorado left the U. S. M. steamer Illinois aboit sailing for New York, with 400 passengers and $1,800,000 in gold.

The El Dorado brought 100 passengers and the mails.

The mess from California is of minor importance. The business at the mines is not as flourishing as could be wished, but hopes of large yields are expected in a few weeks, as soon as the rivers fall, which they are now doing rapidly.

The crop of oats and barley will exceed any crop ever raised in the country.

Great excitement prevailed in San Francisco, among the passengers of the steamer Independence—Vanderbilt's line. They hung Mr. Vanderbilt in effigy, attaching to the breast of the image, "Vanderbilt's Death Line."

The health of Aspinwall is rapidly improving—but few cases of fever existing, except from imprudent exposure.

Our dates from Sacramento and San Diego are to the 15th ult., and we take from the Sacramento Union a portion of the following summary of news.

The past fortnight has been one of more than usual interest in this commonwealth. The great increase of crime in many sections of the State, has naturally created anxiety and apprehension in the minds of many that the scenes of last year are to be repeated. We, however, have confident hopes that the wisdom and discretion of our people, coupled with energy and vigilant action, will ward off from us the recurrence of farther outrages.

In the counties of Shasta, Trinity, Calaveras and Eldorado, broils, fights and murders have been of frequent occurrence, the particulars of which will be found in another part of the paper.

On the morning of the 3d July, the first overland emigration of the present season arrived in this city. The party consisted of twenty-six young men. They were from the State of Ohio, and made the through trip in seventy-two days.

The Government relief-train, which left this city on the 25th ult., arrived at Placerville on the 29th.

Emigrants from the Mississippi river are now almost daily arriving, many of whom locate in the mining sections of the country. The emigration will be large this season, but probably not equal to that of 1850.

The anniversary of our National Independence was celebrated in almost every city and settlement throughout the State. The demonstration in this city far surpassed that of any previous occasion, and the procession particularly presented a magnificent appearance.

In many of the mining precincts, there were orations, dinners and public rejoicings, and the glorious day was universally held in remembrance by every true republican within the boundaries of the State.

Business during the last fortnight has been brisk, and prices have ruled high in consequence of the non-arrival of the many vessels overdue laden with supplies.

The health of the city and State is good. The weather has been very hot for the last few days, but the nights are invariably cool and delightful.

The farmers are busily engaged in harvesting; the crops are coming in freely, and will yield astonishingly.

We learn from agentlemen from Bear river that the Indians have driven the Chinese off from that stream. A son of one of their chiefs was missing for several days, and they supposed the Chinese had stolen him, which is given as a cause for the course they have taken. The boy has since made his appearance.

A party of men at Ford's Bar, headed by one Charles Pearsons, were arrested by a posse of citizens, accused of committing various outrages upon the persons and property of their neighbors, and, on trial, were convicted and sentenced to fine and imprisonment.

Capt. Nathan Lord, owner of the steamer Gov. Dana, was accidentally shot on the 10th inst., on board a steamship. One of the hands took up a pair of saddle bags, which had been left by an emigrant, and in doing so discharged a pistol which was in them, the ball passing through the body of Capt. Lord and coming out at his back. He lived but a short time.

A general court martial composed of the following named officers, has been ordered to assemble, as soon as practicable, at the Mission of San Diego, for the trial of the two deserters charged with the murder of the late Col. Craig, 3d Infantry: Brevet Lieut. Col. Magruder, Brevet Maj. Wessels, Brevet Maj. McKinstry, Capt. Brent, Capt. Burton, 1st Lieut Patterson; 2d Lieut. Stenmer, and 1st Lieut Eddy, judge advocate.

The Times and Transcript.—This paper, which has been published for two years past in Sacramento, and which recently suspended, has reappeared in San Francisco.

Regatta.—A Grand Regatta recently took place in the Bay of San Francisco. The Typhoon won the first prize, making eighteen miles in one hour and forty-two minutes.

Arrival of Mormons.—The Stockton Journal of the 30th ult. says:

Mr. W. Mogg, who has just arrived at Sacramento from Carson Valley, reports the arrival, at the latter place, of several large trains of Mormons from Salt Lake, who had renounced their religion, and determined to settle permanently in California. One train had about three hundred head of remarkably fine loose cattle. In fact they are all well supplied with stock. They have with them their families, and express themselves exceedingly dissatisfied with the state of things at Deseret. Many of them experienced great difficulty in getting away, being harrassed by vexatious and unfounded suits, and their cattle seized. Hundreds have in this way been prevented from leaving who otherwise would.

A Strike.—The brick masons of Stockton recently struck for $8 per day. The strike was in consequence of an arrival of some of the craft, who were hired at ordinary laborers' wages. They were induced to join in the strike.

Deaths at the Oak Flat.—The Stockton Journal says: We are informed that Major Ledon, formerly of New Orleans, died a few days since, from the effects of vaccination. On Wednesday last, Mr. Craig, a traveler, died. A man had his neck broken a short time since, at Big Oak Flat, by a fall from a block. Name unknown.

New Indian Difficulty.—Mr. Stell, the Express rider, has favored us with the following information: A few days ago, an armed party of Indians went to the ferry of Messrs. Campbell, Poole & Co., on the Indian Reserve, upon the San Joaquin, and ordered them to leave, showing them, at the same time, the certificate of the Commissioners. The Indians left, however, without molesting them, threatening to kill them all if they were on the Reserve upon their return. A party of sixty or seventy volunteers were about to repair to their assistance.

Death of Wm. Crockett.—This gentleman, one of the original Texas Rangers, died at Stockton on the 9th ult. He was a native of Richmond, Va., but for many years a resident of Texas.

Marysville.—The population of Marysville, as given by the census taker of Yuba county, is 4500, 243 of whom are females.

The Chinese Letters.—One of the San Francisco papers stated positively that the Chinese Letters to the Governor were written by a Chinaman, of San Francisco. It now appears that Mr. Zabriskie, of Sacramento, had a hand in their manufacture.

From Oregon.

By the El Dorado we have receive[illegible] 10th ult. The news, how[illegible] on the Oregonian to the Panama[illegible]ever, is not of much importance.

[illegible]—Smith, who was convicted of being an accessory to the murder of C. C. Hooker, has been pardoned by Gov. Haines.

Steamboats.—There are six steamboats now plying on the Willamette river.

Coast Survey.—The U. S. surveying schooner Baltimore had arrived at Astoria, and Commander R. D. Cutts had commenced the task of making a full survey of the mouth of the Columbia river, and adjacent coast.

Fourth of July.—The anniversary of our National Independence was celebrated with great enthusiasm throughout the territory.

Arrival of the Daniel Webster.

The Daniel Webster, arrived last evening, left San Juan on the 7th inst. She reports the steamship Northern Light, with which she sailed in company, bound to New York, with about three hundred passengers.

The largest lump of the precious metal ever brought to the States is in the hands of one of the passengers. It weighs 28 pounds, and was discovered in the vicinity of Carson Creek, in a shaft of sixty feet deep.

Mrs Ann Hoag.—A Northern exchange gives the following particulars of the early life and criminal career of Ann Hoag, who was hung at Poughkeepsie, N. Y., on the 30th ult., for the murder of Nelson Hoag, her husband:

She was born in the town of Milan, Dutchess county, in the spring of 1821. She was deserted by her parents, and left a foundling in the public streets. The deserted infant was taken into the family of Henry Taylor, Esq., a wealthy gentleman, residing at Red Hook, in the same county, and adopted as their daughter. At the age of twelve years she was sent to a boarding-school for two or three years, and received a fair education. She mingled among the friends and relatives of her adopted parents, and was respected and esteemed by all who knew her. As she advanced towards her eighteenth year, a resident of the same town, named Nelson Hoag, became her suitor, and after a brief courtship they were married. Her husband was the owner of a small farm in the interior of Dutchess county, where they lived happily together for several years. Subsequently they removed to the town of Dover, rather reduced in circumstances, owing to unfortunate speculations. Meanwhile, Ann became the mother of five children. Even in her days of adversity she conducted herself with propriety, and proved herself a faithful and affectionate wife until about the beginning of the year 1851, when she contracted an unholy passion for a young man named Wm. Summers, whose paramour she subsequently became, and thus rapidly traveled the road of crime which has ended in an ignominious [illegible]

Blindly by guilty passion, the ill-starred woman plunged into misery and degradation, renounced virtue, reputation, husband and children, with the deliberate purpose of removing all barriers to the complete abandonment of herself to crime. It was in July, 1851, that she resolved to commit [illegible] the atrocious crime of taking the life of her husband, which purpose she accomplished by mingling arsenic with his daily food, until he died. In the month of March following, she was tried and convicted, and the sentence of death pronounced by Hon. Judge Barculo, who fixed the day of execution on the 7th of May, 1852. As the appointed time for the execution approached, a respite was granted until the 30th of July, when the unfortunate woman was about again to become a mother. Jonas Williams, the negro, who was executed with Ann Hoag, was convicted of the unnatural crime of committing a rape on his step-daughter, aged eleven years, from the effects of which she died.

Somebody lets off the following on the marriage of Mr. John Rush to Miss Sarah Canter:

At first she went it with a Canter,
But finished with a Rush.

Liverpool, July 31.

There has been an active demand in the Cotton market during the week, and the sales reach 115,000 bales of which speculators have taken 40,000 and exporters 12,000 bales. Money and Trade.

Money continues abundant in the London market, and the rates are easy; Consols close at 100 to 100⅛.

In the Senate, the Indian Appropriation was passed, after which the Fisheries question was taken up. Mr. Soule is now making a speech on this subject.

Washington, August 13.

The House wasted the evening session, last night, in trifling discussions.

In the Senate, Mr. Soulé made an eloquent and powerful speech in favor of the American rights to the fisheries. He said that the people of the United States would submit to all propositions, and oppose all peace negotiations forced by the British Government, while their vessels were lying under the range of British cannon. They would not treat under threats.

The debate was pursued by Mr. Cass, Mr. Butler, and the subject was postponed (Saturday).

CONSTITUTION OF THE STATE OF LOUISIANA.
Adopted in Convention July 31, 1852.

PREAMBLE.

We, the people of the State of Louisiana, do ordain and establish this Constitution:

TITLE I.

DISTRIBUTION OF POWERS.

ART. 1. The powers of the government of the State of Louisiana shall be divided into three distinct departments, and each of them be confided to a separate body of magistracy, to-wit: those which are Legislative to one, those which are Executive to another, and those which are Judicial to another.

ART. 2. No one of these Departments, nor any person holding office in one of them, shall exercise power properly belonging to either of the others, except in the instances hereinafter expressly directed or permitted.

TITLE II.

LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.

ART. 3. The Legislative power of the State shall be vested in two distinct branches, the one to be styled the "House of Representatives," the other the Senate, and both the "General Assembly" of the State of Louisiana.

ART. 4. The members of the House of Representatives shall continue in service for the term of two years from the day of the closing of the general election.

ART. 5. Representatives shall be chosen on the first Monday in November every two years; and the election shall be completed in one day. The General Assembly shall meet annually, on the third Monday in January, unless a different day be appointed by law, and their sessions shall be held at the seat of government.

ART. 6. Every duly qualified elector, under this Constitution, shall be eligible to a seat in the General Assembly, provided that no person shall be a Representative or Senator unless he be, at the time of his election, a duly qualified voter of the Representative or Senatorial district from which he is elected.

ART. 7. Elections for members of the General Assembly shall be held at the several election precincts established by law. The Legislature may designate the parish or establishing election precincts to the parochial or municipal authorities.

ART. 8. Representation in the House of Representatives shall be equal and uniform, and shall be regulated and ascertained by the total population of each of the several parishes of the State. Each parish shall have at least one Representative. No new parish shall be created with a territory less than six hundred and twenty-five square miles, nor with a population less than the full number entitling it to a Representative, nor when the creation of such new parish would leave any other parish without the said extent of territory and amount of population.

The first enumeration by the State authorities under this Constitution shall be made in the year 1853, the second in the year 1858, the third in the year 1865; after which time the General Assembly shall direct in what manner the census shall be taken, so that it be made at least once in every period of ten years, for the purpose of ascertaining the total population in each parish and election district.

At the first regular session of the Legislature, after the making of each enumeration, the Legislature shall apportion the representation among the several parishes and election districts on the basis of the total population as aforesaid. A representative number shall be fixed, and each parish and election district shall be entitled to representatives as its aggregate population contains it to, and an additional Representative for any fraction exceeding one-half the Representative number. The number of Representatives shall not be more than one hundred, nor less than seventy. Until an apportionment is made [illegible] first enumeration to be made [illegible] the Representation in the House of Representatives shall be established by law.

All that part of the parish of Orleans as bounded by the limits of the present city of New Orleans, including that part of the parish of Orleans, formerly known as the city of Lafayette.

All that part of the parish of Orleans which is situated on the left bank of the Mississippi river shall be divided by the Legislature into not more than two Representative districts, and until a new apportionment shall be made according to the first census to be taken under this Constitution, that part of the city of New Orleans which was comprised within the former limits of the city of Lafayette, shall vote for Senators from the parish of Orleans, and form the tenth Representative District, and shall elect two out of the three Representatives now apportioned by law to the parish of Jefferson; the other Representative District shall remain as they are now established.

ART. 9. The House of Representatives shall choose its Speaker and other officers.

ART. 10. Every free white male who has attained the age of twenty-one years, and who has been a citizen of the State twelve months next preceding the election, and the last six months thereof in the parish he offers to vote, and who shall be a citizen of the United States, shall have the right of suffrage; no voter on removing from one Parish to another within the State, shall lose the right of voting in the former until he shall have acquired it in the latter. Electors shall in all cases, except treason, felony, or breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest, during their attendance at, going to, or returning from elections.

ART. 11. The Legislature shall provide by law, that the names and residence of all qualified electors of the city of New Orleans, shall be registered, in order to entitle them to vote; but the registry shall be free of cost to elector.

ART. 12. No soldier, seaman or marine in the army or navy of the United States, no pauper, no person under interdiction, nor under conviction of any crime punishable with hard labor, shall be entitled to vote at any election in this State.

ART. 13. No person shall be entitled to vote at any election held in this State, except in the Parish of his residence, and in cities and towns divided into election districts, in the election precinct in which he resides.

ART. 14. The members of the Senate shall be chosen for the term of four years. The Senate, when assembled, shall have the power to choose its officers.

ART. 15. The Legislature, in every year in which they shall apportion representation in the House of Representatives, shall divide the State into Senatorial Districts. No Parish shall be divided in the formation of a Senatorial District—the Parish of Orleans excepted. And when ever a new Parish shall be created, it shall be attached to the Senatorial District from which part of its territory was taken, or to such contiguous District, at the discretion of the Legislature, but shall not be attached to more than one District. The number of Senators shall be thirty-two, and they shall be apportioned among the Senatorial Districts according to the total population contained in the several Districts.—Provided, that no Parish shall be entitled to more than five Senators.

ART. 16. In all apportionments of the Senate, the population of the city of New Orleans shall be deducted from the population of the whole State, and the remainder of the population divided by the number thirty-seven, (37,) and the result produced by this division shall be the Senatorial ratio entitling a Senatorial District to a Senator. Single or contiguous Parishes shall be formed into Districts, having a population the nearest possible to the number entitling a District to a Senator; and if, in the apportionment to be made, a Parish or District fall short of or exceed that ratio one-fifth, then a District may be formed having not more than two Senators, but not otherwise. No new apportionment shall have the effect of abridging the term of service of any Senator already elected at the time of making the apportionment. After an enumeration has been made as directed in the eighth Article, the Legislature shall not pass any law until an apportionment of Representation in both Houses of the General Assembly be made.

ART. 17. At the first session of the General Assembly after this Constitution takes effect, the Senators shall be equally divided by lot into two classes. The seats of the Senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the second year; of the second class at the expiration of the fourth year; so that one-half shall be chosen every two years, and a majority thereby kept up perpetually. In case any District shall have elected two or more Senators, the Senators shall vacate their seats respectively at the end of two and four years, and lots shall be drawn therefor.

ART. 18. The first election for Senators shall be general throughout the State, and at the same time that the general election for Representatives is held; and thereafter there shall be biennial elections to fill the place of those whose time of service may have expired.

ART. 19. Not less than a majority of the members of each house of the General Assembly shall form a quorum to do business, but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and shall be authorized by law to compel the attendance of absent members.

ART. 20. Each house of the General Assembly shall judge of the qualification, elections and returns of its members; but a contested election shall be determined in such a manner as shall be directed by law.

ART. 21. Each house of the General Assembly may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish a member for disorderly behavior, and with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member, but not a second time for the same offence.

ART. 22. Each house of the General Assembly shall keep and publish weekly a journal of its proceedings; and the yeas and nays of the members on any question shall, at the desire of any two of them, be entered on the journal.

ART. 23. Each house may punish by imprisonment during its session not exceeding ten days, any one not a member, for disrespectful and disorderly conduct in its presence, or for obstructing any of its proceedings. Such imprisonment shall not at any one time exceed ten days, nor at any one session for any one offence.

ART. 24. Neither house, during the session of the General Assembly, shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other place than that in which they may be sitting.

ART. 25. The members of the General Assembly shall receive from the public treasury a compensation for their services, which shall be four dollars a day during their attendance, going to and returning from the session of their respective houses. The compensation may be increased or diminished by law; but no alteration shall take effect during the period of service of the members of the House of Representatives by whom such alteration shall have been made. No session shall extend to a period beyond sixty days, to date from its commencement, and any legislative action had after the expiration of the said sixty days, shall be null and void. This provision shall not apply to the first Legislature which is to convene after the adoption of this Constitution.

ART. 26. The members of the General Assembly shall, in all cases except treason, felony, breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the sessions of their respective Houses, and going to or returning from the same, and for any speech or debate in either House, they shall not be questioned in any other place.

ART. 27. No Senator or Representative shall, during the term for which he was elected, nor for one year thereafter, be appointed or elected to any civil office of profit under this State, which shall have been created, or the emoluments of which shall have been increased during the time such Senator or Representative was in office, except to such offices or appointments as may be filled by the elections of the people.

ART. 28. No person who at any time may have been a collector of taxes, or who may have been otherwise entrusted with public money, whether State, Parish or Municipal, shall be eligible to the General Assembly, or to any office of profit or trust under the State Government, until he shall have obtained a discharge for the amount of such collections, and for all public moneys with which he may have been entrusted.

ART. 29. No bill shall have the force of a law until on three several days, it be read over in each House of the General Assembly, and free discussion allowed thereon, unless in case of urgency, four-fifths of the House where the bill shall be pending, may deem it expedient to dispense with this rule.

ART. 30. All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives, but the Senate may propose amendments as in other bills; provided they shall not introduce any new matter under color of an amendment, which does not relate to raising revenue.

ART. 31. The General Assembly shall regulate by law, by whom, and in what manner writs of election shall be issued to fill the vacancies which may happen in either branch thereof.

ART. 32. The Senate shall vote on the confirmation or rejection of officers to be appointed by the Governor, with the advice and consent of the Senate, by yeas and nays, and the names of the Senators voting for and against the appointments respectively, shall be entered on a journal to be kept for that purpose, and made public at the end of each session, or before.

ART. 33. Returns of all elections for members of the General Assembly shall be made to the Secretary of State.

ART. 34. In the year in which a regular election of a Senator of the United States is to take place, the members of the General Assembly shall meet in the Hall of the House of Representatives, on the Monday following the meeting of the Legislature, and proceed to the said election.

TITLE III.

The person having the greatest number of votes for Lieutenant Governor shall be Lieutenant Governor; but if two or more persons shall be equal and highest in the number of votes polled for Lieutenant Governor, one of them shall be immediately chosen Lieutenant Governor by joint vote of the members of the General Assembly.

ART. 48. The Governor shall have power to fill vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of the next session, unless otherwise provided for in this Constitution, but no person who has been nominated for office, and rejected by the Senate, shall be appointed to the same office during the recess of the Senate.

THE DYING CHRISTIAN.

The following lines were suggested by hearing an account of a converted heathen who, on his dying, exclaimed to a missionary present, "My boat is on the sea; its sails are spread, and I am only waiting for a breeze to waft me home!"

My boat is on the sea,
Tempestuous winds are gone;
The waves float past half joyfully,
While I look calmly on.

Days on days gone by,
When, launched upon the deep,
Winds howled and clouds rode in the sky,
While waves my boat would sweep.

My sails above I spread;
Those sails, how white they are!
How pure, while floating overhead,
Like some bright beacon star!

Once they were black as night,
With sin all stained and dark,
But Christ's pure blood has washed them white,
And hung them o'er my bark.

My boat is on the seas,
My sails are spread to-day,
I only wait a friendly breeze
To bear me hence away.

Joy! away! I long to go,
Kind winds, O come, O come!
Weary of my stay below,
I pine, I pant for home!

Come! come! sweet home! dear word!
When will the moment come!
Joy! I move; my sails are stirred;
Home! home! I'm going home!

WILLIAM M'KENDREE.

BY PROFESSOR LARRABEE.

WILLIAM M'KENDREE was born in the State of Virginia, in 1757. His parents were members of the American branch of the Church of England. When very young he became seriously disposed from reading the Bible in the common school. Naturally quick in his perceptions, thoughtful in his habits, and sensitive in his moral nature, he was affected by the simple and evident truths of the Divine revelation. He read the story of Jesus, his sensitive soul was moved at the exhibition which that story presented of love, of mercy, of goodness, of virtue, and of suffering. His clear perceptive power and his strong understanding enabled him to see and comprehend the nature and the design of the mission of Jesus Christ. He comprehended, so far as youth without personal instruction may do it, the doctrine of depravity, of the atonement, of repentance, of faith, and of regeneration. He became convinced of sin, and earnestly desired to be saved from wrath to flee from the wrath to come. He prayed, he wept, he read, he thought; but he had none to encourage, none to aid, none to guide him. Nor his associates, nor his parents, nor his parish minister knew any thing of experimental religion. They had never felt the godly sorrow for repentance; they had never exercised the faith that brings justification; they had never passed through the struggles of the new birth. The poor boy, in doubt and darkness, in distress and anxiety, wandered alone along a devious way, from childhood to youth, in search of that which he could not find; his heart found no place of rest; his heart found no object to grasp; his mind found nothing on which it could rely.

When he was about nineteen years old he heard, for the first time, a Methodist preacher. We have no means of determining who was in the providence of God, the honor and the glory of being the first to shed the light of the gospel truth along the dark path of the youthful M'Kendree. What Wesleyan first poured the soothing doctrines of grace to the sensitive mind? Was it Asbury himself? Or was it one of the American workers of blessed memory, raised up by Providence as heralds of salvation in those early days of Methodism? or Waters, or Dromgoole, or Pedicord, or Tunnel? The preaching of that Methodist, whoever it might be, fixed conviction, deep and pungent, to the heart of M'Kendree. He yielded to the conviction; he resolved to lead a new life. In accordance with Methodist usage—the usage then existing as members on trial all such are required "to flee the wrath to come, and to be saved from their sins"—he was admitted to that connection. The scene must surely have been a thrilling one, when the noble, the accomplished, the generous, the buoyant M'Kendree went forward, before the whole congregation, and gave his hand to the ministers of God. Little did he then think how glorious a career was before him.

Although he became a member of the connection, yet had he no evidence of conversion. He had only the form of godliness; the power he was seeking. Not, however, being yet fully aware of the illusory deceptions of the deceitful human heart, nor thoroughly versed in the way of truth and righteousness, he retained his social connections with his religious companions. They were civil, careful and moral, and he thought no evil. Result from keeping up his intercourse with them. Nor would any evil [illegible] thus had he been fully initiated in the holiness. But the seeker of religion must avoid intercourse with the careless and irreligious. Let him retire to the woods and pray alone. Let him wander along by the river sides, or ramble over the pastures, where undisturbed he may reflect and pray. Let him pour out his soul in secret prayer before his God alone. Let him not, during the process of conviction, mingle with the world. When, however, he becomes converted, then he may strengthen his brethren; and then he may safely mingle, if he but keep up in extent. Every three months he had to travel over it. The country was now, the rivers bridgeless, the woods pathless, and much of the territory houseless. It was his policy to advance with his corps of itinerants as fast and as far as emigration proceeded. Wherever the settler erected his log cabin, there stood M'Kendree to preach to him the Gospel. To reach the frontier settlements, and to pass from one settlement to another, he had often long, tedious and dangerous rides. He must wade through swamps, swim over rivers, and pick his way through the woods. Night often overtook him far from any dwelling. In such emergency he would dismount from his horse at some convenient spot, gather up a lot of fuel, kindle a fire, eat a morsel of food kindly put up for him at the last cabin, lie down under a tree, with the forest leaves for his bed, his saddle-bags for his pillow, and the overhanging foliage for his covering, and soundly sleep till morning.

He spent in these western wilds eight years. And they were years of wonderful interest. But we have no record in detail of the stirring scenes through which he passed. We only know that he preached with extraordinary power and success. He often preached at quarterly meetings and at camp meetings to immense multitudes. Effects followed similar to those which attended the preaching of Wesley at Bristol and at London, and of Whitefield at Kingwood and at Moorfields. Careless ones would be awakened to intense anxiety; hard-hearted veterans in sin would weep bitterly; athletic men would fall helpless as infants on the ground; deep conviction would seize on the sinner; earnest and fervent prayer would arise from lips from which but an hour before had proceeded only curses; then would arise songs of praise and shouts of victory, making the grand old forest ring with peans of triumph.

Fresh from the field of glory and of triumph, where for eight years he had been enjoying such success in his ministry as seldom crowns the labors of mortals, M'Kendree proceeded to the city of Baltimore, to attend the General Conference of 1808. He was a stranger in the city, having not, as I can learn, ever before visited it. He was a stranger to most of the members of the General Conference. Few of the junior preachers of the Eastern and Middle States, or of the Southern Atlantic States, had ever heard even the name of William M'Kendree. At that time mails and postoffices were few, and newspapers had hardly begun to be. There was not in any denomination a religious newspaper in America. The Methodists had no organ whatever of communication. Once in a great while a letter might be conveyed by the mail on some one of the great routes, and Bishop Asbury might thus, while in the South, be informed of the state of the churches North and East. But very few of the preachers knew any thing of what was transpiring in a distant section of the country. Though, therefore, rumors of the wonderful displays of power and grace exhibited in the West might have reached some of the Eastern preachers, yet few of them had any distinct information of the events, or any knowledge of the brave and chivalrous man who had so successfully led on the embattled hosts of the Lord.

Among the appointments for preaching on the first Sabbath of the General Conference, there was announced for the Light Street Church the name of William M'Kendree. When the hour of morning service arrived, there appeared an immense multitude of people, of all ranks and conditions of society, congregating in a populous city. The members of the General Conference were there, the polished and hospitable citizens were there, and the slaves were there. The house was crowded, positively packed full—full in the main body, full in the first gallery, full in the second gallery, and full in the pulpit. All eyes were turned to the stranger, as, at the appointed time, he entered the pulpit, and stood before them. He was a man of tall form and commanding appearance; but he was clothed in very coarse and homely garments, and his movements seemed to the genteel part of his audience awkward, and his manners rustic.

He read the hymn without much regard to rhythm or melody. He prayed with indistinct and faltering voice. He read his text without any regard to impressiveness. He introduced the main subject of his discourse with a few commonplace and uninteresting remarks. The spirit of the people died within them. Their expectations of an interesting discourse from the Western stranger seemed wholly disappointed. They made up their minds, as Christian people should, to bear as patiently as possible the dull and awkward sermon about to be inflicted on them.

But when the discourse was about half finished, a "change came over the spirit of their dream." Samson arose in his might and shook himself. The lion of the West made the walls of the Light Street, as he often had made the forests of Kentucky, ring with his powerful voice. The effect was tremendous. An electric impulse thrilled thro' every heart. The whole congregation seemed overwhelmed. Tears burst from the eye, and sobs and shrieks from the voice. Multitudes fell helpless from their seats, sudden as if shot with a rifle.

The preacher then changed the tone of his voice, and there followed from the enraptured multitude shouts of joy and acclamations of triumph and praise. He changed again, and a sweet and holy influence, like the mellow light of Indian summer floating over the autumn landscape, seemed to invest the assembly.

When he came down from the pulpit, the people gazed at him as they might at some messenger from another world, who had spoken to them in tones such as they had never heard before. The preachers, with one accord, said, "That is the man for a bishop." Accordingly the same week he was elected, [illegible] nothing of the stirring scenes of revival through which he passed, nor of the lights and shades of itinerancy on which he looked.

He suffered during the time a slight eclipse in the cloud that passed over the sky of Methodism in 1792, when O'Kelley withdrew from the Church. O'Kelley had been for several years M'Kendree's Presiding Elder, and had, of course, acquired over him much influence, which he failed not to use in procuring disaffection toward the Church. M'Kendree, however, did not become deeply involved. At the Conference of 1792, when the difficulties came to a crisis, he declined taking an appointment, and sent Bishop Asbury his "resignation in writing." But a short time after the adjournment of the Conference, he met the Bishop, withdrew his resignation, and took a regular appointment at Norfolk.

In the autumn of 1800, Bishop Asbury and Bishop Whatcoat, passing through Virginia on their way to the West, took M'Kendree along with them. He was the very man, as the event proved, for a pioneer in the West. They gave him charge of the whole Western Conference, including all the State of Ohio, of Kentucky, and of Tennessee, with all that part of Virginia lying on the Kanawha, and [illegible] missions in Illinois and in Mississippi.

It might seem inexpedient, as a general rule, for an ecclesiastical body to elect a man to an office so important on an impulse so sudden. Yet in this case the choice was most fortunate. No man in the American Methodist Church at that time united in his person so many admirable qualifications for the office as did William M'Kendree. As a man, he was single hearted, magnanimous, generous, and of most refined and exquisite sensibility. As a Christian he was deeply pious. As a minister, he was, in power and success, a prince among his brethren. He was thoroughly acquainted with the Discipline and government of the Church; probably better versed in ecclesiastical law than any of his contemporaries, except Asbury.

He held the office of bishop for twenty-seven years. During the first twelve years he was effective and vigorous, traveling annually from the Mississippi of the West to the Merrimack of the East, and from the Saint Lawrence of the North to the St. Mary's of the South. For the last fifteen years of his life he was deeply afflicted by disease. He suffered at times intensely. Owing to his severe afflictions, the General Conference, by unanimous vote, released him from all obligation to travel at large; yet still he pursued, so far as he possibly could, his usual rounds, often traveling from one end of the continent to the other when he was so infirm as to have to be assisted by his attendants in getting into his carriage or out of it.

He retained, during the twelve years of his effective service, all the energy, the eloquence and the power of his early days.

During the tedious years of his physical decline, from 1820 till his death in 1835, he continued, whenever it was possible for him to move, or be moved to his carriage by friendly hands, to travel over the continent, preaching occasionally, overseeing the interests of the Church, and aiding, by his counsel and advice, his associates and the preachers in the prudent and efficient discharge of their official duties. In the summer of 1824, after having attended the General Conference at Baltimore, he made an extensive tour over the Alleghany Mountains to the Ohio river, across the country from Wheeling to Sandusky; on Lake Erie, thence south through the central portions of Ohio to Shelbyville in Kentucky, and west through Indiana and Illinois to the Mississippi, and again south to Nashville. In 1828, after the adjournment of the General Conference at Pittsburgh, he made an extensive tour through Kentucky, Tennessee, Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina and Virginia. Having visited the churches, so far as his health admitted, all along this western and southern tour, he attended the Annual Conferences at Baltimore and at Philadelphia, and then returned Southwest to Nashville.

In the spring of 1832 he proceeded to Philadelphia, to attend the General Conference. On his arrival in Philadelphia, he was too feeble to attend regularly the sessions of the Conference. Occasionally he would be seen feebly walking up the aisle, and taking a seat by the side of his colleagues; but he could remain in the room only a short time. His last visit to the Conference room was made the day before the adjournment. Having remained as long as his strength would admit, he arose to retire to his lodgings. He was but too conscious of his approaching dissolution ever to expect to meet his brethren again in another General Conference. Leaning on his staff, his tall and manly form bent with age and infirmity, his eyes suffused with tears, his voice faltering with emotion, he exclaimed, "My brethren and children, love one another!" Then spreading forth his hands, and raising his eyes to heaven, he pronounced, in impressive accents, the apostolic benediction. Then slowly and sadly he left the house, to return no more.

On the 23d of November, 1834, he preached, at the Methodist Church in Nashville, his last sermon. From this time he continued to decline till his death, which occurred at the house of his brother, near Nashville, on the 5th of March, 1835.

As this eminent soldier of the cross, this captain of the hosts of the Lord, this leader of the armies of the faithful, was standing, at the age of nearly fourscore years, on the last heights of earth, looking back on his heroic career for half a century, looking around on the spoils he had won from sin, and looking forward along the dark and perilous way to that "undiscovered country, from whose bourn no traveler returns," he cried out, in accents of confidence, "All is well!" As he descended to the valley of the shadow of death, and stood looking on the "land of darkness as darkness itself, and of the shadow of death, without any order, and where the very light is as darkness," he cried again, in tones of faith, "All is well!" As he plunged into the deep and dark shadows, and stood by that lethean stream, whose oblivious waters all of earth must cross, his voice again was heard resounding through the gloom, "All is well!" When, descending to the brink, he had committed himself to the stream, and the deep, dark and returnless tide was bearing him on, the words again arose above the roar of the waters, "All is well!" Faintly yet sweetly the echo of those words, from the hill of the heavenly Zion, seems yet to come back to the children of earth, "All is well!"

"Every word of God is pure; he is a shield unto them who put their trust in Him."

How true! how pure, the Word of Life,
To those who trust in Him;
With heavenly treasures always rife,
To bless the soul within.
Riches divine in it appear
Which never fly away,
Written in Jesus' hand most clear,
As with a sun-lit ray.
Here may the poor obtain their wealth,
With certain, sure success;
By faith and prayer, and not by stealth,
The humble God will bless.
Here, the distressed may find relief,
A rest of sweet repose;
A promise for each child of grief,
A balm for all their woes,
A shield to meet each wily foe,
The tempter to disarm—
Each subtle scheme to overthrow,
By Christ's all powerful arm.
Who would not treasure up its gems,
Of such immortal worth?
More brilliant than those diadems
Which crown the kings of earth.
The Word of God! how sweet it is!
How precious to the heart,
Tinged with the hues of heaven's own bliss,
Which never can depart:
This earth may fade, the planets fall,
But still His word will stand
Above the wreck, the fun'ral pall,
Amid the spirit land.
O! pilgrims, trust to it alone!
'Tis steadfast, firm and sure;
It will a seat near Jesus throne,
To thy own soul secure.

A PLAN FOR THE ENDOWMENT

OF CENTENARY COLLEGE, LA.

MR. EDITOR: I beg to submit to the public the following plan, which was adopted at the late meeting of the Trustees and Visitors, for the endowment of Centenary College:

We suppose it will be conceded by all that no College is safe unless it is endowed; for thousands of circumstances may occur to diminish the patronage, cut off the support of the Faculty, and finally destroy the institution. Still professorships in Colleges should not be sinecures. A College Faculty should be made of faithful, laborious men. No lover of ease should ever seek a place in a College. The plan proposed by the Trustees, and which, I trust, will be seconded by the entire community, requires the Faculty, by their untiring exertions, to endow the College. It throws the labor upon the very men who ought to be the most deeply interested in the success of the Institution.

According to the plan, I am authorized to sell five hundred scholarships at $250 each; the scholarship to commence so soon as five hundred subscribers are obtained, and to continue twenty-five years. Here, then, is the plan. 1st. Scholarships at $250 each. 2d. Not to take effect until all the five hundred are sold. 3d. To continue twenty-five years, commencing with the date of the sale of the last scholarship.

Notice the advantages this plan offers to the purchaser. 1st. It reduces tuition from fifty to ten dollars per annum; or 2d. It offers twenty years' tuition gratis, if any person will pay five years in advance. Tuition for twenty-five years would amount to twelve hundred and fifty dollars; the purchase of scholarships upon this plan saves, then, one thousand dollars. There is no bogging. The College offers inducements even to speculators, and invites safe investments from the capitalist. The Faculty work for the endowment. The endowment secures patronage, and patronage ensures the endowment. All the subscribers become interested in the College; it becomes their property; they are the stockholders in a concern which yields a more profitable per cent. than any other investment they can make.

I appeal to the ministers of the two Conferences to present this matter to the people. Now is the time to do this. A deep and all-pervading interest is taking hold of the minds of the Southern people in behalf of their own home institutions. We can, we must have Southern Colleges. An endowment such as we ask, places this Southern College on a permanent basis.

I know you dislike to beg; but we do not ask you to solicit charity; we ask you to aid us in selling scholarships cheaper than they were ever offered by any Southern institution, so far as my knowledge extends. We ask you, we entreat you to enter with your accustomed zeal and energy upon this matter, and no crumbling walls, nor prostrate Institution will bear mournful evidence of another failure. But in all coming time Centenary College will continue "a bright and shining light," a living testimony of your wisdom, piety and zeal. To the members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, I beg leave to make a most earnest appeal. Suffer one who was born and educated at the South, and who has devoted eighteen years to the advancement of Southern Education, to entreat you to look this matter fully in the face. You are offered the privilege of endowing your college and reaping an immense profit. We do not ask you to give, but we do solicit you to buy. Alumni of the College, honorary and regular, help in this great work.

Finally, to all Southern parents, to the people of Louisiana and Mississippi, especially, we present this plan, and offer to sell these scholarships.

R. H. RIVERS.

A man who lived much in society, said

MACON FEMALE COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE OF THE ALABAMA CONFERENCE, MISSISSIPPI.

The annual Examination of this Institution commenced on Friday, the 23d of July, and closed on the following Tuesday. A larger number of visitors attended the examination than have any previous year. Also, the Board of Visitors was full. The teachers and the young Misses received them with a cheerfulness and freedom which plainly indicated that they all had been preparing for their inquisitive guests, and were ready and fully competent to pass through the expected ordeal.

The first class the Committee heard was the class in French, by Ollendorf's system of teaching. Considering the time the class had devoted to this study, they acquitted themselves with much credit, evincing a knowledge of the rules and idioms of the language and correct pronunciation.

Miss Stockley's classes in English Grammar, Geography and Roman History, gave general satisfaction. They spoke with such clearness as evinced a familiarity of the text-books they had studied—given in their own language.

Mr. Poindexter's classes in Mental Arithmetic, in Cæsar, Physiology, Natural, Moral and Mental Philosophies, and also in Algebra, Geometry and Grecian History, all showed that they had been taught with great care, and satisfied the committee that each student was acquainted with the general principles of the sciences they had studied.

These recitations were spiced, at intervals, with instrumental music on the piano and violin, in concert, by Prof. Landman and the young ladies.

On Sunday an appropriate discourse was preached by Dr. Neely, the appointee for the occasion. The subject was a timely one, and was delivered in his usual eloquent and forcible style.

On Monday, in sight of the Institute, the corner stone for a Methodist Episcopal Church was laid with Masonic ceremonies, and an address on the occasion was given by the same gentleman—then a collection of three hundred and seventy-five dollars was taken towards making up the deficit for building the house, which is to be of brick, and will cost seven thousand dollars.

At night the young ladies entertained a large audience, by reading some very graphic compositions—several quite amusing. A colloquy was also spoken by several Misses, which produced no little merriment. It was a pithy hint to parents who find fault with teachers, that dunces are not always manufactured in the school room, but rather à la maison.

On Tuesday, the Rev. W. H. Milburn pronounced an oration before a large and intelligent audience. It was one of his happy efforts, and an almost breathless silence pervaded the whole assembly for an hour and ten minutes, broken occasionally with bursts of laughter and applauding.

On Tuesday night the young ladies' concert came off. The house was filled to overflowing, which caused excessive heat, and necessarily detracted from the melody and sweetness of the music. The young ladies, however, sung and played with excellent good taste, as all must admit, upon the sweetest toned pianos we have ever heard in a school room. Professor Landman is one of the best performers on the piano and violin. He touches the keys with an exquisite softness that few ever excel in. He had succeeded, too, in imparting this finished touch to his pupils, who were successful imitators. A comic dialogue was acted in the mean time, but previous to drawing the curtain, in the acme of the excitement, a bonus, to the tune of a hundred and sixty dollars, was politely solicited of the gentlemen as a privilege, by the fair actresses, to replenish the young ladies' library, which was readily responded to, and in less than ten minutes was forthcoming. This money, laid out judiciously, will make quite an addition to their already well selected library—the largest and choicest collection we have seen in any institute of the kind. It is certainly a consideration highly creditable to the founders. We know of no more valuable acquisition to an institution of learning, than a choice library, where the young can cultivate a habit of useful reading. If children are not taught to acquire a taste for reading while getting an education, they seldom acquire a taste in after life, other than novel reading. This should be one very strong inducement to parents to send their daughters where they can avail themselves of useful reading books. Macon is one of the most desirable locations in the country for a permanent school. The buildings stand in a retired and elevated spot, overlooking the whole town, which presents a most beautiful landscape to the eye. The buildings have been fitted up in a convenient style; besides, resolutions were passed by the Trustees to make additional improvements. A well conducted boarding hall is attached to the school, where, if the parents choose, they can place their daughters under the immediate control of the teachers and matron.

The Institute is under the protection of the Alabama Conference. An efficient Board of Trustees has the especial control. They intend to spare no pains to make this equal, in every way, to her sister Conference institutions; hence the best of teachers will be employed by the Board to teach every branch necessary for an accomplished education. The friends of education are earnestly solicited to send their children to this school, and especially the members of that denomination it represents. While we wish well to all schools for education, we must be zealous for our own. A cry is raised by some against sectarian schools, but we know of no good schools but what are decidedly denominational. This is doubtless best. It causes an emulation by which good schools are being raised up in all parts of the country.

NOTES OF AN ITINERANT.

MR. EDITOR: In my former I reached the point where I resigned my field of labor in the hands of my colleague, in order to survey new fields. (Here I shall in part occupy the ground I went over in a former communication.) I hastened to my father's house to arrange my outfit for the new enterprise, after which I took my leave of relatives and friends, and mounted a fine horse and started southward, passing through Murfreesborough, Shelbyville, Fayetteville and Huntsville, and crossed the Tennessee river at Ditto's Landing—a place where we crossed in the army. Now I entered a lonely, uninhabitable country; only a few Indian countrymen squatters on the road or trail going to the New Settlements, on the Black Warrior and Cahawba rivers. I rode some [illegible] miles, and came to a cabin on the road. Here I inquired for the next house, which was but a few miles ahead; and while the man was giving me directions, I overheard the lady say, "Don't let him go there, for he is a preacher." This determined me to stay; so I alighted from my horse, and was kindly treated. I talked with them about religion, and prayed with them. This was on the spur of the Cumberland mountain; it was some twenty-five miles across it. When I reached the other side I struck the head springs of the Black Warrior river. Here was the noted cave called the Bear Meat Cabin, once a small Indian village—now the seat of justice for Blount county.

Here I found a settlement sufficient to justify leaving an appointment, the commencement of a circuit. [illegible] for at this time the settlements were [illegible] and people had to carry their [illegible] thirty or forty miles; as for [illegible] were not thought of, for if we could [illegible] the substantials we were [illegible] ceeding southward, crossing the Warrior, reaching [illegible] Valley, I formed a preaching [illegible] Reed's—a worthy, unassuming family.

During one of my visits to this family I witnessed a circumstance worthy a place in print, from which I have been benefitted through life. About sunset, there came in some half dozen men, on their way to St. Stephens, as members of the Convention to form a constitution for the State. Such was the condition of the family there were but few conveniences; say two chairs, and the balance stools.

In the [illegible] was quite a young man, very forward; supper was announced and the young man seized one of the chairs and seated himself; the next youngest stood off for a time; at length [illegible] one saw him, and called to him, "Will you come to supper?" to which he replied, "I am waiting to see whether older folks are seated." The rebuke was severely felt, and I have no doubt he was benefitted by it, so that I always have given my children a reference, and hope I shall never forget to practice old age. Not so with [illegible] men.

When I reached Jones Valley I found an admirable family—the Rev. David Owen. I formed several preaching places and societies in this extensive Valley. From there I went to Roop's Valley, and thence to Cahawba Valley, crossing it at the Falls so called. I found a Baptist preaching place, and found the preacher at the house, where I [illegible]. It was Saturday night. Sabbath morning the preacher went across the road to a [illegible] and got his dram, before prayer or [illegible].

I left soon, and went to Brother [illegible]'s, where there was a two days' meeting. When I got there they were holding a Love Feast, there being several local ministers there—the Rev. Dr. West, Joseph Walker, Drew [illegible] Powell and J. D. Lee. This was a [illegible] settlement; among them some Tennessee and Georgians. Here I had the first camp meeting and quarterly conference ever held in the new country.

Through this valley I had several appointments, and successful ones, too. From the upper end of this Valley I went to Simm's Settlement, on Beaver Creek, a pretty good settlement. The next place of note I found was Catawley town, on Canoe Creek. Here I found myself on the same ground where I had been five years before, contending with the hostile Indians—now I was able to form societies and preach the Gospel where but a few years before the savage roamed the forest, and wild beasts of prey were heard to howl, etc. Completing a circle of several hundred miles, I got to the [illegible] for six or seven months was [illegible] nor heard of a traveling preacher. At this time I had many obstacles [illegible] Providence ruling the wind [illegible].

One circumstance I will [illegible]. I had deposited what money I [illegible] D. Owen, reserving only the amount which I thought would serve me until I should get there again; but I found myself more than one hundred miles from my money, and but thirty-seven and a half cents to go on. I thought the next morning, when my bill was presented, I would put a fine watch in pawn for ten dollars, to get me back to my deposit. I preached to a fine congregation of attentive hearers, collected in a few hours notice. After preaching, an old Irishman by the name of Mathew Gage, invited me home with him. He was an old backwoodsman. After supper and prayer with the family, all [illegible] of them, the old lady dropped into my saddle-bags money enough to carry me where my money was. This I thought was from the Lord, just as much as if I had taken the fish out of the water at the command of the Lord. Since this time the old man has [illegible] and I claim to have lived happy in the Church several years, died and went to heaven. The Lord never fails to provide for his own.

Idleness is the dead sea that [illegible] virtues, and the [illegible]

Saturday Morning, August 21.

THOUGHTS ON THE PEARL OF GREAT PRICE.

"Again the kingdom of Heaven is like unto a merchant-man seeking goodly pearls; who, when he had found one pearl of great price, went and sold all that he had and bought it." [Mat. xiii, 44-46.

The merchant-man was SEEKING pearls when he found the one of great price. Not like the man in the preceding parable, who had the good fortune, without seeking, to stumble upon "treasure hid in a field"—as one who might accidentally come into church, thoughtless, and be cut to the heart, and all of a sudden, out of the midst of sin, be found crying for mercy.

The merchant-man, on the contrary, is looking for GOODLY PEARLS; he tries to find that which is good. "Good Master, what good thing shall I do that I may have eternal life?" He may, like Paul, strive after perfection by the law, and, after the straightest sect of his religion, live a Pharisee; or, in a lower sense, may try to be a patriot, taking Washington as his file-leader; or a philanthropist, such as Howard was; or a merchant, after some one of less note than they, but of equal integrity; or he may strive to be a perfect gentleman, self-denying, thoughtful, generous, pure: for all these things are good, and as the diamond dust which is scattered in cutting, so from Christianity have been scattered these notions of excellence.

Such are sometimes happy enough to find ONE PEARL of great price, one of greater value than ever they had pictured to themselves; that "the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus" is itself all that true value they seek after; that His patriotism, His generosity, His gentleness, His purity, His mind, are the chief good, the to kalon of this life.

The late discovery fills with joy, for "happy is the man that FINDETH wisdom." "She is more precious than rubies; and all the things thou canst desire are not to be compared unto her." Eternal life is in her right hand.

It is in this [illegible] admiration that the merchant-man SOLD ALL THAT HE HAD to gain possession of the pearl. The condition is, "If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in Heaven: and come and follow me." The promise is, "And every one that hath forsaken houses, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, for my name's sake, shall receive an hundred fold, and shall inherit everlasting life." Christ offers the sinner to pay the large debt which he owes, upon condition that all he has shall be given up. This is the only price, marked upon the pearl, "ALL YOU HAVE;" your house, your bed, your ring, your name, your fame, your all. It is truly of great price, if one only estimates what it cost to buy it—Not to mention our little all, the friend of sinners, our friend, GAVE HIMSELF for it: "I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly."

Willing was the merchant to obtain it at such price! See how as he went right away to sell what he had, that the chance might not escape him. O, if he had the world he would give it! And well he might, for his Saviour had paid ten thousand times more: "See," He said, "here I put in my crown, my vestments of glistening beauty, my immortal home; all is paid down, and life and love is yours."

It is his! he has BOUGHT IT. Strange fiction, not of the law, but of grace, to say so: how little, after all, has he given for it. He is amazed at his own success:

"The greatest debt humility;
The wonder, why such love to me!"

And now, it does not lessen by possession, as do most goodly things. He says, "Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire besides thee." Every way he turns his precious gem it is beautiful, like the light of a jasper. It is the ticket, "a white stone," which entitles him to a high seat; for at those gates who shall be able to enter, save he that hath the pearl of great price?

"LIZZIE" NEWTON.

MRS. LAURA A. L. GOODWYN, wife of Rev. A. E. Goodwyn, of the Louisiana Conference, the accomplished lady who has been so favorably known as a contributor to this and other of our church periodicals, under the above signature, died August 13, at Plaquemine, La., after an illness of several weeks.

Her health had been delicate for some months, but not alarmingly so. Her friends hoped that she might live long to shed the lustre of her gentle, pure nature upon a future and developing literary career. But she is cut off in youth and in the midst of promise. It was only the other day that we saw her reading a composition, one of the graduating class of the Alabama Centenary Institute. She took the first honor there in 1848. Then presently she appeared a happy Methodist preacher's wife fairly out on the voyage of actual life; and now, soon afterward, that her bark had gone but a little way, she saw Jesus walking on the sea and drawing nigh; and she was afraid. But he said, It is I, be not afraid. Then she willingly received him into the ship; and immediately the ship was at the land whither she went.

She was born in Georgia, May 12, 1827. Her body now sleeps upon the bank of the Mississippi.

MATERIAL AID.

A money article! We are told by one who ought to know, that a good money article would at this time very much promote the interest of the Advocate, and, indeed, is needed. We will divide this subject into two parts:

1. Reminding of Promises.—At the late Conferences of Alabama and Louisiana, the members resolved, with most cheering heartiness, to secure twenty new subscribers, each, to the N. Orleans Christian Advocate. Brethren, the time before you is enough, and not more than enough, for fulfilling that resolution. Bring the subject before the people, and redeem that pledge to your publishing committees and the paper. It can be done, we doubt not. The resolution was made considerately, and with intention to carry it out: so we believed then, and now. We only remind you of it.

2. Reminding of Necessities.—Weekly expenses are heavy, and recur with singular promptness, whether the mail arrives or not, with letters from the agents, containing MATERIAL AID. While we labor, we lean for this aid on you—the agents. The religious press, with all its sacred vigor and influence, is really in your hands. We can do nothing without you.

Besides the two Conferences mentioned, in their official action, the New Orleans Christian Advocate has many and strong friends in Mississippi, Arkansas, Florida and East Texas. From these all we are frequently receiving tokens for good. Let them be multiplied. Individuals whose advance subscription is now due, will please feel at liberty, if no agent calls on them, to forward the amount to us without delay.

RELIGIOUS PERSECUTION.

The following is the letter from Madam Madiai to her husband, alluded to by our French correspondent, last week. If Eve did tempt Adam to sin, her daughters have largely made amends for this pristine weakness of the sex by heroic devotion to the truth and its holy cause. They have made the heart of man strong to resist temptation, to bear up under great adversities for religion's sake. Would that the world were full of such "affectionate wives" as Rosa Madiai.

The letter was written from prison, June 7, 1852, after the Judge had concluded the condemnation:

"My Dear Madiai—You know that I have always loved you, but how much more I ought to love you, now that we have been together in the battle of the Great King—that we have been beaten, but not vanquished! I hope that through the merits of Jesus Christ, God our Father will have accepted our testimony, and will give us grace to drink, to the last drop, the portion of that bitter cup which is prepared for us with returning of thanks. My good Madiai, life is only a day, and a day of grief! Yesterday we were young, to-day we are old! Nevertheless, we can say, with old Simeon, 'Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation.'

"Courage, my dear, since we know by the Holy Spirit that this Christ, loaded with opprobrium, trodden down, and calumniated, is our Saviour; and we, by His holy light and power, are called to defend the holy Cross, and Christ who died for us, receiving his reproaches, that we may afterwards participate in his glory. Do not fear if the punishment be hard. God, who made the chains fall from Peter, and opened the doors of his prison, will never forget us. Keep in good spirits; let us trust entirely in God. Let me see you cheerful, as I trust, by the same grace, you will see me cheerful. I embrace you with my whole heart.

"Your affectionate wife,

"ROSA MADIAI."

PRAYER ANSWERED.

Our readers will remember a publication of a concert of prayer for Colleges, that God would pour out his Spirit upon them, converting the students. God has proved, in this case also, to be a prayer-hearing God, and given his people increased reason for putting their hope in Him. The Congregational Journal has gathered the statistics below. Several new items could be added:

"The President of Howard College, a Baptist institution in Alabama, states that 12 of the students have been converted during a period of religious interest, and 15 or 20 of the pupils in the Judson Female Institute. We have been at special pains, says the Journal, to preserve a full list of the colleges and seminaries which have been graciously visited since the annual concert, and adding Howard College to those already given, find the whole number to be sixteen, which we believe has never been exceeded in the most favored year of college revivals. Besides these, six or seven academies and seminaries have shared in the blessing. In three of the colleges about 200 conversions occurred; and if only three times as many occurred in the 13 others, the whole number of conversions in all the colleges in the country would be about 800—a signal illustration of the power of prayer, and a source of encouragement."

CHINA CORRESPONDENCE.—Rev. B. Jenkins has kindly furnished us, for the N. O. C. Advocate, with copies of the letters from Chiun which are being published in several of our contemporaries. We regret that the first four numbers have not come to hand.

UNIONTOWN, ALA. CONF.—Rev. J. D. Fisher writes, date August 14:

"We are doing pretty well here, I think. Sometime since we had a delightful meeting here, which resulted in the conversion of six souls. As many were added to the Church."

JUVENILE MISSIONARIES.—A member of the Louisiana Conference writes:

"By reason of my Juvenile Missionary Societies, my missionary money, already some $50 over the assessed amount, is continually increasing."

GREAT REVIVAL.—The frigate Independence, which recently arrived at New York, during her absence was the scene of a glorious revival of religion, and she returned with over a hundred converts. This great work took place at a foreign station, and is without a parallel in the history of our navy.

A QUESTION AND ANSWER.

BRO. MCTYEIRE: In our Discipline, sec. 21, page 72, on "local preachers," we have the following question and answer: "Quest. 2. What shall be done when a local elder, deacon or preacher, is reported to be guilty of some crime expressly forbidden in the Word of God, sufficient to exclude a person from the kingdom of grace and glory?"

"Ans. 1. The preacher having charge shall call a committee, consisting of three or more local preachers, before whom it shall be the duty of the accused to appear; and by whom he shall be acquitted, or, if found guilty, suspended until the next Quarterly Conference."

Now, when all the above steps have been legally taken, and the committee, after hearing all the testimony and arguments, on both sides, unanimously decide that he is not guilty, and therefore acquit him, must this case, after such an acquittal, come before the Quarterly Conference for their approval, before the accused can be finally acquitted, or is the decision of the committee final? You will confer a favor on many of your friends by giving your opinion on this subject, and also very much oblige

THOMAS NIXON.

ANSWER.

The question is whether the decision of the committee is final in case they decide that there is nothing against the accused. We answer:

1. The committee is a disciplinary provision for investigating charges against local preachers, which may be brought during the interim, between the sessions of the Q. M. Conference.

2. If the committee suspend, it is until the next Q. M. Conference; if they acquit, so far as they are concerned the case is final.

3. Their action does not affect the jurisdiction of the Q. M. Conference, which, in the case of a local preacher, is original. So that whether the committee action be final or not in regard to the local preacher it is for the Q. Conference to decide. If the Conference does not see fit to call the local preacher to account, the case has ended; if they do call him, the case will come up de novo, without regard to the previous action of the committee.

OVER THE LAKE.—Our citizens have, to a large extent, availed themselves this summer of the breezing and bathing afforded by the watering places on the Gulf and Lake shore. Thanks to Capt. Dunnica, of the steamboat Lenora, we had, the first part of the week, a quick and pleasant transit across Lake Ponchartrain, to a quiet and charming summer place—Lewisburg. We tell this for the benefit of those who belong to the Gant-get-away Club, and cant go North. There is a pleasant resort nearer to them than Saratoga and Newport, and easy of access—a hundred per cent. cheaper and as good. It is no small boon, at this season, to escape to the regions of pure air and forest leaves, and to listen to the moaning of tall pines as they bend their tops under breezes from the Lake.

PICKENSVILLE SCHOOLS.—Alabama abounds in first rate schools, male and female: and they are ably sustained by private patronage. In Pickensville there are a "Female Institute" and "Male High School," which can compare favorably with the best in the State, if we may judge from published accounts of their recent examinations and from the opinion of intelligent gentlemen and ministers who have had opportunity to know their worth. A very handsome catalogue of the "Institute" is upon our table. It employs six preceptors, including Mr. R. BRADSHAW, A. M., Principal, and numbered, during the past session, ninety-five students. The buildings were erected at a cost of $13,000, and stand about five minutes' walk from the town. The location is healthy, as proved from the fact that during the past two years there has not been a single case of protracted sickness. These schools are so well endorsed, that we gladly commend them to the favorable notice of the Methodist public. See advertisement.

DEATH OF MRS. TAYLOR.—The venerable and much respected relict of the late President Taylor, departed this life, at Pascagoula, on Saturday evening last.

Mrs. Taylor had been for some time laboring under a severe illness, and her death was not unexpected. A large circle of friends and connections, by whom her numerous amiable and estimable qualities were appreciated, will learn her loss with the most profound regret.

PRESIDENCY.—Drs. Geo. Peck, Cummings and Clark, and A. W. Smith, LL. D., were candidates for the place made vacant by the death of Dr. Olin, in Wesleyan University. On third ballot, Dr. Smith was elected, and has accepted. He has for several years been connected with the University as Professor of Mathematics.

BIBLICAL PROFESSORSHIP.—The Methodists of Ohio have raised $7000 of the $10,000 towards an endowment of a Professorship of Biblical Literature in the Ohio Wesleyan University. We should like to see such a professorship in each of the Colleges in the Southern Church.

Rev. C. C. Collins, D. D., late President of Emory and Henry College, Va., has accepted the Presidency of Dickenson College, Carlisle, Pa., to which he was recently elected.

HONORARY DEGREES.—At the late Commencement at Middletown, the honorary degree of D. D. was conferred on Bishop Baker, and on Rev. D. Curry:

AN AFFLICTED FAMILY.—The family of the late Professor Kingsley, of West Point, have been sadly and painfully bereaved. In the year 1834 or 1835, four lovely children died in one week, of scarlet fever; subsequently yet another died after protracted sickness; then Professor Kingsley, in 1849, was thrown from his horse, receiving injuries from which he died; the remaining members of the family, in 1850, were thrown from a carriage, and the youngest child, aged five years, was killed. Two daughters, aged thirteen and twenty-one, were among the lost on the Henry Clay. The heart-broken mother and one son are the only survivors of this stricken household.

The American Board of Missions has paid off all its debts, and commenced the financial year with a surplus of $5 35.

CORRESPONDENCE OF GERMAN MISSIONARY.

[Brother HOFER is traveling in Alabama, making collections for the purpose of building a brick German Church in this city. We insert this rather unexpectedly to him.]

RUSSEL COUNTY, Aug. 14, 1852.

REV. J. C. KRENER:

Dear Brother—You may have learned, by this time, that I have started on my tour. I presented my cause in Mobile in both the churches, but met with but little success. I must confess, too, that I did it very awkwardly. In Brother Hamilton's church we took, in collection and subscription, $33 30; and in Brother Hutchinson's church, $18. But I intend, when I get back to Mobile, to call on some individuals that perhaps will give us something.

I hastened on to Brother Garrett's district, who wrote me a letter, in answer to the one you had written to him—had rather a tedious journey up the Alabama river, the water being very low. Reached there in the night, about 10 o'clock: staid in the Exchange till morning; found Brother Oliver at eight in the morning left Montgomery on the railroad for Tuskegee, which we reached at 12 o'clock. Having found out the stationed preacher, he procured me a home during my stay in the place. In the afternoon Brother Garrett came to town, but I did not see him until morning. I was glad to find the old brother. He takes a great interest in the German cause, and aids me all he can. I preached to the people at 11 o'clock; after that there was Quarterly Conference, at which it was determined that their missionary meeting should be held the first Sunday in September, and that I should attend it.

Saturday afternoon, August 7, went to a camp meeting twelve miles from Tuskegee, at Warrior Stand; but the preacher, Brother M., refused to give me a chance to present my cause. Sunday passed away rather heavily for me. However, in the afternoon I was called upon to preach, which I did. After that I found friends. Brother Garrett came out to the camp on Monday afternoon. He insisted that a chance should be given to me to present my cause, which finally was granted. I should remark, however, that on this circuit they had already held their missionary meetings, and taken up collections and subscriptions. Tuesday, at 11 o'clock, I made a speech, after which we took up subscriptions and a collection to the amount of $84 36. The meeting was hardly over before it began to rain, thunder and lightning, which broke up the camp meeting, so that I well nigh had been deprived of the opportunity of doing any thing.

I left, with Bro. G., to go to a quarterly meeting within nine miles of Columbus, Ga. I arrived just in time for their missionary meeting. The blacks were permitted, by their masters, to spend two days for religious purposes, which was turned into a two days' meeting, especially for them. I was permitted to preach to them twice, which I did with the greatest pleasure. I saw here what rejoiced my very heart—the masters coming to meeting with their negroes; and the negroes, in Love Feast, spoke of their masters and mistresses as children do of their parents, "of meeting them in Heaven." It melted my heart; and if there had been still a spark of abolitionism about me, it would have been dispelled entirely.

I am much pleased with the country up here; feel much stronger since I left home; my prospects, so far, are very good. I shall attend four more camp meetings, in succession, at which I hope to do well for our German cause. For four weeks to come I am engaged, and after that I know not how soon I may be able to come home again. Brother Garrett thinks I can not get home before the end of October.

I am your humble brother and fellow laborer in Christ. Ever affectionately yours,

JOHN M. HOFER.

Missionaries to California Wanted.

I wish to send TEN preachers to California as soon as possible. The work demands them. In justice to those already there, and to the moral and religious necessities of that rapidly increasing population, they must go. Dr. Boring also wants four or five persons competent to take charge of literary institutions. Where shall I find all these?

Bishop Soule intends, God willing, to leave early in November for California. Those who can not precede him, might go with him. If Brother Jones does not go from Mississippi, I hope that Conference will find me his substitute. Holston and Missouri should send one each. Texas, I expect, will furnish the German and French missionary for whom Dr. Boring calls. But where are the rest to be found? Come, brethren, name the men, and let me hear from you. Then raise your $1000, and let the preacher be off to preach the Gospel to the representatives of "all nations." Such a move will increase your missionary collections.

In about five or six weeks I leave for the western division of our work. I desire to have this matter arranged before I start. Speak quickly—act promptly.

God is giving the seal of his approbation to our efforts there in the conversion of souls in various places. The cause is suffering for laborers: "The field is white unto the harvest," and the cry urgent for help. Who will go where he is "most needed!"

It will be no use to write to me at this place after the first week in September. I shall be in Missouri. What I do must be done before then. After that, address Dr. Sehon, at Louisville, Ky.

INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS OF SCIENCE AND STATISTICS.—The National Intelligencer states that the efforts of Mr. Kennedy, chief of the Census Bureau, for the establishment of an International Congress of Science and Statistics, have interested a number of the distinguished literary men of Europe in their furtherance, and are likely to prove altogether successful. Acting upon the suggestion of Mr. Kennedy, the officers of the Belgian Government after corresponding with the savans of other European nations, have taken the initiative by calling a meeting at Brussels next month for the purpose of organizing an International Scientific Congress. Baron Quetelet, Director of the Royal Observatory at Brussels, has addressed Mr. Kennedy on the subject, explaining the steps that have been taken and the programme that will be hereafter pursued. It is proposed to divide the Congress into sections, each of which shall pursue the investigations committed to it. The first section will be devoted to "general statistics, territory and population;" the second to "production and consumption;" the third to "the state of education and morals." The Intelligencer suggests that as the formation of the Congress was an American idea, it is important that this country should be suitably represented in it.

LETTER FROM ENGLAND.

WESLEYAN CONFERENCE.

The Wesleyan Conference is now assembled in the town of Sheffield, under the Presidency of the Rev. John Scott. On Wednesday, the 27th, the Conference met and proceeded to the election of its President. The preparatory committees had been meeting for nearly a fortnight previously, beginning with the Stationing Committee. After the Stationing Committee had completed its draft, on Wednesday, July 20, of stations for the coming year, the committee of the New Kingswood and Woodhouse Grove Schools met. On Thursday, the Contingent Fund met; on Friday the Chapel Fund; and on Saturday several private committees, connected with the affairs of the Preachers' Assistant Society, with the relief of special cases of ministerial or circuit distress, produced through recent agitations, and with several legal points affecting chapel cases. Monday was taken up almost altogether with the review of our educational efforts and progress during the year. The Sabbath Committee, also, met in another room, on that day: and the Catechumen Committee sat at night till late. On Tuesday morning, from nine till nearly three, the Missionary Committee of Review was busily engaged; and in the evening the Theological Institution Committee sat.

During this year of agitation the two most beautiful, extensive and complete buildings of Methodism have been entered upon and regularly occupied for the service of Methodism—I refer to the New Kingswood School, and the Westminster Normal Institution, for the training of day school teachers. The former of these is beautifully situated near Bath—old Kingswood, Mr. Wesley's Kingswood, having retained from the first (though in a mitigated form) those characters of darkness and depravity for which it was so infamous, when Whitfield and Wesley first preached there, more than a century ago, and having always been a most utterly unfit place in which to train the children of our preachers: the new erection has been built at an expense altogether, including purchase of ground and every item, of some £15,000 or £16,000, for the accommodation of one hundred and thirty scholars, or perhaps a few more.

The Normal Institution will soon have been brought to a full completion, at a total cost of £40,000, and is already in most efficient and beneficial operation. You will find a fair account of it in the Watchman, for this week, as of all the details of our educational operations, and therefore I will not enlarge upon it here. Only I may say that our educational work lies at the foundation of all our other operations; that it will not only benefit the world, but will continually feed and supply Methodism in all its departments, and that unless we had set about this work, at the present crisis, Methodism must have entirely lost its hold upon the masses of our people. Its influence would have been supplanted by the education of infidelity and worldliness, which is going on so incessantly and powerfully on every side, and by the assiduous and unsparing efforts of high churchism and Popery, whose characteristic policy it is to get into their hands the education of the young. Sixty students are now at the Normal Institution, some six hundred children are taught there, and sixty Wesleyan day schools are expected to be built in the course of the ensuing year. This is a promising infancy.

The funds of Methodism during the past year, have been wonderfully sustained. Let it be considered that we have now about the same number of members in Society as we had in 1839, whilst we have eighty more ministers to sustain. This alone imposes upon the Connection a yearly tax, at £150 per annum for each preacher, of £12,000. Then we now raise £20,000 more yearly for the missions than in 1839: and we have our educational movement extra, and many additional chapels, etc. So that we can not estimate the total pressure upon the springs of the Connection at this moment at less than £10,000 more than in the year 1839. What wonder if the machine should drive heavily! The manner in which Methodism has met the present crisis is truly wonderful. The missionary income and the educational movement have both been sustained. It is true that many particular circuits have been, as they could not but be, very deficient in their contributions, and not a few have been compelled to give up one of their ministers, but, notwithstanding, the contributions to the contingent fund (a fund for home missionary purposes and to meet Connectional contingencies) have exceeded for the past year those of the year preceding, by £461.

The subscriptions towards the educational movement are nearly completed. A new collection for educational purposes has been established, and an adequate income provided for the support of the Normal Institution, as well as for school assistance in general. The subscriptions towards the Theological Institution equal or exceed those of former years. The chapel fund is well sustained. Altogether looking at these things, what can be said but "This is the Lord's doing; and it is marvellous in our eyes." Notwithstanding, there must be no attempt to disguise the fact, that the efforts of the opponents of Methodism have involved the Connection in present difficulties of no ordinary kind. So many circuits and ministers have been reduced to extreme distress, that the demands on behalf of these on the contingent and chapel fund, has been exceedingly heavy. The former fund, indeed, is heavily in debt. And special efforts are called for to relieve not a few of our chapels. To meet these demands, however, and to consider the whole condition of our financial economy, with a view to securing, if possible, some means and plan of permanent relief, a large Finance Committee will be summoned to meet next autumn. It is hoped, by some united movement, by raising, suppose, some £30,000, to effect the needful present relief, and at the same time, by the united counsels of the ministry and laity, to effect some serviceable reforms and improvements in our general financial management.

The Missionary Committee of Review presented several features of extraordinary interest this year. The decision to effect the separation, to a large extent, of the Australian and of the French mission, from the parent body, each under the care of their own Conference, certain great characteristic principles of Methodism being formally accepted by the newly constituted Conferences, and a certain pecuniary grant being, for the present, guaranteed by the British Conference and Missionary Committee, is a most important event in our history. Not less important and interesting is the resolution at once to send out several missionaries to China, to establish a Wesleyan mission there, on the condition, however, that such mission be for five years to come supported from its own resources, and make no charge on the general mission fund. Fifteen hundred pounds had already been amassed from special contributions for this particular service, and other such contributions are likely still to be afforded. Our noble Treasurer, Mr. Farmer, (whose state of health, I lament to say, has prevented him from attending the present Conference) takes a very deep interest in this mission. Mr. Piercy, a devoted young man, late a farmer and local preacher in the Pickering Circuit, England, was so deeply impressed, twelve months ago, with the case of China, that he went out himself, on his own resources, (small as they were—only a few hundred pounds) to China, there to do what he could, in his own way, for the conversion of the Chinese, having made up his mind, if need be, to work with his own hands for his maintenance, that he might be able to devote all his available time and means to the work of the Lord.

This young man, by a singular Providence, was met at Hong Kong, on his landing, by the sole survivor of a small band of Methodist soldiers, who was lamenting that his last religious comrade and counsellor had just been taken from his head. This was the first person he spoke to on Chinese ground. Judge how the Wesleyan brethren rejoiced to meet and embrace each other! Piercy took these as a plain token that his mission was from God, and he has gone on working ever since. He has made good progress in the Chinese tongue, has been very useful in the work of conversion among the English, and is now in Canton, breaking new ground, and devoting himself more exclusively to the Chinese work. This devoted and truly apostolic man has not been left to languish unaided. Several benevolent and Christian men, Mr. Farmer especially, have supplied his wants from time to time; and now he is to be joined by several devoted, and in every way suitably qualified young men, who have volunteered joyfully for this work, and are eager to be engaged in it. Altogether the chain of Providence by which the committee has been led to engage in the Chinese mission has been most remarkable.

Not only is it intended to constitute the Australian and the French missionary bodies into separate and, to a great extent, independent Conferences, but the same is also likely to be done in the case of the West Indies and of British North America.

The Presidential election is one which is likely to give very great satisfaction to all moderate and true-hearted men among the Wesleyans, whether laymen or ministers. Nobody, perhaps, so much commands the confidence of all parties in Methodism as our present excellent President. There is no one in whose judgment and calm truthfulness of view and sentiment so many will repose strong trust as Mr. Scott. At the last Conference his health was poor, and soon after the Conference failed entirely; but during the spring and summer he has so much recovered, that now he is deemed competent to undertake the onerous duties of the Presidency. You are aware that his permanent office is that of Principal of the Westminster Normal Institution, and Chairman of the Educational Committee. It is he who has brought to so safe and prosperous an issue the preparatory educational movement, and has been the means of launching it upon an open sea, and, as I can not doubt, upon a most beneficent course. He is a man of grave but kindly temper, of a quiet, but sly and keen humor, of extraordinary shrewdness and sagacity, with a sallow face, in which the lines of thought are deeply graven, a dark and thoughtful, yet often an indescribably comic and humorous eye, and a quiet, firm and penetrating voice. His temper is of unfailing serenity, his liberality of spirit and sentiment very great, yet his conservatism safe and deeply-principled, his judgment of almost unfailing truth and certainty.

Such is the wise and excellent man whom this year we have placed at our head. He is the very man for the crisis.

Dr. Alder was also put in nomination for the Presidency, but while Mr. Scott had 161 votes, he had but 62. Why Dr. Alder should be put in nomination as the antagonist of Mr. Scott, time may perhaps reveal. But the Dr. himself has certainly conducted with great urbanity and consummate ability and tact. It is possible that two or three years may see him worthily filling the Presidential chair. But it is much more probable that that delightful and accomplished little man, John Lomas, who this year had thirty-six votes for the Chairmanship, will next year be the President, than any other person.

Mr. Methley, an excellent and useful minister, a liberal constitutional Wesleyan, and the Chairman of the Birmingham District, and Mr. Henry Davies, a clever man, a high Wesleyan Conservative, and the Chairman of the Cornwall District, were chosen, by nomination, into the number of the one hundred: five others being chosen by seniority.

We are, it seems, to have two Conferences besides our own in this town—one of a set of persons calling themselves "Moderates," but who in fact agree in almost every thing with the out-and-out "Reformers," except that they have not yet gone professedly, or all of them, to the extent of "stopping the supplies," nor have mixed up their claims directly with the cause of the expelled ministers. Some of these—perhaps many—are good, but mistaken men; but of the leaders we can not judge so favorably. They are subtle, but resolute, revolutionists, and their apparent moderation is, after all, but a veil to most ruinous designs. Those men call themselves, most unwarrantably, "Methodists," and have their Conference here. The more advanced "Reformers" are to have theirs, and we of course have ours. Of both these parties I shall have more to say, by-and-by.

The editor of the Wesleyan Times has "cut" the country in disgrace, taking off with him, I believe, or having previously embezzled some hundreds of pounds belonging to the "Reform" fund. The Wesleyan Times has passed virtually into other hands, and is printed in connection with the British Banner and the Patriot. The editor is now Mr. W. L. Horton, who twelve months ago took his ordination vows as a Wesleyan minister, but in a few months joined the Independents, having, as it was afterwards proved, been from the time of his ordination far from a Wesleyan Methodist at heart. He, then, through professing Independent principles, hired himself to the Wesleyan "Reformers," and for them he now does work as editor and flaming agitator. The Rev. S. Dunn has now avowedly gone over to Indepency, having discovered that he "can not conscientiously" minister under any modification of Wesleyan Methodism," and that Indepency is "in Wesley's own plan." So the bubble bursts.

As to politics. The Derby gains about 30 or 35 votes; but not by any means so many for protection. On this question they will still be in a minority, which probably they are not sorry for. The Irish elections have been distinguished by the most fearful and almost fiendish riots, instigated by the Popish priests, and which will no doubt call for Parliamentary inquiry.

SUNDAY SCHOOL STATISTICS.

As the time for holding the Annual Conferences is coming on, the attention of the preachers is called to the importance of making full reports of Sunday School statistics to the Committee appointed on that subject at each session. Be careful to specify the number of Sunday Schools, scholars, teachers, superintendents, volumes in library, copies of Visitor taken, money raised for Sunday Schools, money raised for the publication of Sunday School books during the year.

The editor of the Visitor takes this occasion to say that those who have not renewed their subscription to that paper, can do so now, and he supplied with the back numbers either from July or January. New orders are most respectfully solicited.

As there are many families, congregations and Sunday Schools that have never seen the Visitor, we will send the back numbers of the present volume, to wit, from January to June, to any person ordering them for gratuitous distribution, free of subscription charges. In ordering them, state the number of copies desired, and the postoffice and State to which they are to be sent. Address post paid, the editor, Charleston, S. C. Editors of other church papers will please copy this notice.

ALLEN CASTLE, P. C.

WEST POINT ACADEMY.—The Northern papers publish the able report of the Board of Visitors for the West Point Academy for the present year, which has been transmitted to Congress by the Secretary of War. The Board consists of sixteen gentlemen from as many different States, of which the Hon. M. C. M. Hammond of South Carolina is President. After reviewing the history of the Institution, the circumstances under which it was founded and the services it has rendered, the Board adds that the accumulating experience of fifty years carefully noted and improved upon in practice from time to time, as possible to do so, has left little now to be altered, and proceed to enumerate a number of recommendations for the improvement of the institution and the increase of its usefulness, the most important of which are the following:

The increase of the number of cadets by the appointment of two additional from each State, and the augmentation of their pay to $28 20 per month. An increase in the pay of the Superintendent and the several instructors. The erection of a riding hall for winter use, for which an appropriation of $12 000 will be required; and the construction of permanent stables. The allowance of a suitable set of horses, one for artillery and the other for military exercises. The erection of additional buildings for the use of officers, and the enlargement of the present residences. The introduction of cavalry tactics among the studies, the extension of the period of study to five years, and that the study of logic be dispensed with, that ancient and modern history, army regulations, etc., physiology, and the evidences of Christianity be introduced with the increased term.

DECISIONS UPON THE LIQUOR LAW.—The Supreme Court of Maine have decided that the inhabitants of that State may keep liquor in their houses for their own use, and that liquor may be brought into and transported within or through the State, if it be not intended for sale. The amount of the decision seems to be, that the Legislature may prohibit the sale, or keeping, or offering for sale of liquor, but cannot prohibit its use. This decision makes the law analogous to the laws concerning other poisons. Only licensed druggists and apothecaries can sell them. These can only sell it under certain regulations. All others cannot sell it at all. But the law does not prohibit the use. Hence, any body may use arsenic in any quantity, and it is much used in preparing the skins of animals and birds for stuffing. And any body may take it, even with the felonious intent of suicide, without incurring the penalty. Hence, if one should take arsenic or other poison with such intent, and should be saved from death, a prosecution for taking the poison could be sustained.

WHAT IS A FOP?—A Mr. Stark, in a lecture before the Young Men's Association, of Troy, N. Y., gives a definition of the above:

"The fop is a complete specimen of an outside character. He is one-third collar, one-fourth patent leather, one-fourth walking stick, and the rest gloves and boots. As to his remote ancestry there is some doubt, but he is now pretty well settled that he is the son of a monkey by gums. He becomes excited at the smell of new cloth, is somewhat nervous and to dream of a tailor's bill is to him the nightmare. By his air one would judge he had been dipped like Achilles; but it is evident that the nurse held him by the heel instead of the heels. Nevertheless such men are useful, if there were no tailors there would be no frogs. They are not so entirely to blame for being so devoted to externals. Paste diamonds may have a splendid setting to make them sell for what they seem a waste of material to put $5 worth of horse on 50 cents worth of brains.

A FEMALE ADVOCATE.—A French lady, Madame Grandin, has been allowed to plead her own cause in the Court of Common Pleas, in Paris. She was successful, and that she got a verdict in her favor, as might have been expected when a beautiful woman, as she is described, pleads to the other sex for justice.

REFORMATION IN THE FIVE POINTS.—Yesterday, says the New York Tribune of Monday the 9th inst., we chanced to stroll through that far-famed locality, the Five Points, and confess to much agreeable surprise as to the appearance and sounds by which we were surrounded. At the "Old Brewery," that recent virulent ulcer upon the body of the physical world, we found a large company of children of the legitimate heirs of poverty, degradation and sin, employed in reciting passages from the gospels and singing long hymns, that must have awakened strange echoes in the locality so entirely unused to them. Around the door stood a group of fifty or more of Misery's children, in rags and dirt, and almost sunk from the imbruting influence of rum and ignorance. Yet none of them seemed disposed to disturb the exercises within. A young lady, devoted to this repulsive place, moved like an angel of hope to and fro among her wretched pupils, and her sweet and benignant smile was sufficient to check any unseemly tendency to actions of those in the street.

DEATHS OF CLERGYMEN.—Rev. John Walsh, pastor of St. Paul's (Catholic) Church at Harlem, N. Y., died on Sunday, the 8th inst., of dysentery, aged 47 years. Rev. B. Creagh, of the M. E. Church, died in New York on Tuesday, the 10th inst. He was a native of Ireland, and formerly Secretary of the New York Conference.

Obituary.

DIED—On the 13th May, in Demopolis, Sarah Thomas Shields, wife of Hon. John Shields, in the 38th year of her age.

She professed religion at a revival in the Methodist Church in Demopolis, in the summer of 1843, and continued a member of that church from that time until her death.

During the last fifteen years of her life she was physically a great sufferer. Religion brought to her the consolation she needed; and her pain she was cheerful, and had a smile in the Lord.

But a few weeks before she died she was heard to say that death would be a welcome visitor. The change was sudden which resulted in her death, and after it came over her she was insensible until she expired.

"I did so often (she) had patiently endured, and obtained the promise." Who that knew her can doubt it!

Notwithstanding by when she was converted, and ever since then have I enjoyed her pleasing Christian society. Within a year she returned from South America with her husband and son, after an absence of five years. Being called unexpectedly to Demopolis, I looked forward with great pleasure to meeting with her once more; but, alas! I arrived in time when she was dying, just before she entered into rest.

"For the pain of life is past,
All her warfare now is o'er;
Death and hell behind are cast,
Grief and suffering are no more."

The National Convention.—The National Free Soil Convention assembled at Pittsburgh on the 11th inst. It is estimated that two thousand persons were present. A dispatch dated at 11 o'clock A. M. says:

Gerrit Smith, chairman of the National Committee called the Convention to order, and explained that the object for the Convention was intended to include all the friends of freedom under whatever name they should be known. In alluding to the fact that Gerrit Smith, Lewis Tappan, Giddings, and several other distinguished men were present, with delegates from four slave States, the assent of each name was received with enthusiastic cheering.

Mr. Tappan, of New York, explained that the objection to the Buffalo and other anti-slavery men who at first declined attend this Convention, was because the call was for the party that approved of the platform, which he did not. That matter having been explained to satisfactory, he withdrew his objections, and hoped that they would be able to form a platform from which nothing could jump without breaking his neck.

Judge Spaulding, of Ohio, was then entitled to the Chair, Mr. Booth, of Wisconsin appointed temporary Secretary.

Judge Spaulding, on taking the Chair, briefly returned his thanks, accepting the post as one of both duty and honor.

Hon. C. Nevins addressed the Throne of Grace. A resolution was offered by Mr. Woodman, of Maine, for the appointment of a Committee on Organization, which was adopted. At this moment a banner was brought into the Hall with the following inscription: "No Compromise with Slaveholders or Dough-faces," by the delegation from Ohio, which was received with great cheering.

The States were then called, and the following named as the Committee on Organization: D. Barker, New Hampshire; James Woodman, Maine; Henry W. Bird, Massachusetts; Joseph R. Holley, Connecticut; D. B. Harris, Rhode Island; Nicholas Wluder, Vermont; Chas. O. Sheppard, New York; Alexander Ladies, Michigan; James H. Paine, Wisconsin; Isaac Powers, Iowa; John Parkinson, Virginia; John R. Stollings, Kentucky.

Lloyd Douglass was present, and, as usual, very conspicuous.

A Committee on Platform, consisting of one from each State, was appointed. The Convention then adjourned till evening, and in the mean time several mass meetings were held—one, a mass meeting of females. A dispatch, dated 9 o'clock, P. M., says:

The mass meetings to-night are largely attended. Speeches are being made, and great enthusiasm is evinced. A young girl addressed the multitude from the Theatre stage. Frederick is addressing the ladies to-night at the Hall. A number of delegates have their wives and daughters with them.

The Platform Committee, after seven hours' closetting, are prepared to report. They are divided on the name—Liberty for Free Democracy, and the other for Friends of Freedom. The people of Pittsburgh take but little interest in the Convention.

The Death of Mr. Rantoul.—The National Intelligencer, in recording the death of the Hon. Robert Rantoul, says:

Mr. Rantoul was in his seat in the House on Tuesday the 3d inst. At that time he appeared to be in usual health, with the exception of what he considered to be a boil on his forehead. On Wednesday morning, the inflammation was surrounded by erysipelatous inflammation. The consequence of which he was prevailed upon to remain in his room and procure medical advice. Thursday the swelling he felt very much better, and spoke confidently of returning in a day or two to his duties in the House. Friday evening, he became much worse; the erysipelas entered his entire face, and his brain was evidently affected. On Saturday evening the left side became paralyzed, after which he sank rapidly, and expired at about half past 10 o'clock, A. M.

Large Notions.—The prosperity of South Deerfield, Mass., is closely identified with so insignificant a vocation as the manufacture of wallets. Three years ago, the Deerfield Arms "took a notion" to sew what could be made into wallets, and have supplied themselves to it energetically ever since. They now employ in their shops, exclusive of the out-door hands; and 125 dozen of the articles are produced for the market daily. The yearly sales amount to $200,000, which is about double the cost of the materials used. Their success has started up competitors, so that there is quite a village of shops, boarding-houses, etc., owes its existence to the aforesaid "notion." Enterprise and prosperity are twin sisters. General Intelligence.

Spiritual Thumpings.—The manifestation of spiritual vibrations in different parts of the city, in the opinion of many, has become a fixed fact. That certain weak-minded persons, children and antediluvian grannys, should believe in such matters is not a matter of surprise, but when sincere men, who occupy high social positions and are noted for extensive information and acute intellects, take up the cause of the spirits and openly proclaim their belief in them, the subject demands investigation. More than one eminent divine in our midst has admitted the existence of the "manifestations" without pretending to give a solution of their cause. That the "thumpings" occur, there can be no possible doubt, for in favor of the fact we have the strongest human testimony. The how and the wherefore is matter for investigation.

Several "spirit circles" have lately been formed in the green and rural portions of the city. At Temperance Hall, sundry meetings have taken place, but as the conversations have been private, nothing more than vague and detached rumors of the doings therein, have become known to the uninitiated. It is stated as a fact, that at one of these meetings, where a table had cut up sundry evolutions, and danced around, variously, a gentleman who was an unbeliever offered to bet a right round sum that said locomotive table would not move in the direction where he was sitting. No sooner was the irreverent banter made, than the table immediately became active, and slid up against him, a distance of several feet. This evidence of animation on the part of the inanimate, of course, astonished the incredulous individual to such a degree, that he left the room in huge dismay. Without professing to be acquainted with the cause of these vibrations, none of those who have been present at the meetings pretend to doubt the fact of their existence. Some of the mediums pretend to converse with the spirits of their deceased relatives, and to be informed by them of the state of matters both here and hereafter. Those more sublimed assert that the spirits have become visible to their corporeal vision, as distinct in form and feature as in life. They say that they have conversed with them face to face, and that from information received, that bright millennial age is at hand, when all shall have their eyes opened to the secrets of the inner world; all shall be subject to the instruction of these "just men made perfect," and all shall believe in the same spiritual religion.

Certain worldly minded individuals, having speculation in their eyes, have thought to make their intimacy with the spirits an instrument for the service of mammon. One man wants to know the price of cotton in Liverpool, another the price of Camp street stocks at a certain future date, and another essays to find out what tickets are for sale here that have drawn prizes in the Havana Lottery. It is to be hoped that the spirits having a regard for equal rights will not develop. Give all a show. These thumpings have lately been made manifest in a house on Philippe street. Strange noises have been heard there, to the utter routing even of the rats. One enterprising police officer in endeavoring to ferret out the mystery, got "thumped" on the head. The spirit that did it is supposed to be that of the celebrated John Barleycorn, acting through the medium of a houseless night walker.

A bed-stead in Carondelet street was afflicted with these thumpings. The application of a bucket full of cold water dislodged two huge cock-roaches and the thumpings ceased incontinently. Another bed-stead in Canal street rapped the years of a gentleman's age, etc., and so the thing goes.

These interesting celestials have widened their field of operations to a great extent during the past week. From a few solitary individuals, who first made themselves manifest in the Fourth District, they have rapidly spread around to all parts of the city, and number now a legion. Toothless old women, and the ignorant and superstitious are not now the only ones whom they condescend to visit. They have become aristocratic in their notions, and dwell in the palaces of the "merchant princes." An eminent merchant has been visited by one, which professed to be the guardian genius of the merchant's young daughter. This same goblin assumed to be skilled in nativities and other occult sciences, and went so far as to inform another eminent merchant—a visitor at the house where the spirit happened to "clung out"—of the exact date of his birth, age, etc. The same "thumper" being asked where a friend of the gentleman was, at a certain date, answered that he was in the city of New York—the questioner being mortally certain that he had gone to England. So sure was he of this fact, that he at once set the ghost down as a humbug; but, to his astonishment, when he went to his office the next morning, he found a telegraphic dispatch from this same friend, dated at New York the previous day! Thereupon he concluded that the ghost was an honest ghost, and in every way to be credited. Much annoyance was experienced by the owner of the house, and by the members of his family, at the constant "thumpings" of this strange visitor.

The gentleman went so far as to have the weather-boarding or plastering of the room where the noises occurred taken off, in order to see whether any hidden machinery had caused the disturbance. The ghost treated their demonstrations with contempt, continuing the rappings on different parts of the walls, and in the middle of the room. The rappings were accompanied by a slight hissing sound, like a whisper, as if the supernatural was making an effort to speak. Finally the rapper "vamosed," much to the regret of the family, who had become accustomed to his demonstrations, and rather liked them than otherwise.

We heard some alarming "thumps," just now, opposite our office, which, on inquiry, we discover to be caused by a watchman thumping on the pavement. What next?

Railroad Straightened.—The branch of the N. O. and Carrollton Railroad, where it was laid around the site of the Jackson street Market, has been straightened so as to run over the site of the Market, the Market-house having been pulled down.

Indians About.—Yesterday, a lot of about 20 Seminole Indians, of the tribe commanded by the renowned William Bowlegs, arrived at the United States Barracks, on their way out West. They are a wild looking and outré set, with faces tinged with a deep and settled melancholy at the prospect of leaving their native forests to light new fires in another land. They are to be shipped off immediately.

New Baronne street Watch-house.—The plan of this proposed institution, for the accommodation of the unfortunate and disorderly, gives promise of a very handsome building. It is to be erected on Baronne street, between Hevia and Olrod streets, on the site of the old Watch-house. The building is to be of brick, with two stories and iron columns. In the centre is to be a large door, opening into a yard and to the cells appropriated for the accommodation of visitors. On either side of the entrance is to be the Police-office and the private room of the Captain of the Watch. The passage in the centre leads to an area in the rear, which will be cut off from the cells and interior yard by a large gate. A flight of stairs from the gate leads to the second story. The front room, in the second story, is to be occupied by the Recorder's Court, and the rear rooms are for the Recorder's private use and for other offices. The plan of the building presents a very neat appearance.

Capt. Marcy's Command.—The Fort Smith Herald of the 7th inst. confirms the recent telegraphic dispatch, announcing the safety of Capt. Marcy and his command. The Herald says:

Capt. Humber, Lieut. Cubell and Lieut. Black, arrived in this place, from Fort Gibson, on Thursday morning, having left that post on Wednesday morning, and bring the gratifying intelligence of the safety of Capt. Marcy. We learn from these gentlemen, that a man arrived at Fort Gibson, from Fort Arbuckle, just before they started for this city, having left that post on the 20th of July, and reports that Capt. Marcy and his command had all arrived, in good health and spirits, at Fort Arbuckle, two days before he left, and that Capt. Marcy was to have started for Fort Smith in a day, or as soon as he could make his arrangements. It appears that the report of the massacre is all an Indian fabrication. Lieut. Cabell informs us that he questioned his informant very closely, and that he told him there was no doubt about it, and that he certainly saw Capt. Marcy and his men, and that they were at Fort Arbuckle when he left that place.

Perilous Leap.—A man leaped from the Suspension Bridge into the middle of Niagara River, on Monday week, for the entertainment of a crowd of people. Owing to a strong current of air under the bridge, he was unable to retain a perpendicular position, and he struck the water upon his back. He was able to swim to a boat in waiting for him, but thinks he will decline any further feats of the kind.

The Fire at Helena, Ark.—The Memphis Eagle and Enquirer gives the following account of the disastrous fire at Helena, Ark., announced by telegraph some days since:

The Helena Shield office was not burned out, as at first reported, but only sustained some damage in the hurry and confusion, by removing their materials out of the building.

The insurance offices in this city are sufferers by the late fire in Helena, as well as the unfortunate persons burned out. The Memphis Insurance Co. had $10,000 on Norton, Fackler & Co.'s stock, and the branch in this city of the Nashville Insurance and Trust Co. $5000 on Messrs. Hicks & Bumpass' stock.

We are indebted to Major J. A. Jackson, of Helena, who came up on the mail-boat yesterday morning, for the following particulars of the extensive conflagration which visited that town a few days since.

The fire broke out about 2 o'clock on Tuesday morning in the large livery stable of Mr. Hargrahes, which was entirely consumed, together with Messrs. Norton, Fackler & Co.'s extensive dry goods stores, Messrs. Hicks & Bumpass' do; J. Levy's do; Howerton's produce store; the Masonic Hall and Land Office; Coulart & Klog's drug store; the Planters' House; R. F. Sutton, J. B. Jackson and Brinton's law offices; the Swamp Land office; a barber and tailor shop.

Many of the goods in the stores were saved, and also nearly all the books and papers in the two Land offices—Messrs. Norton, Fackler & Co. were insured to the amount of $10,000, and Messrs. Hicks & Bumpass for $5000. The entire loss, it is estimated, will not fall short of $65,000 to $70,000. The origin of the fire is supposed to have been the work of an incendiary, but as yet no clue has been discovered as to who was the perpetrator.

Starvation in the West Indies.—Accounts from the Windward Islands continue to be received of the state of starvation into which the people of those Islands are involved from the long-continued drought. Antigua, St. Kitts, St. Lucia, Anguilla and Curacoa, are represented as particularly destitute and distressed. In Anguilla, the drought, which had prevailed for seven months, had reduced the poorer classes of the inhabitants to a state of absolute destitution and misery. The poor are absolutely dying for want.

A Congress to Regulate the Coin.—Several European Powers have accepted the proposition of the English Government to convoke a Congress at London, in order to come to an agreement respecting the regulating of the coin. France, Denmark, Sweden, Spain and Portugal have been specially nominated. The Congress will not commence its declarations till the month of November next; meanwhile a statistical bureau will be established, for the purpose of making the necessary preparations.

Old Plymouth.—Plymouth is Plymouth still, with no shadow of a change except in the erection of some thirty dwellings this season. The population of the town is now 6000, and it is gradually increasing. It is the largest town in the Commonwealth, it being eighteen miles in length, by six or eight in breadth. The last extent of woods in the southern part of the town, and in Sandwich, affords plant the only range for the wild deer in the State. One of their number wandered down as far as Plymouth Rock a winter or two ago.

The business of Plymouth is now principally the manufacture of ropes, nails, etc., fishing, domestic trade, and agriculture. Some fifty vessels are engaged in the fishing business the present season.

Steamer Sunk.—The steamer Emily struck a snag a few days since, in White river, sunk in twenty feet water, and broke in two. No lives were lost. The boat is a total loss.

Appointment.—The Montgomery (Ala.) Advertiser learns that Governor Collier has appointed Hon. Nat. Cook, of Lowndes county, a Judge of the Circuit Court, to fill the seat vacated by the resignation of Hon. E. Pickens.

The Crops.—The Carroll (Miss.) Watchman says: "The prospects of the planters of our parish for having bountiful crops of both cotton and corn, were never better at this season of the year than they are at present. The Bayou places were nearly exempt from overflow this year, and the unsurpassed lands of Joes Bayou and Bayou Mason will yield a mammoth return for the husbandman's labor.

Australian Gold.—The Editor of the Philadelphia American has been shown several beautiful specimens of Australian gold, weighing in all three ounces, and imported from London by the United States Mint as specimens. This is believed to be the first that has ever been seen in this country, as it does not reach us in the course of commerce. It was received at the Mint on the 5th instant, and it has been ascertained, by an assay of part of the quantity, that the proportion of pure metal is 995 thousandths fine; which is equivalent to twenty dollars per ounce, or thereabouts.

Fire Engine in Stone Store.—The election held on Thursday, the 12th inst., to get the consent of the citizens of Shreveport upon the proposition to levy a tax of $3000 on real estate for the purchase of a fire engine, resulted in favor of the tax by a majority of two votes.

Phillips' Fire Annihilator.—The second trial of the fire annihilator was given at Boston last Friday, the 6th instant. The building was allowed to burn till the flames had burst through the roof and walls, and it became the general opinion that it would burn down. At this moment two annihilators were set in operation, and the flames completely extinguished in about half a minute.

Exploration of the Java and other Seas.—The British Admiralty have dispatched a well-appointed surveying ship and tender for the purpose of exploring the Java and China seas. A correspondent of the National Intelligencer adduces this fact as one that should have its influence with Congress in providing for a like reconnoissance and exploration.

Home-made Gas.—The Newark (N. J.) Advertiser notices an experiment which was recently made in that vicinity in lighting the residence of Mr. W. C. Dusenberry, President of the U. S. Portable Gas Company, by the means of a small apparatus, which does not occupy but a few square feet of space, and it is said to require no more skill in its management than an ordinary cole fire. The gas is made from rosin, gives a clear brilliant light, and burns without any unpleasant smell. The cost of the gas thus manufactured is estimated at $1 50 per thousand cubic feet; the price of the apparatus is $150.

Brazil.—A letter from Rio Janeiro, published in the New York Times, draws attention to the inequality of the trade between Brazil and the United States. Our country takes of Brazil one-half of its immense coffee crops, costing millions of dollars, all of which enters our ports free of duty. Brazil, however, imposes a duty of thirty-three per cent. upon the flour from the United States, forty-five per cent. on our furniture, one hundred and fifty per cent. on carriages, and admits nothing under thirty per cent. Mr. Schenck, our present Minister to that country, has endeavored to get these restrictions on American commerce removed, but, so far, without effect. The correspondent of the Times proposes, as a remedy, to restore equality of trade, that the United States should put a duty upon coffee.

From Texas.

Arrival of the Mexico.—The steamer Mexico, Capt Place, arrived yesterday from Galveston, whence she sailed on the 15th inst. She brought papers, however, only to the 13th, the same as were received by the Yacht.

Gen. Persifor F. Smith, U. S. A., was passenger on the Mexico.

Newspaper Change.—The Lagrange Monument has been purchased by Mr Albert Pevey, by whom it will hereafter be conducted.

Happy Community.—The Texas Ranger, published at Washington, congratulates the citizens of that place on the fact that the recent election passed off without any killing.

Cuero.—The Victoria Advocate, of the 7th inst., says:

The cholera has again broken out in this place. On Sunday last Mr. Thomas Jenkins, for several years a resident and enterprising merchant of our town, but more recently of Lavaca, fell a victim to it. Since that time Mr. Richard Owens and A. James have had it; the first has recovered, and there is hope of the recovery of Mr. James. These are the only American cases. Among the Germans there have been five or six deaths.

The San Antonio and Gulf Railroad.—The South Western American publishes the report of Colonel J. E. Johnstone, U. S. A., the Engineer who was appointed to survey the route of the proposed railroad from San Antonio to the Gulf. The report is favorable to the project. The average cost of the road will be about $10,000 per mile. The committee appointed to select a Gulf terminus have decided to let the question remain open for the present.

Extra Session.—The propositon to call an extra session of the Legislature appears to be gaining in public favor.

Whirlwind.—The Huntsville Item says a whirlwind passed over that town on Wednesday, the 4th instant, doing some damage to the roof of the Penitentiary, and taking down an unoccupied house in its vicinity.

Change.—In accordance with a recent vote of the citizens of Lavaca county, the county seat is to be removed to Hallettsville.

Indianola.—The Bulletin says the health of the town is excellent, and business unusually brisk for the season of the year.

The Crops.—The most cheering accounts of the crops continue to come in from all parts of the State. The worm had appeared in a few places only, and not much damage had been done.

The Texas Lighthouses.—The light-houses at Bolivar Point is now completed and ready for the light. That at Matagorda will be done in two weeks, and the one at Brazos Santiago soon thereafter.

A Bonaparte in the American Army.—A promotion of forty-three cadets of the Military Academy at West Point has just taken place in the United States Army. We remark among the number, the name of the cadet Jerome Napoleon Bonaparte, who was No. 11 in his class at the time of the examinations, and who is appointed to the regiment of mounted riflemen. He is the grandson of Jerome Bonaparte, brother of the Emperor Napoleon ex-King of Westphalia, and now President of the French Senate. His grandmother, Madame Patterson, first wife of Prince Jerome, resides in Baltimore.

Three Lives Lost in a Well.—At Alexandria, Mo., on the 11th instant, J. S. Phillips, Joel Enoch and Mr Henderson, were killed in a foul well. Mr. Phillips descended to cleanse it, but not returning, Mr. Enoch descended to assist him, and also fell in victim. Mr. Henderson then went down to make fast a rope to Mr. Enoch, and when about half way up, became exhausted, and fell into the well dead. Mr John Enoch then went to their assistance, and barely escaped with his life. The bodies were extricated by means of a pole hooked to their clothes.

U. S. Supreme Court.—The telegraph has announced the appointment of our fellow citizen, E. A. Bradford, Esq., to a vacant seat upon the bench of the U. S. Supreme Court. Mr. B. is a gentleman of studious habits, extensive reading, cautious judgment, blameless life, and (what is of much importance to Louisiana and three other States of the Union) well versed in the civil law. We are happy to be able to record so excellent an appointment.

Steamer Sunk.—The steamer Emily struck a snag a few days since, in White river, sunk in twenty feet water, and broke in two. No lives were lost. The boat is a total loss.

Congressional.

Washington, August 13, 1852.

Senate.—A motion was made to postpone the consideration of the private calendar, but, after some debate, it was withdrawn.

Mr. Houston, as a privileged matter, made a report from the select committee appointed to investigate the charges of bribery or fraud in the prosecution of claims, in which it was stated that Mr. John McIntosh had contumaciously refused to be sworn as a witness before said committee, after having been duly summoned, and submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That John McIntosh, in refusing to take the oath propounded to him by the select committee of the Senate, raised on the 6th of August, 1852, has committed a contempt against the authority of this body, and therefore the sergeant-at-arms take him into custody, and imprison him in the jail of the District of Columbia, until he shall consent to take the said oath, or until the further order of the Senate.

Mr. Houston asked that the resolution be considered.

Mr. Chase objected, and the matter was laid over.

The Senate then took up the private calendar, and the following bills were passed: For the relief of the heirs of Henry King, Maria Taylor, Santiago Arguello, the heirs of Wm. Jones, Isaac Adams, J. M. White, H. D. Miller, P. H. Thompson, J. H. Turley, widow of Major Kendrick, John Tucker, John Boyd, M. E. Blaney, Mary Lovely, Leonard Skinner, J. W. Quinney, E. C. Greenway, Abigail Stanford, and several others.

After an executive session the Senate adjourned.

House.—Mr. Olds reported a bill, which was passed, establishing certain post roads.

Mr. Gorman, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill to restore the civil for the military superintendency at the National Armories at Springfield and Harper's Ferry, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The bill declaring the Wheeling bridges to be legal structures was debated during the morning hour.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and resumed the further consideration of the Army Appropriation bill.

Mr. Mace made a democratic party speech, and

Mr. Moore, of Pa., spoke of the necessity of a reform in our light-house system.

Several amendments were made to the bill—one of them appropriating $200,000 for additional pay to the commissioned officers and enlisted men serving in California, New Mexico and Oregon, for the ensuing year; and another appropriating $20,000 for the purchase of camels for the army, on the Plains, as a substitute for horses.

The Committee rose, when the bill, so amended, was reported to the House. Several votes were taken, but without finally disposing of the subject, the House adjourned.

Washington, August 14.—The Senate on Saturday took up the message from the President of the United States relative to the Fishery question, and was addressed thereon by the Hon. Wm. H. Seward, of New York.

The House of Representatives considered a variety of private bills.

The New Orleans and Jackson Railroad.

On a right line from New Orleans to Jackson, Mississippi, the distance is the pine woods upland beyond the lake is thirty miles.

On the route recently surveyed, passing between Lakes Maurepas and Pontchartrain, the distance to the like upland is about fifty miles.

From those two points to Jackson, the distances are about the same, and the facilities for constructing the railroad may be assumed as the same.

The difference then is twenty miles. The cost of constructing this whole fifty miles is estimated by those most competent to judge, at $14 000 per mile. If we add a liberal sum for the bridge across the Manchac, the whole cost of this most difficult portion of the work must amount to about one million of dollars.

If this million of dollars were expended upon the direct line, it would give $21,333 per mile. Or if we deduct five miles, as being similar in all respects to the route around the lake, and therefore not likely to cost more than $18,000 per mile, we should have left $36 000 per mile for constructing the road across the lake.

Let us deduct $5000 per mile for the cost of iron, (a liberal allowance) for this will be the same on all routes; and we have $31 400 per mile for constructing the track upon piles, and laying the rails across Lake Pontchartrain.

Query. Would not a contract be promptly taken at that, or a less sum?

What are the real difficulties in the way of this proposition? It cannot be denied that difficulties exist.

I answer the following. There may be others that do not occur to me:

1. The lake is a navigable water—the property of the United States.

2. The questionable practicability of making a safe and permanent track across the lake, on account of its depth and uncertain bottom.

3. The dangers to life resulting from any accident, such as running off the track with the cars.

As to the first difficulty, there would probably be no opposition to the construction of the road, provided suitable draws were made, one near each shore and one in the middle of the lake, to admit of the passage of vessels, as required by the law relating to roads across navigable waters.

It will be recollected that the lake trade is almost wholly to and from New Orleans, and its transit across the lake would be parallel to, and not transverse to the line of the road; and it would experience very little delay or obstruction in passing through the draws.

The second objection I shall endeavor to meet in another number, if this meets a favorable reception. Some works now being constructed seem to pinch this matter in a light altogether more favorable; and such lights must be heeded by those who conduct public enterprise.

The third objection is in a great measure removed by the simple suggestion that the track would be straight throughout its whole length, and therefore not likely to experience such accidents as the running the cars off the track. It is moreover obvious, that it would be much safer from the obstruction that vicious persons sometimes place upon railways. With a telegraph along the track to communicate from side to side, all risk of collision could be avoided.

What are the inducements to undertake this line rather than the land route?

The answer is, that it saves twenty miles of distance in the line, and avoids the dangers of overseas inundation.

The answer needs no elaboration.

Later from California.—By the arrival at New York of the steamships Illinois and Northern Light, we have some later California items. The Northern Light brought dates to the 17th ult.

There is a project on foot to expel all the Indians from Mariposa county.

The accounts from the mining regions are of a highly satisfactory character, and the yield of gold continues unabated.

It was reported that the difficulties previously existing between the Americans and foreigners in Mariposa county, had been settled.

A rumor was current in San Francisco at the time the steamer sailed, that Georgetown had been destroyed by fire.

Interior Intelligence.—At Little Rock (Ark.) on the 10th, the river was falling slowly, with three feet water in the channel, and no prospect of a rise.

The Louisville (Ky.) Journal of the 10th says: "There were three feet water in the canal last evening, and the river rising slowly. We had a very heavy fall of rain last evening, and, from appearances, we shall have more. If it should prove to be general, it may help navigation."

The Emily, White River and Memphis mail packet, was lately snagged and sunk in White River, near Jacksonport; after which she broke in two.

Insubordination among Sailors.—The Norfolk Argus states that on Tuesday night, the 10th instant, some of the sailors attached to the United States sloop-of-war Cyane, now lying off the naval anchorage, obliterated the white streak painted around the ship by the application of an admixture of tar and black paint. After this they hoisted to the topmast on old chair, and were guilty of other fantastic tricks. Some half dozen of the crew of this vessel were tried recently before the Court Martial sitting on board the Pennsylvania for disorderly conduct while on her late cruise on the West India station.

Crops in New York.—The wheat crop of New York, it is said, is all secured, and it turns out well; the yield has been good. Of rye, but little has been planted, but it has turned out well. Oats, turu out pretty well; a great amount was sown. Indian corn has not yielded well, but a very large area is covered with it. Potatoes abundant and good. Hay and grass, two-thirds crop only. Fruit scarce.

Sunday Liquor Law.—An attempt to fine parties for selling liquor in Brooklyn, in violation of a city ordinance, has failed, the magistrates deciding that the ordinance was in conflict with the State law for regulating the sale of liquors.

The Savannah Republican states that a monster shark was caught recently, off Tybee. It measured fifteen feet from the end of its tail to the tip of the nose, and when opened it was found to contain ten king crabs, a sea-gull, and a man's boot, with any quantity of bones resembling those of the human body. It took seven men to haul and lash it to the gunnel of the pilot boat.

Further by the Canada—Liverpool Markets.

New York, August 17

The sales of Cotton in the Liverpool market for the three days preceding the departure of the Canada were 24,000 bales, and for the whole week 57,000 to 58,000 bales. Of this amount 9810 bales were taken for speculation, 6270 for export, and about 30,000 by the trade. Prices were a shade lower, most qualities having given way 1-16 to 1-8d., but the principal decline was in the middling and lower grades. The principal brokers quote as follows: New Orleans Fair 6½, New Orleans Middling 6½, Mobile Fair 6, Mobile Middling 5—, Atlantic Fair 6, Atlantic Middling 5¾d. The imports of the week were 50,230 bales, of which 14,150 were American descriptions. The stock on hand exclusive of the amount on board ship, on Friday, the 6th of August, was 535,000 bales.

WATCHING.

The following lines are printed from the proof-sheets of the volume of poems soon to be issued by L. Colby, from the pen of Mrs. Emily C. Judson. The poem was evidently written in the East, during Mrs. Judson's lonely watches by the bedside of her husband. [N. Y. Recorder.

Sleep, love, sleep!
The dusty day is done.
Lo! from afar the freshing breezes sweep
Wide over groves of balm,
Down from the towering palm.
In at the open casement cooling run,
And round thy lowly bed,
The bed of pain,
Bathing thy patient head.
Like grateful showers of rain,
They come:
While the white curtains, waving to and fro,
Fan the sick air;
And pityingly the shadows come and go,
With gentle human care,
Compassionate and dumb.

The dusty day is done.
The night begun;
While prayerful watch I keep
Sleep, love, sleep!
Is there no magic in the touch
Of fingers thou dost love so much?
Pain would they scatter poppies o'er thee now,
Or with soft sapors,
The tremulous lip its own supendhe press
Upon the weary lid and aching brow.
While prayerful watch I keep,
Sleep, love, sleep!

On the pagoda spire
The bells are swinging,
Their little golden mrcles in a flutter,
With tales the wooing winds have dared to utter,
Till all are ringing
As if a choir
Of golden-nested birds in heaven were singing:
And with a lulling sound
The music floats around,
And drops like balm into the drowsy ear,
Commingling with the hum
Of the Sepoy's distant drum.
And lazy beetle ever droaning near,
Sounds those of deepest silence born,
Like night made visible by morn;
So silent, that I sometimes start
To hear the throbbing of my heart,
And watch with shivering sense of pain,
To see thy pale lids lift again.

The lizard, with his mouse-like eyes,
Peeps from the mortise in surprise
At such strange quiet after day's harsh din;
Then ventures boldly out,
And looks about,
And with his hollow feet
Treads his small evening beat,
Darting upon his prey
In such a trickery, winsome sort of way,
His delicate marauding seems no sin;
And still the curtains swing.
But noiselessly;
The bells a melancholy murmuring,
As tears were in the sky;
More heavily the shadows fall,
Like the black folding of a pall,
Where juts the rough beam from the wall.
The candles flare
With fresh gusts of air;
The beetle's drone
Turns to a dirge-like, solitary moan,
Night deepens, and I sit in cheerless dmuht alone.

THE LAWS OF HONOR.

The Canadian.

Visiting lately a rural district of Scotland, we were led to pay a visit to a small private asylum for lunatics—a scene always peculiarly attractive to those who take an interest in the philosophy of the mind. Everything was found to be in a most comfortable and creditable condition—as unlike as possible to that of all such places twenty or thirty years ago. One individual, out of the small number of persons confined there, arrested our special attention. He was a man past mid-age, upright in person, and with that general bearing which at once indicates the military man. His manner was quick and lively, or rather restless, and this was, in truth, the only feature in his department from which one could have guessed anything to be amiss with him. He spoke rapidly, and with apparent good sense, and seemed to take a pleasure in talking with visitors, as well as to have an anxiety to entertain them. His power to do so was in a great measure confined to the exhibition of his room, and the few curiosities contained in it. He had everything in excellent order, the habits of the soldier in this respect being evidently strong within him. All his books were neatly arranged, and his numerous papers were docketed and shelved with the greatest regularity. These papers consisted chiefly of memorials to Government or the War-office, the drawing up of which formed the great occupation, we were told, of his days, and the main theme of his conversation. Altogether, he spoke so sensibly, and every thing about him had such an appearance of order and respectability, that it was impossible not to feel an interest in the poor man, or to avoid entertaining some curiosity as to his past history. Fortunately a friend was able to supply the desired information on this point.

"Poor Captain B——," said our informant, "is a victim to the nicetles of military honor at the present day, though, in some measure, as you shall hear, he assuredly deserved his fate. He served with credit in the British army during the early part of the continental war, and was subsequently sent ont with his regiment to one of the West India Islands, for the possession of which the French were then disputing with us. The British took the Island, and remained stationed in it for some time, but they were in turn attacked and expelled by the French. A considerable number of our soldiery were taken prisoners, and among them was Captain B——. He was a man unpossessed of that degree of mental fortitude which can render endurable any change occurring in the way of duty, and fretted greatly under the misfortune that befel him. Nevertheless, like others, he gave his parole not to attempt an escape, and on the faith thereof, was permitted to enjoy a good deal of license in his movements. He and his companions were not permitted to roam wherever they chose, indeed, on the Island, but they were allowed the freedom of a large open space for the benefit of air and exercise.

"Such had been the state of things for some weeks, when, one day, a British ship was seen hovering off the island. Captain B—— saw it among others, and instantly the possibility of an escape occurred to him. If he could quit his place of confinement, and put off in a small boat from the coast, under cover of the shade of the evening, the probability was that he would readily reach the ship. But, then, his parole—the word of honor given by him not to attempt flight! Captain B—— was not blind to the impropriety of breaking a pledge of this kind; but the desire of escape gained the ascendancy over all other feelings, and smoothed down all objections. That night, without communicating his intention to any one, the captain contrived to leave his room, clambered over the wall enstriding his place of confinement, and made his way safely to the beach. The moonlight enabled him to see the British ship at but a short distance, and he got hold of a very small boat without being observed. In this vessel, after a long and laborious pull at the oars, the captain found himself at last by the side of his country-men's ship, and was taken in greatly exhausted.

"To the officer in the command, Captain B—— said nothing about his parole, but when conveyed to Jamaica, where his regiment then lay with the rest of the forces on the West India station, he found himself obliged to tell the truth, knowing that, sooner or later, it would be learned from others, whether he himself told it or not. After the excitement attending the act of escape had passed off, he had begun to reflect, with some uneasiness, on the light in which the matter might be viewed by his superiors in command. But the reality was far more harassing than he had at all anticipated. His Colonel, when informed of the affair, threw him instantly into arrest, and summoned a court martial to inquire into the matter. The captain's statement was decisive against himself. He admitted having given his parole, and having broken it. The decision against him was unanimous, and to the effect, that "his conduct was most unworthy a British officer and gentleman, and calculated to throw disgrace on the whole service." It was, moreover, resolved that he should be instantly sent back again to the French station, with the explanation, that "the British army, to a man, reprobated the conduct of Captain B——in breaking his parole."

"Accordingly, by the earliest opportunity, the unlucky officer was reconveyed to his late place of confinement among the French. His state of mind, under these circumstances, was pitiable. To be so cast off and repudiated by his own friends, and to be sent back to meet still greater disgrace, and perhaps punishment, at the hands of the enemy, was indeed calculated to gall his feelings most deeply. The results of his re-transmission to the French station made the case much worse. When he was landed under a flag of truce, and conveyed to the quarters of the General in command, that personage immediately called his principal officers about him, and held a consultation with them. Captain B—— was present, and every eye was turned upon him with indignant contempt. The conference was short, and ended in the commander sitting down to write a note, which here, that the French were highly gratified with the politeness of the British in sending back Captain B——, and sincerely believed that every man in the British army must despise his conduct in violating his word of honor; but that they (the French) begged leave to return him to his friends, as they declined keeping, or having anything further to do with so mean a rascal.' This note was read aloud to Captain B——, and that unfortunate person was afterwards under the necessity of returning to the vessel which had brought him from Jamaica.

"If the feeling of shame and disgrace endured by the captain was great before, it was increased tenfold on his return to Jamaica with the scornful note of the French commander. All his former friends cut him directly and avowedly. No man would speak to or associate with him, and he was ultimately obliged to petition to be sent home on the plea of bad health. In reality, his bodily health was perfectly good, but not so with his mental health. The circumstances here related preyed upon his thoughts, until reason was shaken from her throne. This change was first made apparent in England, by the incessant and lengthy memorials which he poured in upon Government, all relating to his own services and sufferings, and conceived in such rambling terms as clearly to indicate the writer's state of mind. We believe that from Government came the suggestion of confinement. However this may be, Captain B—— was placed in a private asylum; and there he now is, and is likely to be for the remainder of his days. It is, perhaps, well that the poor man thinks himself injured, for he is rendered by that impression comparatively happy. By one breach of the laws of honor, he lost his place for ever in society, and perhaps put undeservedly; yet, no one can regret any circumstances which tend to give him comparative ease in his, at best, most unfortunate condition."

ENGLAND.

The elections are now over, with the exception of five vacancies yet to be filled, namely: Orkney and Wick in Scotland, and Tyrone and Donegal in Ireland. It is, even with the returns before us, a difficult matter to tell what majority—for majority they will have—the Derby ministry will be able to command in the House.

MINISTERIAL CHANGES.—It is again rumored that changes are about to be made in the Foreign Office. Lord Malmesbury will, it is said, succeed Lord Clanrby at Paris—the latter going to Constantinople; and the portfolio of Foreign Affairs will then be confided to Lord Canning, better known as Sir Stratford Canning.

OCEAN STEAMER CAPTAINS.—The Board of Trade has issued an invitation to captains of ocean steamers to be examined as to their acquaintance with the steam engine, and to take certificates of proficiency therefor.

ANOTHER AMERICAN YACHT VICTORY.—The American-built Yacht Truant, belonging to Mr. Ormuell, came in first at the Liverpool Yacht race, on Saturday, and gained her owner a piece of plate.

ARRIVAL OUT OF THEATRICAL ARTISTES.—The Sun says: There has been quite an influx of our transatlantic brethren of literature and the drama, in London the present season. Among the late arrivals are Mr. Edwin Forrest, Miss Cushman, Mrs. Abbott, Mrs. J. R. Stebbins, Miss Grace Greenwood, the authoress; Mr. Buckman, the tragedian; Mr. Owens, lessee of the Baltimore Museum; Mr. Howard Paul, the dramatist; J. Hall Wilton, Mr. Barnum's theatrical director, who engaged Mnlle. Jenny Lind on her American tour.

MISCELLANEOUS.—On the 24th, the sub-marine telegraph between Donaghadee, Ireland, and Portpatrick, Scotland, was laid down successfully, but was not put in connection with wires on land.

Numerous lrauds by Australian obligration companies have been exposed in London within the past few days.

EMIGRATION RIOTS IN IRELAND.—In Ireland deplorable scenes have taken place at the election in county Clare, South of Ireland. The military were called out and several lives sacrificed. On Thursday, polling for Sir J. F. Fitzgerald, Cornelius O'Brien and Col. Vandeleur, at Six-mile bridge, about seven miles from Ennpreh, when a riot arose between the voters on the respective sides. No clear statement of the affray can be had, but the most probable version of the story is, that the country people threw stones at a party of Lord Conyngham's tenants who were proceeding to the polls under an escort of military, and that some of the missiles striking the soldiers, they fired a volley among the crowd, and killed five men on the spot, besides wounding five or six others—three mortally. Twelve shots were fired by the soldiers, and all took effect. A jury has been empanelled; but, at latest accounts, had not returned a verdict.

Most of the Irish provincial papers that have come to hand teem with accounts of election outrages. At Ballina, the police had to charge the crowd with the bayonet.

At Roscommon, and elsewhere, the same disturbances took place. The outrages are much regretted by the moderate men of all parties.

AFFAIRS IN FRANCE.

IMPERIAL MOVEMENTS OF LOUIS NAPOLEON, ETC.—Louis Napoleon returned to Paris on Friday evening, the 23d ult. from Strasbourg. He drove in an open carriage between two lines of troops, along the Boulevards, the Rue Royale, and the Champs Elysee, to the Barriere de l'Etoile. His reception is described as having been extremely cordial on the part of the Parisians. Extensive preparations are already making for his journey to the South. The Municipal Council of Montauban have voted 20,000 francs; Rosanne, 10,000; Bordeaux, 50,000; and Pau a like sum, to give him a welcome.

For some time past the President has been arranging his household on quite an Imperial footing. General Roguet is to be Grand Marshal of the Palace; Col. De Beville, Palace Prefect; Count Bacchiochi, Grand Master of the Ceremonies; Col. Fleury, Grand Equerry, etc.

It transpires that new titles of nobility continue to be conferred, without any public announcement of them. The Patrie has taken to styling the President of his Highness Monseigneur the Prince President," but all the opposition papers omit the handle to his name. Nevertheless those straws are taken as an indication that the wind again sets in an Imperial direction. An additional subject of gossip is found in the approaching fete on the 15th August, the birthday of the Emperor, on which occasion as many reminiscences of the Empire as can be will be revived. One of the most impressive parts of the ceremonial was to have been the inauguration of Napoleon's tomb in the Invalides, but the works cannot be completed in season.

M. Lemayne, formerly French Consul at Alexandria, Egypt, is appointed Consul General and Charge de Affairs of France at Buenos Ayres.

The approaching marriage of the President is regarded in Paris as a fact beyond doubt. The lady, however, is now said to be the Princess de Vasa, but another Baden Princess, grand daughter of Eugene Beauharnois and of Don Pedro. The lady is now undergoing the process of conversion from the Protestant to the Roman Catholic religion, in order to render her a suitable match.

Another body of emigrants are sent to California with the proceeds of the Ingot Lottery, have just left Paris for Havre, and are to embark immediately on board the ship Magellan.

The decree of the 22d January continues to be rigorously enforced. Placards are posted, announcing for sale the forests belonging to the Duc d'Aumale, in the departments of the Ardennes, Meuse and Aisne.

Accounts from the departments describe the ravages occasioned by the late storms. In the Aisne particularly, a hurricane had caused great destruction of property.

ITALY.

The Turin Gazette contradicts, as absurd, the rumor that the Island of Sardinia is to be sold to England.

From Florence we learn that the Tuscan ministry have been turned out of office. The Baudi Duke announced to his Cabinet that the line of policy they were pursuing was repugnant to his conscience, and contrary to his duties, as a Catholic Prince, towards the Court of Rome, and that if they did not adopt a more pious course of conduct they must resign. This announcement is said to have surprised no one except the ministers themselves. They did, however, tender their resignation, which was accepted. M. Rosilla is now at the head of affairs.

The Milan Gazette quotes a letter from Rome, which states that public attention regards as suspicious the numerous fortifications which the French are constructing around the Castle of St. Angelo, as also the circumstance that Gen. Bevaillart, under the pretext of instructing the pontifical artillerymen, has withdrawn them from Cevita Vecchia and the other defences on the coast, all of which he has occupied with French artillery. On the other hand, it is asserted that a communication has been made to the Austrian Government that the French garrison will quit Rome within a year.

A difficulty has arisen between M. Amici, Pontifical Governor of Ancona, and Mr. Moore, British Consul there, respecting the landing of a passenger without a visa on his passports.

In Naples, also, the British and the local authorities are at variance respecting some infringement on the rights of a Protestant schoolmaster, named Harrison.

Grape blight has again appeared in many parts of Upper Italy and Tuscany. In Sicily, we learn from the Catania Journal, it has totally ceased its ravages.

PRUSSIA

The Zollverein Congress adjourned on the 20th ult., to August 16. Previous to the adjournment, the Prussian Plenipotentiary announced that the 16th of August, the day fixed for the re-assembling of the Congress, is the last which Prussia will allow for replying to its demand on the States of the Old Customs Union, as to whether they intend to maintain or abandon their resolution of 25th May, relative to negotiations with Austria.

Considerable sensation has been excited in Berlin, by the condemnation for three successive days of the New Prussian (or Kreuz) Journal, and its subsequent declaration that it would cease to appear till the courts of law shall have decided on the legality of the decision. The Journal was made itself obnoxious to the French, Austrian and Russian envoys, and had gained many enemies by its plain speaking. The crown lawyers have since sanctioned the confiscation.

The National Zeitung, of Berlin, has an article on the treaty just concluded between Switzerland and the United States, in which it remarks that the unpolite London procedure regarding Neufchatel, has hastened the period for the commencement of American interference in the affairs of Europe.

We learn from Berlin that Mr. Barnard, the American Minister in Berlin, has succeeded in procuring the release of several Prussians, who had been naturalized as citizens of the United States; but on their return for a short time to their native country, were arrested on a charge of evading the military conscription.

Phosphorus severe at Ostrowo. On the 16th ult. a fire took place at Kalisch which destroyed sixty houses. Cholera had previously committed great ravages in the town.

Several Poles were lately arrested in the Duchy of Posen on the charge of conspiracy against the Emperor Nicholas.

The King of Prussia and Emperor of Austria are to have an interview in the end of September.

AUSTRIA.

The Emperor entered Transylvania on the 20th, and according to official accounts, was well received.

The correspondent of the London Times learns from a good source, that Gregory is to be, or has already been, sent to the fortress of Kufstein, in the Tyrol. The correspondent sincerely hopes the information may prove incorrect."

A Vienna correspondent of the London Chronicle says: "Mr McCurdy, the Envoy of the United States, returned on the 20th, from his tour in Italy and Switzerland, and, for the present, it is probable he will remain in Vienna."

HOLLAND.

THE AMERICAN EXPEDITION TO JAPAN.—We find the following in the Amsterdam Handelblad of the 18th: "We learn from a positive source, that the Government of the United States of America has abandoned its project of an expedition against Japan. It has preferred invoking the mediation of the Dutch Government. We are also assured that the Dutch Government, which, in 1846, made overtures to the Emperor of Japan, in the interest of the whole of European commerce, has accepted the mission, and we have no doubt of its using every effort to accomplish it successfully.

SPAIN.—Madrid papers state that the Spanish Consul at Neutrleans had sent home official intelligence that there was no foundation whatever for the reports of an intended filibustering expedition against Cuba.

PORTUGAL.—A rumor came by the Peninsular mail on Friday night, that Count Lavradio, the Portuguese Minister in London, is to be sent to Germany on the deliberate mission of getting Don Miguel to make a public and formal renunciation of his claims to the throne of Portugal.

A French gentleman named Barbier, who proposes to establish a line of steamers between Nantes and a port in the United States, calling at Lisbon, has petitioned the Government to exempt his ships from maritime dues. The petition is under consideration.

GREECE.—A letter from Athens, in the Independance Belge of Brussels, states that the Monk Christophorus, who had excited a formidable insurrection, had been arrested.

King Otho was expected at Trieste about the 21th, on his way to Germany.

Foreign Miscellany.

The letters from Rouen state that the market for manufacturers had become more active. There had been little alteration in prices, but the favorable result of the fair at Beaucaire had induced buyers to operate with greater freedom.

The first two large screw steamers, at present building at Dumbarton, for the Messrs. Burns and intended to run between Glasgow and New York, are to be called the Andes and the Alps.

The first volume of a new work on America has just left the press in Stockholm. It is "Sketches of a Tour in the United States, by P. A. Siljestrom;" and is entirely devoted to an examination of the school system in that country. M. Siljestrom was sent out by the Swedish government to make inquiries on this weighty point, and an octavo of nearly 500 pages is the result abounding in information of the most valuable kindand far surpassing any other European book on the subject.

Another attempt was made, a few days since, at the Hippodrome, Paris, to solve the problem of steering balloons. A balloon, in shape like a whale, was filled with gas, and attempted to be guided by means of a shaft of wood, suspended horizontally, with a sail at the end, to act as a rudder. To this shaft was affixed a platform, with a steam engine of four-horse power, working a screw with three arms of canvas, like three sails of a windmill. The experiment was made in presence of several scientific men, but was unsuccessful.

The process of cutting the Kohinoor diamond is going on successfully, but is expected to be a work of many weeks.

Hay, Jr. Ritchie, of Longforgan, Scotland, and Rev. Mr Sutherland, of Dingwall, are appointed by the Colonial Committee of the Church of Scotland, to visit the congregations of that communion in the British American provinces.

Accounts received from Scotland and the North of England, of the prospects of the harvest, are extremely favorable. The hay has been an average crop. Wheat looks well, and will soon be ready for the sickle. Barley is partially cut, and is above the average. Potatoes, though inferior in localities, are above an average. Beans are deficient in many places. From the South of England and Ireland favorable accounts are also received.

Louisiana Interior.

A NEW PAPER.—Mr. Winfree, jr. late of the Baton Rouge Gazette, is about to start a new paper in West Baton Rouge.

INDICATION.—A new Presbyterian church was dedicated at Thibodaux on the 3d inst.

CHOLERA.—The Concordia Intelligencer of Saturday says: "We are sorry to be informed of the fatal existence of the cholera on some plantations in Claiborne county, Mississippi. Feversalso are prevalent in Jefferson county of the same State. It is generally the case that when sickness prevails on the hills, the swamps and alluvions are perfectly healthy."

The same paper has the following items:

THE WEATHER.—The present week has been distinguished with several showers of rain—one of them quite powerful, and attended with lightning and thunder. It was somewhat too rude for the safety of the cotton bolls, which were knocked off by its violence. The nights and mornings which succeeded the showers have been cool with stirring breezes.

COTTON PICKING.—We heard of a number of planters in our vicinity who have commenced picking cotton in earnest some of the last days of the present week.

The Catahoula Advocate, of the 5th inst., says that two gentlemen on contiguous plantations, from three to five miles from Trinity, below Black River, commenced picking cotton on the 2d inst, and have been gathering about seventy-five pounds to the hand since.

The Natchitoches Chronicle learns from all sources that the cotton crop of north-western Louisiana is excellent, and is satisfied from observation that if the season continues propitious, abundant crops of both corn and cotton will be the result of the summer's toil. A gentleman informs the editor, however, that already has the dreaded moth made its appearance on his plantation, and that the caterpillar is to be the certain sequence. It is thought, however, that it is not the genuine caterpillar fly.

THE ARMY WORM.—Wpare sorry to learn that the army worm (not the boll worm) has commenced serious ravages on a number of plantations, on both sides of the river, in this vicinity. We might mention the names of the planters who are said to be sufferers, but decline to do so, from the hope that the damage may not be as serious as is now apprehended.

EARLY PICKING.—The Catahoula Advocate of the 12th inst. says: Mr. J. G. Brooks, manager on the Garrett place, Black river, writes us that he pressed one bale of cotton on the 6th inst. Who can beat it?

SPIRITUAL RAPPERS.—A convention of believers in the so called "spiritual manifestations" was commenced in Boston, August 0, at Washington Hall. The Rev. Adin Ballon presided; and Mr. John M. Spear and Andrew Jackson Davis were among the persons on the platform. According to report, some very odd things were done and still odder things were said. The male mediums were arranged on one side of the platform, and the female on the other. A lady from Dedham was among the speakers, and she professed to have a large circle of correspondents in the spiritual world, and among them Baron Swedenborg. They called spirits from "the vasty deep" of air, but the spirits didn't feel inclined to operate. They shut the doors and windows, and then the spirits preferring darkness to light, rapped immensely. We have "spirits" here, and they are much accommodating They sometimes produce "rappings" when they are neither called upon nor expected to do so. By the way, we may note that the splats have appeared in Scott county, Kentucky. The editor of the Georgetown Herald attended the manifestations of the spirits at the house of a very respectable citizen, and gives his views in an editorial of over two columns in length. He wishes to investigate th matter further before venturing to give an opinion. The mediums were a girl, twelve years of age, daughter of the gentleman at whose house the rappings took place, and two bare-footed negroes.

IMPORT OF RAILROAD IRON.—Some idea of the number and extent of the railroads now being built in the United States, may be derived, says the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin, from the fact that the importation of railroad iron in 1851 was double what it was in 1850. A table, carefully compiled, and published in Hunt's Merchants' Magazine, makes the import of 1850 about seventy thousand tons, and the import of 1-51 over one hundred and forty-one thousand tons. A large portion of this iron has been paid for in the bonds of the companies on whose account it was purchased. The remainder remains unpaid, or has been liquidated by exports, either of specie or of staples.

A BOLD LEAP.—A letter from Niagara says: "I heard from one of the guests that a young English lady had a narrow escape on Friday morning. Perfectly enchanted with the scene, and anxious to possess some memento of her visit, she, assisted by the guide, stepped off the ridge on Goat Island, familiarly known as "The Hog's Back," from rock to rock, until she reached the large slab which divides the American sheet of water, and in the crevices of which grew a small tree. From this, gathering a branch, she proceeded on her perilous journey—the boiling rapids at her feet, within a few yards of taking their mad leap, and the spray dying around her. At the second step the rock being wet and slippery, she fell, but caught the water here was shallow, and escaped unhurt. The guide, who had seen the accident, ran to the island, and thus escaped with an awful fright, and a thorough baptism in Niagara's stream, obtained, perhaps, nearer the extreme edge of the falls than was ever previously managed without loss of life. She neither screamed nor fainted when she reached terra firma, but, like a genuine woman, felt thankful for her deliverance, and proud of her trophy, which she had retained all the time."

LONDON IN 1852.—Mr. Weed, of the Albany Evening Journal, in a letter from London, say

"Have you a realizing sense of what London is in population and magnitude, really is? Do you know that in population it is larger than the census of 1850 showed the entire State of New York? The inhabitants of the city of New York, Philadelphia, Boston Baltimore Albany, Troy Utica, Syracuse Rochester and Buffalo combined, would not make, by three or four hundred thousand, another London. It has already swallowed up all the surrounding villages, and is extending in lamp districts in every direction, as rapidly as Milwaukee or Chicago spread themselves. I have been driven five, six, seven and eight miles in different quarters, without getting through the wilderness of dwellings. The railroad runs 12 miles, not through, but over the city. And as for the wealth of London, why, that is beyond the power, if not of figures, at least of computation."

AUSTRALIAN GOLD.—The editor of the Philadelphia American has been shown several beautiful pieces of Australian gold, weighing in all three guineas, and imported from London by the United States Mint as specimens. This is believed to be the first that has ever been seen in this country, as it does not reach us in the course of commerce. It was received at the Mint on the 5th instant, and it has been ascertained by an assay of part of the quantity, that that the proportion of pure metal is 995 thousandths fine; which is equivalent to twenty-two dollars per ounce, or thereabouts.

A FIGHT BETWEEN TEN TURKS AND TEN ENGLISH.—A letter from Constantinople, dated July 1, says:

The whole Frank population here are in a fever of excitement, in consequence of an outbreak of event, which has laid the British representative under the necessity of entering into a hot dispute with the Porte. Last Tuesday, the 29th ultimo, the Viceroy, Omer Pasha, with a number of passengers, proceeded, as usual, up the Bosphorus on the first station, which is Arnaout Kiuy, the captain would not land the passengers on account of a vessel lying alongside the wharf—he therefore went higher up towards the palace of Fethy Ahmet Pacha, the Sultan's brother-in-law.

On approaching the landing, a couple of Turks attacked the sailor sent on shore with the rope; the captain, therupon, jumped on shore, and remonstrated with them. In the meanwhile, the passengers were quietly coming out of the steamer, when the Pacha's servants and boatmen and other ruffians, armed with stones and deadly weapons, collected in an instant, and rushed towards the Franks who were on terra firma.

A dreadful scuffle ensued; the passengers, mostly English, and unarmed, for a while resisted the assailants, who dealt with their clubs right and left; the latter finally drove the Franks to the palace. Seven Englishmen, of known respectability, were wounded, more or less; one young man named Henry Jacob, was so severely beaten that his life is despaired of. The harbor master is also among the ill-treated. Several times he attempted—in his official capacity—to appease the Turks—but his efforts were of no avail.

When the police officers came up they quietly said, that they were not authorized to interfere and that they could not fight the matter out in any way. Yesterday, individual and collective complaints against the barbarous treatment experienced, were sent to Colonel Rose, who will, no doubt, obtain ample satisfaction for the injuries of the sufferers. The defence of the Turks is, that they had repeatedly informed the owner of the steamer that he should not land the passengers in front of the Pacha's palace.

SEVERE STORM AND DESTRUCTION OF A PRIVATE RESIDENCE.—On the 20th ult., Cambridge, Ohio, was visited by a storm, which, for severity, has not been equalled for many years. The large three story College building, erected on the hill at the east end of the town by the Methodist Protestant Church, is a mass of ruins, the roof story and most of the second story were carried to the ground. The new Methodist Episcopal Church was injured to the amount of some $40 to $50.

Later from Texas.

The steamship Yacht, Capt. Thompson, which arrived Monday, brought us news from Galveston to the 13th ultimo.

The News says that there is much sickness in Middle and Western Texas, though it is generally agtie and fever and not often fatal.

On the 6th inst, Mrs. Edmonson, the wife of Dr. E. Edmonson, a dentist of Galveston, died in her bed, her husband being entirely unconscious of the dreadful calamity that had befallen him, until he awoke in the morning and beheld the lifeless corpse by his side. Mrs. Edmonson had been afflicted with the toothache for some time, and had been accustomed to find relief in the use of chloroform, administered by her husband. It is believed that she was afflicted with the pain in the night, and being unwilling to wake her husband, procured the chloroform and, administered it herself in such excess as to cause her death.

A correspondent of the News, who has been traveling through the State, says that the crop of corn is immense, and the cotton crop never gave better promise at this season of the year. He does not think the amount of land planted in cotton is as large as it was last year. All the other crops look well, and give promise of an abundant harvest.

Texas is supposed to contain a population of 300,000 souls, having about 50,000 persons over twenty years of age who can neither read nor write.

The Western Texan says the flood in the San Antonio, occasioned by three days of heavy rain in the last week of July, was two feet higher than the overflow of last spring, which did so much damage. It swept away several public and private bridges, bath-houses, fences, etc. Buildings near the bridges were also washed down.

The postmasters on the route between Houston and Austin have all written to the Post-office Department at Washington City, recommending the establishing of a daily mail between these two points.

The Editor of the Texan Advocate learns that offers have been made to deliver corn to contractors for Government supplies at San Antnnio, at twenty-five cents per bushel.

A man named Samuel Compton was killed by a man by the name of Goss, at Cameron, recently, with a pistol.

Each of the following religious denominations in Texas have under their auspices the institutions of learning located as follows: Methodists, at Rutersville and Marshall; Presbyterians, (O. S.,) at Huntsville, Goliad and Fredonia; Episcopalians, at Anderson and Cuiderland; Presbyterians, at Dangerfield.

Two hundred Sunday school teachers are much wanted, immediately in Texas. They would find good employment, and wages equal to what is paid in any part of the United States.

The Brownsville Rio Bravo has the following paragraph:

MAN KILLED.—During the election at Brazos Santiago, on Monday last, an old man well-known in the army as "Spanish Peter," who has been in the employ of the quartermaster on this frontier ever since the commencement of the war, and who had endeared himself to the officers of the department by his fidelity and integrity, was killed by a man named Thibeault, who struck him on the head with a stick, fracturing his skull and causing his death instantaneously. Alas, poor Peter, he died as well he might die hell"—he is gone, and may the earth rest lightly upon him. Thibeault has been arrested, and is now in jail to await his trial. We, therefore, refrain from making any further comments upon this sad occurrence.

The Rio Bravo, speaking of the election in Brownsville, charges that a large number of illegal votes were polled. The whole number polled in Brownsville is stated to be 611, whereas, this paper says the legal votes could not have exceeded 414—making 200, or nearly one-third of the whole vote, illegal.

RAILROAD ITEMS.

MOBILE AND OHIO RAILROAD.—In Itawamba county, Miss., between $80,000 and $100,000 have been subscribed for stock in the Mobile and Ohio Railroad by the citizens individually, and in the County of Pontotoc, the people have voted to tax themselves, independent of individual subscriptions, $100,000 for the purchase of stock for the County in the Mobile and Ohio Railroad.

The Paducah Democrat learns from Col Childs, the chief engineer of that work, that negotiations are now on foot for putting the whole line of road, from Mobile to Paducah, under contract during the coming twelve months.

The Democrat says that the vote of the people of Paducah and McCracken counties in favor of the issue of $350,000 bonds, to be invested in stock in the road, already manifests itself in the increased valuation of property in Graves county.

The bridge on the Hamilton and Eaton (Ohio) Railroad gave way while the down train was passing over it, on the 5th inst. Two freight and baggage cars were smashed, and four persons badly injured. The passenger cars fortunately became detached when the forward cars fell, or the result would have been more serious.

A dispatch of August 7, from Albany, N. Y., says: "The express train coming east met with a casualty, to-day at Waterloo, in consequence of a misplaced switch the engine ran off the track, smashing it, together with the tender and baggage car. One of the passenger cars was literally demolished. A number of passengers were injured—three so dangerously that they were left at Waterloo. Mr. Erastus Corning, of this city, had one of his legs injured, but was able to reach home in the train.

The laying of the track on the St. Louis and Pacific Railroad was to have been commenced on the 15th inst (?)

CROPS—KENTUCKY.—The Louisville Journal learns that the corn and tobacco are suffering severely from drought, in Grayson and adjoining counties. There had been no rain for forty days. The farmers despaired of making any crop at all.

HAY.—In several of the New England States and New York, the crop of hay has been light, probably below the average amount in their usual seasons. This fact has caused some speculative movement, and parties are now engaged in buying up entire crops, deliverable in September, at unusually high prices. The Oquedensburg News says new hay sold there as high as $8 per ton.

THE RICE CROP.—The Savannah News says that in consequence of the frequent rains during the season, the rice crops on the Savannah river are backward, and that little, if any, harvesting will commence before the first of September. The crop, it is thought, will not be more than an average one.

THE WHEAT HARVEST.—The wheat harvest in the southern and middle States is now over, and from nearly all quarters accounts concur in representing an abundant yield. In the sections of the country where the crop has been garnered, says the New York Express, the grain is reported as being of an excellent quality; and as more wheat was sown in the United States last year than ever before known the conclusion is inevitable that the crop is the largest one ever harvested. These facts naturally indicate the belief that in the absence of any extraordinary foreign demand, the prices of wheat and flour will rule very low for the next year.

MISSISSIPPI.—The Aberdeen Independent, of the 7th instant, says that an immense crop of corn will be raised in that section, and if the balance of the cotton season proves to be as favorable as the preceding part, an abundant crop will be raised. Prospects of plenty were never so promising.

ALABAMA.—The Clayton Banner says that in some places not a great distance above that town the boll worm has made considerable havoc with the cotton crop.

NAVAL INTELLIGENCE—Norfolk, August 5, 1852.—Our Navy Yard presents "scenes stirring" and if I might prophesy, "the future is big-bellied with events," which, doubtless, the nation is yet to play a conspicuous part.

The sloops of war St. Louis and Cyane are now ready for sea, and but await orders to sail. The former goes to the Mediterranean, forming part of Commodore Stringham's squadron. The St. Louis is commanded by Commander Thomas N. Ingraham, a fine officer, and one calculated to carry our flag nobly should war destroy the present amicable feeling between us and "merrie England."

All the mechanics are hard at work upon the three frigates now fitting for sea. The Columbia has her lower masts on, and topmast polated, and she soon will be rigged. The Savannah then will be taken in hand, and then the Potomac." The noble steamer Powhatan is now ready for sea. All her officers have been ordered to report by the 10th of this month, and they come on board, she can slip from the wharf and walk to the fishing banks, there to show Johnny Bull a specimen of our noble steamers. The Powhatan I pronounce the finest steamer that we have in our Navy. The Superintendent chief Engineer, Mr Sewell, has placed in her engines, the superior of which cannot be found in the world. Whilst building, the slightest flaw in any of the machinery at once condemned it, and I now predict for her none of the breakdowns that attended the Susquehannah and San Jacinto, for forsooth she is faultless, and a more beautiful vessel the eye never rested upon.

THE CONVICT'S CHILD.... By Prince C. Carey.

Unlock the still home of the dead;
Down to its slumber we would lay
One, who, with firm unshrinking tread,
Drew nearer and nearer day by day.

For when the morn of life for her
Did all its beautiful light in tears,
The shadow of her sepulchre
Woke in her soul no human fears.

Eyes in the spring-time of her youth,
Before that she had wept or striven,
With all its wealth of love and truth,
She gave her young heart up to heaven.

Something prophetic of her doom
Before her vision sadly rose,
So, ere the evil days had come,
She gathered strength to meet their woes.

Child of a lost and guilty sire,
She felt what time must darkly prove,
That home and hearth were not for her,
Nor the sweet ministries of love.

And when her trembling heart at last
By maiden hopes and fears was thrilled
Clasping the sacred cross mostdear,
That pleading for the earth was stilled.

Turning from eyes whose tender ray
Burned with affection true and deep,
Love's passionate kisses never lay
Upon her forehead but in sheep.

Yet more than mortal may be tried
Was she who truly bore that part,
And the meek marty

FAITH.

Ye who think the truth ye sow,
Lost beneath the winter snow;
Doubt not, Time's unerring law
Yet shall bring the genial thaw.
God in Nature ye can trust:
Is the God of mind less just?

Reap we not the mighty thought
Once by ancient sages taught!
Though it withered in the blight
Of the mediæval night.
Now the harvest we behold.
See! it bears a thousand-fold.

Workers on the barren soil,
Yours may seem a thankless toil;
Sick at heart with hope deferred,
Listen to the cheering word:
Now the faithful sower grieves,
Soon he'll bind his golden sheaves.

If Great Wisdom have decreed
Man may labor, yet the seed
Never in this life shall grow,
Shall the sower cease to sow?
The fairest fruit may yet be borne
On the resurrection morn.

A SHORT SERMON.

Text, Luke xii: 48, "For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall much be required."

The justice of the principle set forth in the text none can or will question.

When men are gifted with great talents and powers of usefulness, all allow that they should be used for the glory of God and the welfare of humanity, and ought not to be selfishly devoted exclusively to the individual or his immediate family.

But does not this rule hold good, and is not the principle as true in relation to material, as it is to intellectual wealth? I certainly think so. God gives capacity and facility for the acquisition of mental and moral wealth, and so he does for material wealth, "for every good and perfect gift cometh from the Father of Lights;" without his gifts and kind providence no sort of wealth could be acquired.

But do the materially rich, with some honorable exceptions, feel, (I mean, of course, those who profess to be Christians,) the force of the above reasoning? Do they believe the doctrine? Do they carry out the principle? Really, my hearers, I fear not. I have been indulging in some calculations and reflections in relation to this matter, and I will now proceed to state them, praying a blessing on the hearers and the speaker.

I suppose, and I think the supposition to be a reasonable one, that in the eighteen Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, (I am preaching, you understand, to a Methodist congregation,) in among over a half million members, that we have one hundred men who are each worth two hundred thousand dollars, and make twenty thousand dollars each per annum. Now, I think, that these brethren who profess to be denying themselves, and to be following him who had not where to lay his head, ought to be content to live on five thousand a year, to be satisfied with ten thousand a year to carry on their business and add to their capital, and to devote the other five thousand to God, in any way they might deem best. There would be the handsome sum of five hundred thousand dollars.

Next, I suppose that there are two hundred others in our half million members, who could give twenty-five hundred each; this would be another half million dollars; together, the magnificent sum of a million dollars per annum. Would it be extravagant to say that the remainder of our half million of members could at least raise as much more? But I will not urge or discuss this point now, as I am preaching to the rich, those "to whom much is given."

This noble sum of a million dollars per annum could be raised in the M. E. Church, South, without hurting anybody, without detracting from the comfort of one individual, or the real happiness of one family. Instead of this, my hearers, it would be a great blessing to you and to your families, to devote this much of your surplus to the spread of truth and righteousness in the earth. You would personally enjoy the exalted and unspeakable satisfaction of being a public benefactor, and of hearing multitudes in this life and the next rise up and call you blessed. God "giveth to all," and it is a Godlike privilege to be able to give largely. God hath said that "the liberal soul shall be made fat." But the blessing and the benefit would not stop with you; it would be far better for your children to give less to them and more to God.

If you have, as I have supposed, one or two hundred thousand to divide among your children, they will be but too rich to do well either temporally or spiritually. I need not say that the rich farmers, merchants and manufacturers, who own the capital and control the trade of the world, were nineteen-twentieths of them poor boys, who by their industry and economy have risen to wealth and power. I need not say that the children of the rich men of thirty years past are now, nine-tenths of them, comparatively poor. I need not say it, for the world knows it, that nearly all the eminent jurists, politicians, authors and divines, who create and give tone to public opinion, who hold the reigns of power and rule the land, who shed glory on our history, and make our country the glory and wonder of the earth, have sprung from the poor and middle classes of society.

Riches, let me say to you, are, in the opinion of your speaker, in various ways inimical to a great and elevated development of the characters of your children. The children of the rich are in greater danger of being indulged and spoiled, than are the children of the middle class; not that the people of this class are naturally better, but they have not the means to indulge and spoil their children to the extent that the rich have; if they had they would most likely do as most other rich people.

Riches take away the necessity for laborious effort: for men, and especially young men, are not naturally disposed as much to labor as they are to indulgence: and without labor, distinction and enlarged usefulness is impossible in any field of enterprise. The rich young man is subject to many temptations, growing out of the fact that he is rich. Leeches and spongers will hang around him, and flatter and wheedle him out of his money, and most likely reduce him to poverty, if not to disgrace.

The rich young woman is in constant peril of becoming the victim and the prize of that enterprising and unprincipled class of individuals who are out upon the "vasty deep" of life—privateering in search of any well-rigged and richly laden craft in the guise of a rich man's daughter that they can flatter with false pretensions of undying attachment into matrimony.

Spiritually considered, how dangerous is wealth to the young! How rare a sight is a truly religious young man or woman! Why so! Because they have great temptations to sensuality and vanity—they have "great possessions," and have not been "beware of covetousness," and the pride-inspiring influence of wealth.

If then, my rich brethren, you desire your children to be eminent for knowledge, usefulness or true piety, it would be best for you to give more to God and less to your children. It would render industry and economy necessary to them; it would save them from a thousand temptations, and God and Eternity alone can tell the blessed influence of your noble example of devotedness.

My rich brethren, have I asked you to do do too much? Perhaps you think I have, and think perhaps that your wealth is all your own, and that you ought not to be urged to sacrifice so much to the cause of God. But hear me. Were not the great talents of Paul, Luther, Wesley, Asbury, Olin and Bascom theirs just as much as your wealth is yours? But these men say you were fitted for "great work;" surely they were. But have you not also, through Providence, been so circumstanced that you too can do a great work for the glory of God and the good of man? Oh, but these men were preachers, and it was specially their work to sacrifice and be sacrificed upon the altar of God. Ah! were they so indeed? And are you not bound to take up your cross, and deny yourself also? Have you not been redeemed by the precious blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, as well as they? "You are not your own; you have been bought with a price." You and all you have belongs to God—"for the world is His, and the fullness thereof." The power and facilities for growing rich God has given—he has prospered the work of your hands—and for what, think you, has God done this? that you may hoard it up—that you may enrich and endanger the salvation of your children? "For how hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God." "I tell you nay, you are the stewards of the manifold grace of God, and will have ere long to give an account of your stewardship, for we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ." Why must preachers be called to endure brain and body-wasting labors? Why must they consent to a life of poverty and sacrifice, and you escape all this, and on a flowery bed of ease gently glide into heavenly bliss? But my rich brethren, what have I called upon you to do? I have not asked and urged you to a life of toil and privation. No, I have proposed to let you grow richer every year—to have even a luxurious living. I have only asked you three hundred rich men, who make four millions of dollars annually, to give one of these millions to God annually. Do you think that the dying hour and the judgment seat of Christ will say that I have asked too much of you?

Oh, brethren, redeemed by the precious blood of Christ, favored beyond other men with the bounties and blessings of a generous Providence, what good might you not do? Your million of dollars annually given to God would publish sixteen millions of copies of the Word of Life, annually. How many churches would it build? How many destitute in our own and other lands would it supply with the glorious gospel! How many colleges and schools would it endow, and how many thousands of the orphan poor would it educate and raise to usefulness and honor! But lest I weary you I forbear. I leave to your own intelligent and conscientious reflections how much you could and ought to accomplish for the glory of God and the good of man.

And now to God, as is most due, be rendered all honor, power, dominion, and glory forever—Amen. J. B. Walker.

THE BLESSED COUNTRY.

So much as moments are exceeded by eternity, and the sighing of a man by the joys of an angel, and a salutary frown by the light of God's countenance, a few frowns by the infinite and eternal hallelujahs, so much are the sorrows of the godly to be undervalued in respect of what is deposited for them in the treasures of eternity. Their sorrows can die, but so cannot their joys. And if the blessed martyrs and confessors were asked concerning their past sufferings, and their present rest, and the joys of their certain expectations, you should hear them glory in nothing but in the mercies of God, and in the cross of the Lord Jesus. Every chain is a ray of light, and every prison is a palace, and every loss is the purchase of a kingdom, and every affront in the cause of God is an eternal honor, and every day of sorrow is a thousand years of comfort, multiplied with a never-ceasing numeration; days without nights, joys without sorrow, sanctity without sin, charity without stain, possession without fear, society without envying, communion without loss of joys without lessening; and they shall dwell in a blessed country, where an enemy never entered, and from whence a friend never went away. REVERIES.

My father thou didst promise oft to leave
The bright abode of Paradise, and watch
Around me. O, at this calm, holy hour
When all is hushed and still, save summer winds
At play among the leaves, and Ocean's wild
Waves breaking on the lonely shore, 'tis joy
To hope thy spirit hovers near, and ah,
What rapture could I feel the pressure of Thy hand upon my brow, as erst in by-done hours!

The last bright lingering sun-set beam
Has slowly faded from the sapphire west;
The sea-bird's mournful song has ceased; around
The forest green, ride Darkness throws her pall
Of dreary shadows, while Night hangs on high
Her vesper lamps—their trembling fires shine on Thy far-off grave, my sire!

Couldst thou but tell
Me of thy home of bliss! O whisper of Those sun-lit climes, those amaranthine bowers
Of fadeless happiness!

When pleasure holds
Her court amid the festive scene, where all
Is gay and glad—If is thy voice I hear,
"My child the hour of prayer." O ever thus
Around me watch, and guide my feet in ways
Of truth, that when life's scenes are o'er, thou mayest
Escort my spirit to the realms of light.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

J. V. BRANTLY.

Died, on the 20th ult., at his residence in Caddo Parish, La., Jesse V. Brantly, aged thirty-nine years and six months, in sure and certain hope of a blissful immortality. The disease which terminated his existence, was so violent in its attack and rapid in its progress, that it soon placed its victim beyond the reach of medical skill. Hence, his sufferings, though severe, were not long, which he bore with Christian fortitude and pious resignation. He was a native of South Carolina, but for twelve or fourteen years a citizen of Caddo Parish, La., and resided at the same place where he died. Notwithstanding the many unfavorable circumstances attending a life in a new and sparsely settled country, our brother cast in his lot with the people of God, and lived for twelve years a faithful and consistent member of the M. E. Church, filling with unwearied diligence and fidelity the office of class-leader and steward. His house was always the itinerant's home, as many still laboring in the vineyard of the Lord can testify, who have in years past partaken of his generous hospitality. His liberality to the Church, and particularly its missionary field, perhaps has not a parallel within the limits of the State; though not rich, yet possessing an ample competency, he annually gave "to the Lord" four bales of cotton, regardless of its price, besides his liberal contributions to the support of the ministry, building of churches, and other benevolent purposes. So great indeed was the missionary zeal which actuated him, that he was even desirous to have his annual donation continued after his death. It is needless that we speak farther of his life of devotion to the cause he espoused—his ennobling traits of character, which endeared him so much to all who knew him, but we hasten to notice some of the circumstances attending his most triumphant death.

It has never been the lot of the writer to witness a scene so solemn, yet so instructive and strengthening to the Christian, as the last illness of our dear brother. Though impressed, in the early stage of his disease, with a belief that he would not recover, yet the fact was not made known to him until the day previous to his death; and never will the resignation and composure evidenced by him upon receiving the intelligence be forgot by those who were standing around. His pious physician, having despaired of all hope, approached his bedside, and taking his hand, with a sorrowful heart and trembling voice, said to him: "Brother Brantly, it becomes my duty to inform you that you must die; if you have any arrangements to make, make them soon: you have but little time." Composed, and with a smile upon his countenance, he looked up and said, "I know it, Doctor; I have long been preparing for this hour; I am ready; I am not afraid." Soon after he exclaimed, "all is love, joy and peace in the Holy Ghost." Though at times his mind had been wandering, yet, now it became perfectly clear, and never for a moment after did he give evidence of a disordered or fevered imagination. He seemed to fear that his ecstacy of mind might be ascribed to some mental aberration, the result of his disease, or of medicines, and remarked several times, "my mind is perfectly clear." He spoke of death with the utmost composure, gave directions to be buried at the new Methodist Church, which is being erected near his residence, to which he had very liberally contributed, and frequently said, "It is nothing to die." Calling his weeping wife to him, he bade her raise his children for God, and then kissing each, he said "farewell;" then extending his hand to weeping friends who surrounded his bed, said, "farewell, meet me in heaven." The servants were then called in, whom he bade farewell, exhorting them also to meet him in heaven. Thus, in this happy state of entire resignation he continued all day, exhorting, praying and rejoicing. He saw the sun set for the last time, but there was no gathering darkness upon his happy spirit; it was illumined with the reflected glories of a world of light.

Hour after hour moved slowly by, and still he lingered, though often he expressed a desire "to depart and be with Christ." Painless and almost lifeless he passed the night calm, peaceful and happy, awaiting his change. Day was beginning to dawn ere death had completed its work. A few minutes before 5, the writer of this, standing by his side, observing that he was seized with a shortness of breathing, said to him, "Brother Brantly, you are almost gone," he nodded his head by way of assent. "Are you still happy? If so, raise your hands;" he made an effort to speak, and raising both hands, he whispered, "happy, happy," and breathed his last. If the tears and prayers, and unwearied attention of a devoted wife, anxious relatives and friends, and a faithful physician could have prolonged his life, then "our brother had not died."

"But we sought to stay an angel on the earth,
A spirit ripe for heaven.
And mercy in her love refused."

EFFECTS OF NIGHT AIR.

An error which exerts a most pernicious influence is the belief that the night air is injurious: this opinion hinders the introduction of ventilation more than all other errors together. Now there is not a particle of proof, nor have we any reason whatever to believe, that the atmosphere of oxygen and nitrogen undergoes any change during the night. But there are certain causes in operation at night, which are known to exercise over us an injurious influence. We will investigate them to see if closed doors and windows will shut them out or stop their operation.

First, it is known that there is a slight increase of carbonic acid from plants during the night, but this poison is generated in much larger quantity from the lungs of animals, and accumulated immensely more in close rooms than in the open air. It is therefore certain that nothing is gained in this respect by refusing ventilation.

The next difference between night and day, to be noticed, is the fact that sunlight exercises a most important influence on plant, and on animals: but it is evident that shutting out fresh air will not restore its rays.

Another fact is, that all bodies, animate or inanimate, exposed at night to the direct rays of a clear sky, radiate heat with great rapidity, and their temperature is quickly and greatly reduced; and it is well known that it is dangerous to the health of men for the temperature of their bodies to be rapidly and greatly reduced. But persons sleeping in a ventilated room, even if windows are open, are not exposed to the direct rays of the clear sky, (and the law does not apply to any other combination of circumstances; therefore this frequent source of injury to persons exposed, does not reach those in a sheltered house.

As to the injury to be feared from a cold current of air, I would observe that it is gross carelessness for any one to expose himself to this danger, night or day, whether the house is ventilated or unventilated. I believe there is not known any other cause which can be supposed to produce any special injurious effect at night, and the least reflection will show that not one of those mentioned can by any possibility injure a person more in a ventilated than in an unventilated house. It therefore follows that the objection of the night air being injurious is entirely futile. The pure atmosphere has nothing to do with causing the death of persons exposed at night within the tropics; nor does it produce the cough of the consumptive and asthmatic, nor the languor and misery which the sick so frequently experience.

These and other sufferings experienced more particularly at night, are caused by carbonic acid, absence of sunlight, rapid reduction of temperature, the night being saturated with moisture, etc., and not by that without which we cannot live three minutes. It is absurd to suppose that fresh air supports our life and destroys our health at one and the same time. The same thing cannot possess the utterly incompatible character of good and evil, of supporting life and destroying it.

A Christian's Reflections on Death.

I would not give one moment's enjoyment of the calm serenity which pervades my mind, when thinking of death, for lives spent in gaiety and mirth. Death! how soothing the thought as it gently steals o'er me. Why should I wish to linger here? Earth's charms are few. Go hence my spirit, and dwell in the bright peaceful land above. Thy loved ones will ere long meet thee there. Dissolution, seize my feeble frame, and free my sad spirit, and let it be happy with its Maker, for all happiness here below has forever fled. Ah! sweet and soothing thought, that my days will soon be numbered. Look up, my soul to heaven; no longer tarry; the angels are calling thee away. Bend my knee once more, ere my spirit wings forever its homeward flight! Hark, that angelic sound, whence comes it? It summons thee, my soul, to tune thy golden lyre to hymns of praise. The hour has come, and now one long farewell till we meet at the judgment seat of Christ.

A Dreadful Risk.—A few Sabbaths since, at the close of a discourse of great pungency and plainness, a preacher made a solemn appeal to his hearers, whether, in view of the truths and warnings he had uttered, they would run the risk of denying the work of repentance? Will you run the risk of losing your souls? Will you run the risk of perishing in your sins, and dying without hope? The appeal was kindly and solemnly pressed on the minds of those present. At the close of the service, in passing down the aisle, a lady, deeply impressed with the appeal which had been made, said in a low but earnest tone to a gay young lady of her acquaintance, "Can you resist such an appeal as you have just heard? Will you venture to run the risk of losing your soul?" "O yes," she replied in a thoughtless tone, "I will run the risk." A few days after, the pastor who made the appeal was called to attend the funeral of a young lady in a certain street, who had died suddenly. It proved to be the young lady who had ventured to run the dreadful risk of losing her soul. Behind the curtain of eternity we may not penetrate, or follow the spirit to its last account. PROFITABLE CAMP MEETINGS.

The camp meeting, though not necessary to the development of spiritual life in a believer, or to the conversion of the word, is nevertheless a very delightful means of Grace. Objections lie against it we know, in many judicious and reflective minds. Yet placing these objections in the balance, and weighing them against the acknowledged benefits proceeding from it, the latter will be found so far to exceed the former as to justify if not to demand its continuance. The camp meeting, with all its inconveniences, is an instrument of great spiritual good; therefore let it be sustained! And with a vigor which will ensure its highest success.

To enjoy a camp meeting it is necessary to make all proper arrangements at home. The husband should place his family in a condition not to suffer inconvenience through his absence. The merchant should properly arrange his business, so that it may be left with safety; and the mechanic, the apprentice, and the domestic should have fit and seasonable understanding with their employers. By neglecting these precautions, religion may be seriously wounded; and the parties meet with contentions on their return which will neutralize all the pious influence of the meeting on their own minds.

Having made these preparations, the person who intends to derive spiritual profit from the camp meeting, must next interrogate himself concerning his motives in attending. Relaxation from business, physical recuperation, social re-unions with choice friends are too frequently the chief motives which determine many to visit the sacred groves. Now, while we do not wish to decry these motives wholly, we do solemnly protest against them as controlling ones. A desire to gain spiritual good and to be useful to others ought to be the primary and governing principles of action. And they must be, if the parties wish the camp meeting to be any thing but evil in its effects upon their religious character.

The next condition of being benefited is a determination to yield to every right influence, when at the meeting. Mental submission to the work of the Spirit is the precursor of every degree of spiritual growth. It needs no violent excitement, no excessive agitation to enter more deeply into the mysteries of the spiritual life. Resistance to the teachings of the Spirit is the cause of most of those agonizing conflicts which many experience. Let the heart, if penitent for its errors, simply submit to the voices of the Spirit in the docile temper of a little child. Let it yield its sin, especially its unbelief, and calmly look for divine manifestations, and they will be given. The unspeakable joys of faith, the delicious meltings of love, the sweet sense of peace, the glorious fellowship of the Father, will assuredly follow. For our Redeemer wishes to give us these things. He died, he lives, for this very purpose. And our unbelieving unsubmission is the only reason why they are withheld. Yield then, when at the camp meeting, to all its right influences, and you will not fail of receiving divine gifts.

Another essential point is the practice of wandering from tent to tent. Abide with your own people—throw your whole spirit into their exercises. Follow after no extraordinary person or meetings. But wait humbly and patiently for the visitation of the Spirit in your own company. You may be less excited by this course; but you will be more truly and enduringly benefited than by buzzing about all parts of the encampment.

A regular, uniform attendance upon all the public services of the meeting is also important. Lounging at the tent door during the hour of preaching is the sure sign of a lazy, undisciplined, dissipated mind. It sets an example of insubordination, because it violates a rule of the meeting. When it is practiced from an acknowledged want of interest in the officiating preacher, it is contemptible and deserving of all censure. For then it is a confession that you have "itching ears," that you lack genuine simplicity of mind, and that you are ignorant of your own spiritual wants. Therefore, if you really desire to profit by the meeting, do not fail of being regularly in your place, before the stand, whenever your health will admit.

We might add other hints, equally important perhaps, but we must avoid prolixity. Let these be observed, and we will guarantee the result. Let the churches go up in companies, in the spirit we have described, and the camp meeting will flourish in all its ancient glory. Salvation will be its walls, and the presence of Jehovah its light. Returning in the might of the Lord, its attendants will spread hallowed influences throughout the churches. Revivals will multiply. Men will be converted: believers will grow in holiness, and the church, clothed in the beautiful garments of purity, will travel on in the majestic greatness of her strength toward the day of her universal triumph." [Zion's Herald.

A BEAUTIFUL PRAYER.

Lord, bless and preserve that dear person whom thou hast chosen to be my husband; let his life be long and blessed, comfortable and holy; and let me also become a great blessing and comfort unto him, a sharer in all his joys, a refreshment in all his sorrows, a meet-helper for him in all the accidents and chances of the world; make me amiable forever in his eyes, and very dear to him. Unite his heart to me in the dearest union of love and holiness, and mine to him in all sweetness, charity, and compliance. Keep me from all ungentleness, all discontentedness, and unreasonableness of passion and humor; and make me humble and obedient, useful and observant, that we may delight in each other according to Thy blessed word and ordinance, and both of us may rejoice in Thee, having our portion in the love and service of God forever. SMALL TALK.

David was a very small man—the stones in his shepherd's bag were very small stones; yet this small man, with one of these small stones, slew the gigantic Goliath of Gath, who defied the armies of the Lord. A cherry seed is a very small seed: yet with one of these small seed, Anacreon the poet was choked unto death. A hornet is a very small insect: yet it has a sting, which can make an ox roar with pain. A goose-quill is a very small quill; yet has it, ere now, revolutionized kingdoms, and is the only truly potent sceptre in the earth. We do not argue from the above, that our small talk will be particularly influential; we only cite these, to show that small things are not always to be despised. We purpose, Mr. Editor, to hold a quiet chat with your readers, about every thing in general, and a few things in particular. We shall purposely be loose, unmethodical, and scattering. As some of the old brethren say, "we shall draw the bow at a venture."

To begin, in medias res, did you ever attend a revival meeting, where many preachers were present, during which, there was not a great deal of surplus preaching? The great object of such a meeting is to improve the church—stir it up to the spirited performance of present duty—awaken sinners, and lead them to immediate and decisive action. Now, every discourse which has not these ends in view, on such an occasion, is very nearly thrown away. Some brother is called to preach. He is anxious to make a good impression—he has on hand a sermon which he thinks is some—his theme is a difficult passage, or a mooted point, or some original view—he is full of it, and this is a fitting time to let off his extra steam. True, he knows he is not there to make an impression, but to save souls; and that his sermon is about as well adapted to this end as a lecture on botany. But, then, when will he have such an opportunity of showing off again? He can stick on a little exhortation at the close, and trust to that to wake the people up. Another subject, far less ably treated, would accomplish a great deal more. But then, he might fail to preach a fine sermon. This, you know, would be the direst of misfortunes. Fail? Horribile dictu. He feels, let any thing else befal him, but let him not fail! Let him awaken and save no soul, but let him not fail. Suppose he prays, before he goes into the pulpit, and is honest in his prayer; would it not be something like the following? "O Lord! I am going to preach thy word. Thou knowest I desire to obtain favor in the eyes of the people. It would be the delight of my heart to hear them extol my effort. Therefore, O Lord, go with me, and help me. If I can obtain admiration and save souls too, let it be so: if not, let me have the admiration and let the souls go."

When a special effort is being made, every sermon, every prayer, every exhortation, every song should tend directly to the production and extension of revival influence. Whatever does not is out of place, and impertinent. Warm, pointed, exhortatory talks will often do infinitely more, however loose in style and defective in arrangement, than the most elaborate discourse, which possesses all the elements of a finished sermon, but which is on an inappropriate theme. I heard a distinguished minister once, in the midst of a powerful revival, preach a sermon, the burden of which was to prove that the earth possessed, within and around it, materials for its own destruction. Though remarkably fine discourse, its effect can well be imagined. It distilled a spiritual frost upon the whole congregation. For the time being, it wholly arrested the progress of the revival.

If brethren are desirous always to preach well-digested sermons, let them prepare such for revival occasions. Let there be, ordinarily, nothing to attract attention from the great object of the meeting, feeling that that is a good sermon which accomplishes the end in view.

My brethren in the ministry! attend to this matter. We are all involved, to some extent; for many, whose motives are pure, often err in judgment most wofully on this point. Souls are lost by our course. Let us abandon it at once and forever. But we are going beyond our intended limit. To secure the reading of this, we will cease, and resume our tete-a-tete at another interview.

Farmers' Boys.—One half of the farmers' boys, who, discontented at home, leave it for something more congenial to their feelings and tastes, do so because of the excessive dullness, and want of interest in objects to attract them there, and keep them contented. Boys, in America at least, are apt to be too smart. So their parents think, at all events; and too smart they prove to stay at home, and follow the beaten track of their fathers, as their continual migration from the parental roof too plainly testifies. This, in many cases, is the fault of the parents themselves, because they neglected those little objects of interest to which the mind and tastes of their sons are inclined, and for want of which they imagine more attractive objects abroad, although in the search they often fall in finding them. We are a progressive people. Our children are not always content to be what their fathers are; and parents must yield a little to "the spirit of the age" in which they live.

And boys pay too, as they go along, if properly treated. They should be made companions, not servants. Many a joyous, heart spirit, who, when properly encouraged, comes out a whole man at one-and-twenty, if kept in curb, and harnessed down by a hard parent, leaves the homestead with a curse and a kick, determined, whether in weal or in woe, never to return. Under a different course of treatment, he would have [illegible] home either at his birthplace, or in the immediate vicinity and in a line of [illegible]

THE DUTY OF THE CHURCH.

It matters not how loud a profession one may make, if there be upon his part a connivance at any sin, and especially if that sin be a crying evil, his profession is vain, and his religion a deception.

In the lives of its adherents true religion requires an undeviating observance of its precepts, and an open and practical hostility to every form of evil. These propositions appear superfluous, inasmuch as they are self-evident facts. We will, however, let them serve as a text upon which to preach the following remarks.

There is obviously—and it is but too lamentably so—a great lack of interest on the part of a large portion of the Church in regard to one of the most humane and worthy movements of the age, an enterprise which has for its object the pulling down the strongholds of intemperance—the master evil which has deluged our country and earth with wretchedness, and is the cause of at least two-thirds of the crimes which fill our criminal dockets throughout the land. In reference to all such non-committal persons—wear they the sacred garb of Christianity or not—it may well be said that friends of this enterprise, be that is, are not with us in the spirit of our cause, is as much against us in their example, and in the withholding of their efforts and influence.

Glad, however, would it be for the cause of the Church, if this position of indifference were all that tarnished its fair escutcheon. There are some of its membership—and it is to be hoped their number is small—who not only assume this position, but who even go a great deal farther and indulge in daily potations at the public bars of some of the [illegible] drinking saloons to be found at convenient distances from each other in all our cities, like so many gorgeous pavilions of pleasure, whose province it is to allure the unwary and guileless to their destruction.

How mortifying to the zealous friend of the cause, who upon expostulating with a young friend who has but recently contracted the dangerous habit of imbibing spirituous liquors, to have it said by him, in reply, in well timed persuasions, "The Rev. Mr. ——, an official member of your Church, and Mr. B., a deacon in another Church, both of whom may be seen every day in certain bar-rooms with glasses in their hands or [illegible] picious kind of liquid, in close proximity to their lips; and if they indulge with impunity, I don't see any impropriety in my doing likewise, especially as I make no pretensions to piety."

This example—be it criminal or indiscreet—the young man in his error adduces as a common mode of reasoning, constitutes it into an argument whereby to justify his own indulgence; and his friend, disconcerted, is forced to end his importunity at least for the time being.

The time was, it may be, when the pernicious practice by Church members [illegible] have been winked at; but if that time ever exist, it is now forever gone by. The spirit of light, emanating from the Sun of Christianity, reveals now to the Christian world the hideousness of the beast of intemperance in its multiform [illegible]. No extenuation now can be plead for the tampering with this gross vice, nor can be admitted for even the position of indifference in regard to its widely extended ravages.

Temperance, in all its bearings, is a prominent part of the creed of the Church, and as the members of the Church, in uniting themselves thereto, subscribe to its creed, they virtually pledge themselves not only to refrain from a violation of its principles, but also to use their efforts in its promotion.

In regard to those members of the Church of whom we have remarked in this article as being heterodox on this subject, in addressing to such, we would, in connection, respectfully refer them for imitation to the noble stand taken by the illustrious Apostle of Christianity, and the genuine Christian spirit manifested by him in his memorable words, "If by eating meat I cause my weak brethren to err, I shall never eat meat again." Now, brethren, if [illegible] willing to refrain from eating meat, that it will be readily conceded is not [illegible] able to the palate, but essential to the [illegible] ought you to be willing not to [illegible] baneful use of ardent spirits, [illegible] don your false position.

To prosper effectually, the temperance must be [illegible] a popular and fashionable drinking [illegible] popular, and must be regarded in character as a heinous vice, not to be tolerated. To accomplish these ends it is requisite that the respectable part of community, [illegible] all the members of the Church, give their influence in favor of the Ministers of the Gospel [illegible] rance in all its modifications and [illegible] more frequent denunciation in the pulpit.

NEW ORLEANS:

Saturday Morning, August 28.

MORALITY OF RAILROADS.

Railroads are now occupying the attention of the Southern and South-Western States to an unprecedented degree of practical earnestness. Companies are surveying routes, the public (not capitalists alone) are subscribing stock, and the best talent of the country is engaged quickening and enlightening the public mind on the subject. These are auspicious omens of Southern progress and well-doing.

Not the secular press is nobly setting forward this cause by its powerful advocacy, and all pervading intelligence, we are not unconscious of its claims upon the religious press. Railroads have been commended to public favor, and support exclusively upon commercial considerations. Truly, there is no apology for these, and they have been arrayed in such force and number that the citizen who still reluctates to fall in with the enterprise, must be equally deficient in the virtues of patriot and political economist. But the subject has its moral aspects, too. They are many and striking, and we propose to submit a few of them.

1. Railroads are a scheme for ameliorating the wants. This they do by furnishing cheap transit for the laboring man in their pursuit, maintenance and management; by giving value to that which is valueless, by increasing the resources of human industry; and by means of quick and cheap communication making that general in use which production which is local in production: turning worthless lands and idle workmen and commodities they create capital. The whistle of a locomotive is magical. It does more than else besides scare the cows off the track; it wakes up whole communities from lethargy to gainful enterprise.

No one can be denied an interest in these results. We are reminded, in this connection, of a late letter of Bishop [illegible], writing a letter on official business to Mr. Owen, editor of one of our papers, who had lately been a delegate to the Convention in Arkansas, [illegible] does not consider it out of place to quote much of his letter in remarks upon the business of that convention. He says:

"The [the Arkansas people] occupy a country abounding in advantages, which if properly improved must render it a very fair rival of our inheritance. It must, when the natural advantages are developed by the energetic enterprise of her citizens, in carrying out the plans for internal improvements which I am happy to see have been recently set on foot, obtain a heavy and flourishing population. Let her citizens lay their own plans. The central railroad to the Texas line is a work in which every man, woman and child in Arkansas has an important interest. I earnestly deprecate any sectional controversy or interest to divide the united, prompt and vigorous support of this great plan. Forgive this hint, which might seem a little aside from the point on which a Methodist Bishop should speak; but why apologize—whatever concerns agriculture, trade, or prosperity of the country, interests me, because Christianity looks to the improvements of mankind in the departments of social life, and therefore whatever tends in any measure to the improvement of society in any respect is peculiarly interesting to me."

2. The locomotive is a powerful social engine. What have not steamships done in establishing the neighborhood and brotherhood of the inhabitants of this globe? It has brought strangers and foreigners into communication, and is daily improving their social relations. And what the steamship is so wondrously effecting on the large scale of kingdoms and continents, the railroad does for cities, villages, neighborhoods, states. Every iron track laid down is a new social tie, an additional pledge of social harmony and international peace. One thought, one sentiment, thus operating upon great masses, though widely separated, and brings them to unity of feeling, thought and action.

By this means all the errands of Christian benevolence are facilitated. Take this standpoint for example. The New Orleans Christian Advocate, by the present lines of travel, does not reach many portions of Mississippi, Louisiana, and the western part of Louisiana, under seven or eight days. But with the railroads constructed, now in course, the religious press, with its evangelical messages and sacred vigor, could be thrown into all those regions in nearly as many hours. The same facility is open for tracts, bibles, etc. Besides, the pulpit would be opened to religious instruction, visitation, in various forms, that would be incalculable, if any extent, the field of Christian action.

3. Railroads redeem the time.—It is an old exhortation, "Redeeming the time." Sermons have been preached on it. Many a divine has bewailed the necessity of eating and sleeping. He grudged the time. He deplored the tardiness of locomotion. Time is a greater enemy upon time, and instead of renewing, it wears away strength. He that overcomes time, in any degree, is a benefactor of his race. A man travels a day to put him where he can do an hour's work. This accomplished, he returns the same way! Overcoming distance—this doubles and trebles time; for life is measured by its results, not its years. Railroads are time-savers.

[illegible] is now before us, bearing an invitation to a Methodist minister at a protracted meeting in [illegible] District. Were the person, to whom this invitation comes, to accept it, (as he would like to do) he must take a boat and perhaps travel on Sunday: be an uncertain time in reaching the place; preach and return: and the service rendered abroad would cost two Sabbaths absence from his own pulpit here. Were the Opelousas railroad in operation, he might fill his own pulpit on Sabbath, start Monday, do the same amount of ministerial labor, and return Saturday to serve his own congregation the next day. And this is a feeble illustration of how the availability of the ministry may be largely increased.

Men employed on benevolent agencies could canvass the country more thoroughly and cheaply than twice their number plodding the common path of travel, and often without any path. Presbyteries, Conventions, Conferences could meet, transact business, make appointments, and without long seasons of pastoral destitution intervening, or the expense and trouble of providing substitutes, the preachers would be at their posts again.

Is there nothing in all this to give the Church an interest in railroads?

4. Railroads promote Temperance.—Nearly every steamboat is a floating grog-shop. Its bar-keeper is as much a fixture as the pilot. Besides the bar, there is the social hall for gambling. A long, tedious journey on them has been the beginning of the ruin of many. Time hangs heavily, and temptations are not wanting. But the railroad has neither bar nor bar-keeper. The traveler is put right through, without pretence or opportunity for dissipation.

We have been struck with the neatness, thrift and morality of the villages along a railroad in comparison with those "landings," where the traveler, weary of waiting, is driven to various shifts to kill time, (various are the "shifts" provided for him) and when every boat arrival is the signal for scenes of profanity and uproar between the crews and the loafers and vagabonds that dwell about a wharf. The railroad is exact in its time, and systematic in movements. It comes and is gone. The operatives are few, and of few words. There is not even time to "take a drink." Ten such visits a day would do less in promoting dissipation in a city, than one poast-coach quartered there, with idle hangers on, or a steamboat touching once a week and laying at the wharf an hour.

5. Railroads promote the safety of Human Life.—Of all modes of travel, public or private, they are proved by abundant statistics to be the safest. Not more than two or three in a million of railroad passengers, perish by the casualties of travel. Four hundred and eighty-two lives were lost on steamboats during the last year. Supposing this to be above the annual average of mortality, yet how great the destruction of human life! How many thousands have been thus hurried into eternity under conditions the most unfavorable for spiritual preparation. This mingling of bodies and burning and drowning is not the sum of misery. Widows and orphans are made, and wailing fills the land. Humanity rejoices in the application of steam to this safer mode of travel.

6. Railroads are Favorable to Sabbath Keeping.—Travelers by slow stages on the highway, often plead the press of time, or the expense of laying by with idle teams, or the unfitness of the places they fall upon at the end of the week for keeping the Sabbath day with holy profit. With steamboats the most popular day for beginning a trip, at least in the South, seems to be Saturday, involving Sunday travel. Then there is the plea of falling or freezing rivers, when boats must hurry through any how, Sunday or no Sunday. Or, if conscientious passengers think of staying over the Sabbath along the route, they cannot calculate on a boat the next day; another may not come along in a week. And so a fearfully extensive Sabbath profanation prevails among travelers.

Now by the directness and rapidity of railroads, a passenger may reach the most distant point in the country within the six days allowed to man, and thus a specious pretext for breaking God's law is removed. Or a delay over Sabbath may be made and the journey resumed with certainty. The moral effect throughout the land thus induced, is beyond computation.

It is not asserted (alas, in few instances can it be) that railroads are Sabbath keepers. But it is asserted, that of all public carriers, by land or water, they offer to the public the most favorable conditions for Sabbath keeping.

The subject invites, but we pursue it no farther. It seemed meet that we should not regard this commanding enterprise of the day with indifference and hold back our humble co-operation, while others, having no higher interest to be served, are laboring for its furtherance. Right heartily do we cheer it on. If our remarks shall enlist any in railroads and enlarge the subscription, we shall be glad. At the least, we trust that the Christian, the philanthropist and the patriot will find in these moral aspects of the subject abundant reason for regarding the liberal schemes of internal improvements, now being projected throughout the country, with increased and lively satisfaction.

Mr. Greenough, the American artist, is now in Leghorn, where some while since our Government enticed into a contract with him to furnish a group of statuary, intended to adorn the eastern portico of the Capitol. The House of Representatives, we perceive, has inserted in the general appropriation bill an amendment appropriating seven thousand dollars to transport the work hither and place it upon a pedestal.

"When Socrates was asked why he had built for himself so small a house, he replied, "Small as it is, I wish I could fill it with friends."

Death is the only subject upon which everybody speaks and writes without a possibility of having experienced what he undertakes to discuss.

MINISTERING UNTO CHRIST.

The Saviour has identified himself with his Disciples, not only in his exaltation, but in their destitution and sufferings. They triumph in Him, and He is ministered unto in them. Blessed unity! "I was ahungered and ye gave me meat; I was thirsty and ye gave me drink; I was sick and ye visited me. * * * Lord, when saw we thee ahungered and fed thee, or a thirst and gave thee drink? * * * Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of my brethren, ye have done it unto me." "Faith without works is dead." Dead it must be, quite dead, which in view of such promises, does not secure abundance of the works of charity, where there is opportunity to bestow them.

A quiet, yet refreshing instance of this ministering to Christ, came to our view a few evenings since, in a visit to a bereaved family. It is no great thing, reader, in itself; but it is a bright, lovely thing. In it is seen the source whence spring the good things, and the great things too, that bless mankind.

A middle aged gentleman left his family here, for the Isthmus, to extend his business. Without greed of gain but with a husband and father's heart, he was making provision for his house. Soon he was prostrated by tropical disease and began his return home. The ship, three or four days out, put in at a port of a West India Island to recruit her sick. Our friend was far from the hands that were wont to soothe his fevered brow; a stranger in a strange land. Partially recovered, the trip was resumed, but he died at sea and was buried. In the top of his trunk was found the following note. It is short but implies enough to show that he had not passed, on that sultry island, the tedious days and nights of sickness without a friendly voice to greet or a tender brotherly hand to minister unto him. There was a missionary station there. An Episcopal minister occupied it, and he was not wanting in the spirit of his Master.

Are you a wife—(a widow)—are you a child—how would you prize ministering like this to your husband, your father, under such circumstances! Go and do likewise.

The letter was only intended to be to the sick stranger in place of a visit, and not for a newspaper. But we have obtained the privilege of its publication and give it entire and literal, with the omission of names. It breathes the spirit of pure religion and undefiled: a real every-day, flesh and blood kindness, well becoming this lower world of ours:

"Dear Brother—I have sent you the oranges, and my wife has sent a few tamarinds in syrup; they will be found serviceable in giving your mouth a pleasant taste.

"I know not if you are aware that your present attendant will leave you on Monday. Mr. F. informed me of it last evening and applied to me to procure another, which I will do. We have some cabbages growing in our garden which is at your disposal when your stomach will bear it.

"Being engaged preparing to preach to-morrow, I do not visit you to-day, but to-morrow evening, God willing, I will do myself the pleasure of seeing you. My wife unites in best and kindest regards to you. I believe I need not add that myself and all I have is at your disposal, and I esteem it a privilege to be allowed to minister to my dear Lord in the person of one of his dear brethren on earth. "Lord, when saw we the sick and ministered unto thee?" "In that ye did it to one of the least of these ye did it unto me." Brother C., I am 'bought with a price,' even the blood of Christ; I am his, and therefore yours, so call on me night or day, and command me and mine; it will be no task-work or sacrifice, but a privilege to be able to wait on my Lord in your person. I need say no more. And now may the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit.

"Yours, in the best of all bonds,

"Philip Livingston, Jr."

Claimants on Conference Funds.

One of the acts of the late General Conference, North, was to hand over to the Annual Conferences the settling of the question, who, in their bounds, should be claimants on Conference funds. Accordingly the Black River Conference of the M. E. Church adopted the following resolutions, at its recent session:

Resolved, That no member shall be a claimant on the Conference funds, who shall not have rendered five years' effective service, in full connection in the Conference.

Resolved, That any preacher who shall have rendered effective service for five years or more, shall be entitled to a half claim, during as many years as he has rendered such service, at the expiration of which term of years his claim shall cease.

Resolved, That any member who has rendered effective service ten years or more, shall be in full claimant for as many years as he has thus served the Church, at the expiration of which his claim shall cease.

Resolved, That every preacher, who shall have labored effectively for twenty years or more, shall be entitled to a full disciplinary claim, without limitation.

Resolved, That the distribution shall be made to all the widows and orphans of deceased preachers on the above basis.

Resolved, That every superannuated preacher, who shall be employed in any work, to which the Bishop might constitutionally appoint an effective minister, or who shall be employed as an agent of any other society, shall be required to report his receipts from such source to the stewards of the Conference.

This matter, though of no present concern to us, is worth thinking on. Dr. Patten, of Holstein C. Ad., remarks upon it thus:

"If it be a dictate of wisdom, of benevolence, of justice, that some provision should be made for the man who has spent the strength of his years in the service of the Church—receiving a bare support for the time, does it follow that with limited means the Church is equally bound to recognize and provide for the wants of one who has served her only when in his novitiate?

Some men enter the traveling connection with feeble constitutions, impaired health, and the seeds of hereditary disease—travel a few years, and then avail themselves of the provisions of the Discipline for the superannuated; and, in some cases, dwell with peculiar emphasis upon the fact that they broke down in the service of the Church; whereas, they would have suffered an equal or a greater loss of physical ability at any other active employment."

The Higher Law.—The people of this country will not forget soon the Shadrack affair of Boston. The law and officers of the land were overrun by those citizens who could not "conquer their prejudices" against an unpopular federal enactment. The Bostonians stroked their chins complacently at this coup d'etat of the higher law as if there would be no sequel.

The Bostonians have become so enamored of this doctrine, they will only do what suits them. The consequences are working out. Why not allow liquor sellers and their customers the benefit of a liberal construction of this law as well as others? Massachusetts enacted a liquor law, and entrusted its enforcement to the marshals of cities. The Boston fathers dodged by abolishing the office! Zion's Herald complains indignantly against this elusion of the claims of the Legislature and want of respect for the law! It says that from the aristocratic hotel to the plebeian beer-shop, the traffic is carried on with impunity. The following extract is good, especially the last sentence:

"Seriously, we enter our solemn protest against the conduct of the authorities of Boston. The dismissal of Marshal Tukey was a miserable subterfuge to escape an unpleasant duty. The giving of so many licenses on the eve of the passage of the law, expressed an intention to disregard it if passed, and the whole action of the authorities in relation to it is disgraceful to themselves, to the city, and to the State. It is also demoralizing in its influences on society. When men, whose duty it is to enforce law, set a righteous law at defiance, what can be expected but a consequent spread of a spirit of disrespect for legal authority, through all classes of society?"

The California Mission.—The Louisville side of the N. and L. Advocate has an emphatic editorial upon a letter of Dr. Boring's, published a month ago, on the affairs of the California mission. The Superintendent of the California mission complained, through the Southern Advocate, of the modification of his "plan" by the Missionary Board as having, in a great measure, defeated it:

"The moment that we saw our plan had been so modified as to require one preacher from each Conference, and in the event one or more should fail to furnish the man and money, some other more affluent should be permitted to send an extra, we were satisfied that the result would be as all former movements of the kind—disastrous. We knew then as well as now, that there were several Annual Conferences of the Church who not only could not, but ought not, to spare either man or money. The result has demonstrated the correctness of the opinion. The Conference sessions have long since been gone through with—the Bishops are preparing to enter upon the next year's round—the middle of June has come, and of the preachers called for and promised, we have received eleven, the last of whom, Bro. Graham, from Fla., arrived on yesterday."

Dr. Parsons, a member of the Board, submits a vindication. He insists that this modification was helpful to the cause, and thinks the plan has been amply carried out. After stating the 1st article of the plan:

"This mission shall be supplied with twenty efficient men, (including the three now here, and those on the way,) who shall be here and ready to work by the 10th, or at farthest, the 15th of April, 1852."

He quotes from the minutes of the lately organized Pacific Conference to show that twenty-one or two men were forthcoming. His editorial ends with the following semi-official suggestion:

"Would it not be prudent—to say nothing of the courtesy or respect due to the Missionary Board, that all letters from missionaries, on the subject of their particular work, and intended for publication, should be addressed to press through them."

For ourselves, we took a somewhat different view of Dr. B.'s letter, underscoring, in our mind, certain sentences. Doubtless he will speak out again.

Effhontery Extraordinary.—It appears from an animated correspondence in the Texas Banner, that on the laying of the corner stone of the new State House, at Austin, the officiating minister took advantage of his position to commit a marked trespass upon the union of the day. It is characteristic, and we give the case:

"The laying of the corner stone of the new capitol at Austin, on the 4th of July, has spread far and wide throughout the State discontent and contempt. One of the deposits in the corner stone of that building is an intrusion upon the sacred rights of all Texas. Side by side with the Declaration of Independence of Texas, are the names of the vestry men, etc., of the church—the Episcopal Church—deposited. If we are not greatly mistaken, the Masonic Fraternity will have cause to regret this act, so far as they were concerned: it will be a dark spot upon the lamb skin of the ancient fraternity for many long years to come. The organ of Masonry, on this occasion, was none other than the Rev. Mr. Fontaine, the pastor of the church at Austin, whose name is so sacredly to be perpetuated. The world abroad at once will come to the conclusion that "the church" is the only church that was in Austin on the 4th day of July, A. D. 1852—when thirteen years prior to that time the Rev. gentleman himself preached under the authority of the the Methodist Episcopal Church, and well know that Cumberland Presbyterian, Baptist, Campbellites or Christians, Roman Catholic, and Old Presbyterian had organized."

This writer, full of the '76 spirit, is alive to equal rights, and goes on to say:

"This matter should be thoroughly investigated. The Governor should at once order the work stopped, and the document taken out; it has no business there, and if it is found to be the work of the commissioner, or any part of it, dismiss him at once. A hundred years from now, when the house is torn down and that delectable document found, the "Church" will declare that there was no other church in Austin on the 4th of July, 1852."

Fletcher's Studies.—The author of Studies on Slavery has sent to the editor of the Western Advocate his book. We extract a sentence or two of Dr. Elliot's judgment:

"He that can approve of this book can approve of sin, and wrong, and moral turpitude of any or every sort that ever human depravity was guilty of. A pedant in learning, a bungling sophist in argument, and a Herodian in religion, the author of the 'Studies' seems to have courage enough to teach the world, as well as to denounce them for not receiving his palpable errors."

A Speck of War.—The Christian Advocate and Journal thinks there is "a speck of war in the Northern horizon." It appears that a certain "Mr. Gridley has had the use of the Northern Advocate to publish his strictures upon the action, or rather want of action of the late General Conference on the question of slavery. The "Official" applies the lash to Mr. Gridley with his wonted dexterity, and then throws the gauntlet at the feet of the Northern Advocate. His article closes:

"We have long delayed these remarks on Mr. Gridley's communication, for it appeared in the Northern Christian Advocate, of the 7th July. But we had no heart to this strife in the Church, belligerant as we are said to be. On the contrary, we had hoped on coming again to our former post, that the causes of controversy had disappeared from within, and nothing remained for our editors but to aid the common effort to spread Scriptural holiness over this and other lands. We were mortified to find we have been mistaken. And now, we have only to assure the Northern Christian Advocate, that if this war is to be continued against the peace of the Church, in a General Conference paper, we are committed to the issue, and may God defend the right."

The "Northern" is unterrified and holds on its way.

Camp Meeting.—The Observer of 22d ult. tells of a successful camp meeting just closed at Sonoma, under Dr. Boring, at which were several conversions.

RELATIVE SIZE OF CHURCH PAPERS.

From the following, which appeared in the N. and L. Christian Advocate of August 12, in a communication from the Rev. E. Abbey, it would appear that of all papers of the Church South, the New Orleans Christian Advocate is the dearest, giving the least matter, and charging the most money:

"But let us compare now, as was promised, the cost of reading our papers with what it ought to be. Our papers contain the number of square inches and are sold at the number of square inches to the cent, as set forth in the following table:

Memphis,	1218 sq. in.	316 sq. in.	to the ct.
Nashville,	1127 "	293 "	"
Charleston,	1053 "	274 "	"
St. Louis,	950 "	247 "	"
Texas,	864 "	224 "	"
N. Orleans,	840 "	174 "	"
Holston,	792 "	205 "	"

The average being 247 sq. in. to the cent. We would suggest that if the brother wishes superficial measurement for his money, that a steamboat bill or a circus placard contains more square inches than any of our Church papers. If he will compare the quantity of reading matter, this "Advocate" has nothing to fear with the largest.

A friend has taken the pains to see the difference in the number of words between ourselves and others.

New Orleans C. Advocate, of August 21, contains 38,150 words.

Nashville and L. Advocate of August 12, contains 37,725 words.

The South C. Advocate, of August 20, contains 30,429 words.

So much for the number of words; and then too, it should be taken into the count that we often use very big words, which take up a great deal of room and do not count so well, but which often serve an excellent purpose in making a subscriber feel as though he were getting the worth of his money!

The statement of brother Abbey, in his interesting article quoted from, though it may be correct as far as it states, is calculated to be the ground of an inference prejudicial to this paper. We have, therefore, in self-vindication, carried out the calculation as above. As to prices and square inches, we doubt not that all the paying and reading subscribers of our Church papers get the worth of their money, and more.

Shreveport District, La. Conf.

Brother McTyeire: I have closed my second round on the Shreveport District. The preachers are all at their post, and at work, except Bro. Davies: he is at his post, but unable to work. His health has been very bad for the last three months. I consider the work generally in good condition, with one only exception: I allude to the Minden and South Bossier Circuit. The North Bossier Circuit is supplied by Rev. W. A. Manly, who is doing well. He has a considerable revival on his work. I was also fortunate in getting a brother every way worthy and well qualified to supply the Natchitoches Circuit, who is doing well. Bro. W. A. Smyth is preaching in the town of Natchitoches to a good congregation. I think that should have been placed on the list of Missions. I indulge the hope that we shall be able to bring up a favorable report at the Conference. Joel Sanders.

Sparta, La., August 18, 1852.

Paulding District, Miss. Conf.

I have nearly completed my third round. We have some five Quarterly Meetings. I have just left Newton county 3d Quarterly Meeting, where we had quite a happy time. Several conversions and accessions; and the Church happy. The meeting was still protracted after I left. There is in progress a glorious work of God, in part of Hillsboro' Circuit. Our prayer is that God may spread it all over the earth.

I am yours in the gospel of Christ,

The Examination and Commencement of Centenary College.

The committee appointed at the last session of the Mississippi Conference, to attend the examination of Centenary College, beg leave (though with regret that only one of the patronizing Conferences is herein represented) to submit to the Conference and the public the following report:

The exercises of the occasion commenced on Monday the 19th ult., and closed on Wednesday 28th; the examination of the classes closing on Friday, 23d.

On Monday the classes in the Preparatory Department, under the charge of the Rev. A. G. Miller, efficiently assisted by Mr. W. L. Nugent underwent a rigid and highly satisfactory examination in English Grammar, Geography, Arithmetic, Algebra, Latin, Greek, and Mythology.

The exercises in this department illustrated well the fine teaching abilities of the experienced Principal and of his worthy assistant, reflecting great credit on the students under their charge. Principal Miller will have during the next year the joint aid of Messrs. G. M. Miller and W. B. Compton, highly commended for moral worth, scholarship and aptness to teach, in which employment both have had experience.

In the college proper, the Freshmen Class were examined in Latin, Greek and Geometry: the Sophomore class in Latin, Greek, Geometry, Mensuration of Superfices and Solids, Navigation, Surveying, Rhetoric and Logic; the Junior Class in Latin, Greek, Mechanics, Chemistry, Geography, Evidences of Christianity and Rhetoric; the Senior Class in Differential and Integral Calculus, Meteorology, Astronomy, Natural Philosophy, Constitutional Law, Law of Nations and Chemistry and Geology completed.

It will be seen from the above catalogue of studies, that the course is quite extensive.—The examination was severely critical throughout, and the continued exhibition of thorough instruction and scholarship fully sustained the high character of the Faculty, was highly creditable to the students and very satisfactory to those in attendance. The difference in degrees of proficiency were as slight as could be expected from the necessarily varied mental aptitudes and habits of study. The design on the part of the instructors was abundantly manifest not only to impart a thorough knowledge of the studies, but by continually exercising and disciplining the mind, to strengthen its powers, preparatory to future independent investigations. The words of the text book, excepting in definitions, rules, &c., were wholly lost sight of, the ideas only being required, connected in many instances with the independent views of the student himself. This prominent characteristic of a thorough, successful course of instruction, was so strikingly exhibited as to be deemed worthy of special note. Strictly impartial and thoroughly conducted, both by the faculty and the examining committee, the examination was eminently successful in developing the real proficiency of the students.

On Saturday we witnessed the commencement exercise of the Feliciana Female Institution, under the charge of Rev. B. Jones, assisted by a very able corps of Instructors, and we beg leave, thus parenthetically, from the exhibitions of the day, the very satisfactory character of the preceding examination, from our knowledge of the Faculty, etc. to commend this very flourishing College, as exceedingly worthy of public patronage.

On Sabbath morning the commencement sermon was preached to a very large audience by Dr. Geo. C. Light, from 1 John, 5, 20—the succeeding hours of worship being occupied by other ministers of the gospel.

On Monday morning, after witnessing a celebration of the Sons of Temperance, among whom were many of the students, and listening to the stirring appeals of Rev. Messrs. Harmon, Campbell and Harp, the audience were highly entertained in the evening by the exhibition of the Preparatory Department, in the form of speeches, dialogues, scenes, etc.

On Tuesday evening, after listening to very fine addresses, worthy of extended comment, by several young gentlemen, the vast audience were enchanted and delighted by an address, learned, able and eloquent, from Gov. Foote, of Mississippi, on the importance of education, especially in view of the advantages and responsibilities, present and future, of American citizenship.

In the afternoon, the Alumni were addressed on the advanteges of knowledge, in a speech characterized by philosophic thought by Robert Bowman, Esq., of Clinton, La.

At night, the audience were addressed in eloquent strains by six young gentlemen of the junior class.

On Wednesday, commencement day, the graduating class, consisting of Marcus T. Carpenter, Minden, La.; A. C. Huff, Wilkinson county, Miss.; D. C. Montgomery, Washington county, Miss.; J. Jay Lane, New Orleans, La.; W. E. Montgomery, Washington county, Miss., (third honor;) W. L. Nugent, St. Landry, (second honor;) and Charles Spencer, Catahoula, La., (first honor;) delivered thrilling addresses to delighted hearers, the last mentioned gentleman delivering a very fine address on "The Southern Graduates," and impressive valedictory addresses to the Board of Trustees, the Faculty, and his class mates. The young gentlemen were admitted to the first degree in the Arts, excepting Mr. Carpenter, who, in consequence of not having studied Greek (substituting in its place French and Spanish) was constituted Bachelor of Science.

The valedictory "Anthem" (composed by Mr. Nugent) having been finely executed in harmonious interminglings of vocal and instrumental strains, the Baccalaureate address on "The basis of true Greatness," able, eloquent, and deeply impressive, was delivered by President Rivers. We trust the young gentlemen will, in accordance with the excellent and beautified advice of their beloved Instructor "make Zion's hill their Parnassus, and Siloah's brook their Pierean fount."

After conferring the degrees, the President presented to each of the graduates a copy of the Holy Bible as his future teacher and guide, accompanied with appropriate and affecting remarks.

This unusual and commendable procedure was highly appreciated by the moved and delighted auditory.

Without drawing distinctions among the addresses of the young gentlemen, we will remark that all of them were highly creditable; some of them characterized by fineness of classic taste, extent of research, reach of thought, and power of genius, worthy deep attention and enthusiastic applause elicited during the exercises. Also are more than satisfied with this occasion.

The successive Commencements were opened with prayer, and with very fine music, vocal and from the well trained College chestra, under the charge of Mr. A. mar, who has been elected a Faculty, as Professor of Vocal mental Music. Prof. Blackmar is high moral worth, and so far as able of judging, is certainly well the duties of his beautiful vocation.

A Professorship of Hebrew in connection with the duties of dent, with the hope that formed, within the patronage of in this ancient sacred language.

The financial condition of the good. The College property, wns purchased of the State of $10,000; afterwards commuted for ten scholarships, in perpetuity.

There is a permanent endowment for the centre building; the to be completed, if possible, by residences, of lands belonging provided the State will grant the which it is confidently believed will

The tuition fees, with the endowment fund, fully pay the only $2000 is due on repairs of the building.

An arrangement was made for the present endowment of the College, by 500 scholarships for 25 years, at per annum, offers great inducement who have sons to educate. In short, the character and talent of the Board Trustees and Visitors, the ability and the devoted President, and of the connected with him; the commodious the buildings; the beauty and healthfulness of the location; the fine social, moral religious influence brought to bear; the usual freedom from temptation to dissipation with attendant vices—the sale of drinks being prohibited by law; the apparatus, laboratory, museum, etc. present an array of advantages seldom And that these advantages are to a great extent appreciated, is manifest from the number of students (208) connected with College during the past year.

We heartily congratulate the Mississippi and Louisiana Conferences on the establishment of an institution of learning so eminently worthy of public patronage.

The next session will commence on the Monday in October next.

APPEAL.

Some time last year a lovely lot was by Mr. R. Perry, of Perry's Bridge, M. E. Church, South, on the condition within eighteen months a House of should be erected thereon; and, if that time no Church was built, then to revert to the donor.

Perry's Bridge is an old and important in Methodism, having been occupied many years. Yet greatly has the people hindered from the want of a pleasant in which to worship. We contemplate ing a substantial brick Church, and the method—as the community at Perry's are generally poor and unable, however ling, to contribute largely to this asking of our friends their assistance.

As the Church will be open, when occupied by the Methodist itinerants for orthodox denominations, we ask of each, tance to build a strong, and expansive testant Church. Any pastors who will up collections in their respective others, who are favorable to the spread pure, evangelical truth, will please for what they may be willing to bestow worthy a cause to "Aborn Lyon, Perry's Bridge, Louisiana," for which they will ceive the sincere thanks of all concerned.

Respectfully,

H. A. Moss, P. C.

Conjugal Affection.—The Hon. Mann, in his eulogy on Mr. Rantoul, following touching instance of conjugal affection in connection with the last illness of the deceased:

"Yet Mr. Rantoul, even amid the stupor of his disease, had lucid intervals. The convolutions in his mind so deep-seated, affections in his heart so strong, as to be moved by any tempest of delirium. One telegraphed respecting the illness of her husband his devoted and excellent lady, then in Massachusetts, hastened to his succor. She arrived here at six o'clock of the morning of the died. Instantly her voice wooed back the ness and reason. He seized her hand in his held it till he breathed his last. Even when mind wandered, this grasp of affection was clenched. Death only relaxed it.

The swelling of the disease had closed the and it was beyond the power of surgical traction to open them. He desired to have opened by mechanical means, that he might once more behold the features and face for more than twenty years, the light of had shone down into his heart. Thank God that, amid all the alienations and strife hostilities which seem sometimes to deform the human bosom, as though it were their natural fountain, there are also affections, tenderness and loves, which are indelible from it; allied to it by a more than finity, and which we always say is 'olose as green to the verdant leaf, as the rose.'"

Health of Cities.—The following statement of the deaths in some of the Atlantic cities for the week ending August 14th, and their proportion to the population:

	Deaths.	Population.
Boston	83	138,788
New York	502	517,849
Philadelphia	288	350,000
Baltimore	141	109,026
Charleston	18	48,014
Savannah	25	1,000

Tobacco.—A letter from Amsterdam, in the Transcript, says:

"The consumption of tobacco here is enormous. King James would have done had he been King of England, is past imagining. Old and young are addicted to the habit. I have seen a knot of children gathered as gravely as if they had been born with pipes in their mouths; elderly citizens marching along the streets puffing forth volumes of smoke, like so many fire-engines. Some of the Amsterdam dandies affect the cigar; but for the most part the fashion is with its pipe as long as a walking stick, with a bowl the size of a thimble for burning the weed. Many smoke during their meals, slipping tobacco smoke as other people do wine; and, as it is not considered indecorous to smoke at table, others are eating. I was regaled while at the dinner table this morning, in the principal hotel of the city, with some very choice tobacco smoke from two gentlemen opposite me. They breakfasted upon bread and butter, tobacco eggs and coffee, and I do not doubt that a pipe after ten furnishes the lower classes a light supper or heavy meal.

Obituary.

Died, on the 17th August, in Lafourche Interior, La., Mrs. Ellen R. Armitage, in the 28th year of her age.

Mrs. A. joined the M. E. Church in the early part of the year 1851—both in Felicity Street Church, New Orleans, where she joined, and in Thibodaux, where her membership was held at her death there is a mournful but pleasing remembrance of her consistent piety and unaffected earnestness to save her soul. She agonized to enter in at the straight gate and entered it. She sought diligently the way of life, and found it.

At the time of joining the church, which she did with much trembling, she was not clear as to her spiritual state, and remarked in an under tone, extending her hand to the pastor, "It seems I must take this step, though unworthy. Don't say I am converted, but I think the Lord will do more for me." The writer believes she was then converted.—Her personal character was enriched by many lovely traits of mind and heart, and guarded by a pleasing dignity.—To these, pure religion added its teachable simplicity and its humility and heavenly mindedness.

The mother, husband and three little children are bereaved indeed. And of all the friends to whom her memory is as sweet fragrance, none mourn the departed more than one who has been Her Pastor.

Died, on the 12th of July, at Millville, Marion co., Ala., Mrs. Sarah Davidson, wife of James Davidson, Esq., in the 56th year of her age.

She was born in York District, South Carolina. She was raised by parents belonging to a sect of Presbyterians called Seceders. In the year 1842, she united herself with the M. E. Church, and remained a consistent member until her death. Her life was exemplary to all who know her, and though dead, she yet speaketh. Her house was a home at all times for the preachers. Her heart beat with warm and ardent desire for their success. Her place in the community is never to be filled. On her the poor and distressed of her neighborhood relied for help; they always found in her that charity which would minister to their wants.

A few moments before her voice failed, one of her daughters asked her in reference to her final change. She replied, "Jane, to me, death has no terror;" then she turned on her bed and addressed her children, and said, "don't grieve for me, for I shall soon be at rest with Jesus, my Savior; but trust in God who is able to bring you out more than conqueror, through Jesus Christ." In a few moments her voice failed, she remained speechless for two days, and died.

Geo. W. Tucker.

Died, on the 2d of August, 1852, in Green county, Alabama, Mrs. Salina Ann Fearell, consort of Wm. Ferrell, in the 29th year of her age. She professed religion, and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in August, 1841, and continued a faithful member till her death. In all the relations of life, much might justly be said to her praise, but her virtues are known to her friends and all written in their memory, and need not be rewritten here for them, and strangers would not appreciate them. Sister Ferrell's piety was uniform and consistent. She will be missed in the Church and community, but O how much more in the family circle, by her husband and three small children, who now mourn their loss. To her distant friends I will say her end was peaceful; in her last illness she spoke freely of death, she prepared for the change, she said her peace was made with God, and she was not afraid to die. She has left eleven years of holy living, and oral testimony in her last hours, as evidence to her friends that she has gone to rest. Her infant, three weeks old, died one week after her.

The Metropolitan Hotel, NewYork, which is to be opened in September, is the most extensive concern of the sort in Amorica. Its cost, it is said, will be one million of dollars. It is built of brown freestone, is six stories high, and measures three hundred feet on Broadway, and two hundred on Bruce street. It has one hundred and seventy-four windows on the former street, one hundred and twenty on the latter. It will accommodate easily six hundred persons, and, if crowded, a thousand. Each room is larger than usual in such houses, and is furnished by pipes with hot and cold water and gas. There are also one hundred baths. It has fifty parlors, and a magnificent bridal room, whose bed cost $1200—the coverlet $300. The number of persons necessary to conduct the house will be these hundred and fifty, including servants. The latter are to be dressed in livery, and while waiting on the table, wear white kid gloves. No dishes are to be put upon the tables, but the eaters are to call for what they want. The Day Book, from which we gather these facts, says:

"Not the least interesting feature of the establishment is a steam engine which is turned to all manner of uses, from ironing a shirt to cleaning a pair of boots, and cleaning your teeth even, should you require it. It plays the part also of a dumb waiter.

"A stout plethoric gentleman arrives at the hotel, who is troubled with the asthma, and is informed by the civil host that every room is taken short of the sixth story. He remonstrates, and pleads his infirmity, and as a reply is requested to step for a moment on a platform, and presto, as quick as a slight of hand of Professor Anderson, he is thar. Down he comes again the next instant, and is immediately, at his own request, booked. The principal use of the dumb waiter, however, is to mount and descend the baggage."

General Intelligence.

March of Improvement—Bricks and Mortar.—Our hybernating citizens who have flown away north to find sweat and sentiment at fashionable watering places and crowded hotels, and who will be absent but a few months from the sea breezes and moonlight nights enjoyed here so exclusively by that sensible class who remain at home, will be astonished on their return at the almost magical changes that have taken place in the architectural appearance of the city. Casting their eyes over the oaken groves that skirt the suburbs, they will see in the town of Jefferson, on the borders of the Fourth District, a new city arising out of the green fields, where hundreds of white cottages, garnished by delightful gardens, glance in the light of the sun, inhabited by those genuine sprigs of republican aristocracy who are not ashamed to work for a living—the mechanics, artizans and tradesmen who retire there at night after the laborious duties of the day, performed by the heart of the crowded town. These are the houses of the producing classes, whose vestments are neither of purple nor of linen, whose sleep is not racked by the nightmare and who are indebted for the homes they inhabit neither to credit nor to unrighteous speculation. This is the beginning of a city that in a few years will spread to the bounds of Carrollton.

Further down, within the borders of what was called Lafayette, elegant mansions and miniature palaces spring up on every hand. Gardens are laid out and groves planted, and ingenuity is put to the rack to invent new forms for the service of luxury. Not a street but abounds with the evidences of progress. Jackson and Magazine streets are particularly favored in this respect. A plank road is in process of construction along the continuation of Magazine street to West Bonligny, making a delightful drive of more than four miles.

In front of the First District, that long disputed territory known as the batture property, has been subdued in lots, and is now rapidly filling up with buildings. This portion of the new city comprises a space of a square in depth, and more than half a mile in front.

Passing from this quarter, and having an eye on the four respectable old ladies that ornament the top of St. Patrick's, (as a steering pilot,) we emerge upon Camp street. Between Julia and St. Joseph streets are two new rows of elegant brick dwellings, constructed at a cost of $35,000. Between Julia and Hired, some vacant and unsightly lots have been filled with tenements of like spacious and elegant structure. Hired street, too, long the chosen abode of vice and of all manner of uncleanness, begins to aspire to respectability, and where of late dingy huts frowned gloomily, peopled by the vicious, arise symetrical structures. It abodes for refinement, taste and luxury. This street, on one side, from Camp to St Charles, has been rebuilt with substantial three-story edifices. Within a square, stands the Odd-Fellows' Hall, a showy building, combining the elegant with the useful, and rapidly progressing to completion. In this the different lodge-rooms are fitted up in the most elegant style, and with a view to the greatest usefulness. It has a concert room—the largest in the city—capable of accommodating the greatest number of visitors to any new mingled and foreign humbug, gotten up for the scraping together of dimes—where Lola Montez may hop in long petticoats, or where Barnum may show the elephant.

Between Camp and St. Charles streets strangers will be astonished to see the fine improvements on the newly opened Commercial Place. It is built up on both sides (a length of more than three hundred feet) with four story houses, of an elegant order of architecture. This space is devoted to professionals and jobbers, and forms a very convenient cut-off or chute for Campand St. Charles.

The new St. Charles Hotel approaches completion, and with its huge dimensions, its tall and graceful columns, its massive coraices and its exceeding chasteness of finish, furnishes a land-mark for the stranger.

Back on Carondelet street and Baronne, we are bewildered with multiplicity of new buildings, with granite fronts, and wonder where the people are to come from who are to inhabit them. They number scores with expensive finishings and unique ornaments.

Taking a turn on Canal street we come upon the site of the contemplated Custom-house—a huge affair, straggling under the weight of vast masses of granite to its second story, projected on acres of ground.

Canal street—supposed by the unprogressives to have been finished years ago—is being in many places torn down, and new buildings are in process of erection in place of the old ones.

Even the regions of the Second and Third Districts begin to show certain spasmodic signs of returning vitality. In this venerable quarter, respectable for its gravities and crippled antiquity, among the quaint old cornices, damp with the mould of ages and loved of the rat family, the trowel has renewed its work.

Opposite the St Louis Exchange, the chaste proprietor of the corner rat-trap on Royal street has torn down the old walls, and the rickety shed has given place to a substantial block. The Second District is particularly favored in the way of public appropriations for improvements. Royal street, from St. Ann up, is being paved with square block stones, and the same improvement is also progressing on Chatres.

The Mobile Mail Boats.—The stormy weather that prevailed on the Lake on Wednesday last, has created apprehensions in the minds of many that some accidents may have been occasioned thereby to the steamers due here yesterday and the day before. Up to a late hour last night nothing had been heard of the Oregon from Mobile, or of the California, from Illinois, both due here on Thursday morning—nor of the Florida, due yesterday. It is probable, from the terrific storm that prevailed during Wednesday and Wednesday night, the vessels may have been driven aground. It would be found impossible for vessels to come through Grunt's Pass during such a high sea as must have been running at the time. A vessel attempting it must have struck bottom, and thus losing her steerage-way would have gone ashore. The storm is represented to have been severe beyond all previous experience. At the Lake end of the Pontchartrain Railroad the water ran entirely over the pier, and into the houses on shore. The great quantities of drift wood driven ashore, proves how severe must have been the gale. The small craft, fishing boats, etc., on the coast must have suffered severely, as none had arrived during three days. Yesterday a great number of persons crowded to the lake shore, deeply anxious to hear news from the Gulf shore. Some of these have families who are expected to arrive by the first boat. They manifest great anxiety as to their safety. The hotels at the Lake end were crowded by these visitors.

During the day Mr. H. B. W. Hill chartered a schooner for the purpose of crossing to the watering places, and took with him about forty residents of the city, who were uneasy as to the safety of their families.

It is not apprehended that any serious accident has happened to these steamers, as they are all staunchly built and commanded by careful and experienced officers.

The Lone Star Order.—We understand that there are four lodges of this flourishing order in the city of New York, and several in New England. The order has not been established a year, and yet, we learn, already embraces thousands. Its first anniversary will be celebrated in private, on the 16th of September.

Affliction.—Intelligence reached this city yesterday, we learn, that General Arinant, of the parish of St. James, has had the misfortune to lose his wife and two children. They all died within a space of six hours, of cholera.

Hon. Robert Rantoul's life was insured at the British Life Insurance Company, in Boston, for $10,000. A pretty good lift for the afflicted.

At a late meeting of a scientific association in Albany, N. Y., a communication was received from Professor Horsford, of Harvard, Mass., stating that the Bunker Hill Monument swings backwards and forwards like a pendulum every day! By an apparatus, which it is unnecessary to describe, it has been ascertained that there is a light but perceptible movement in the morning to the Westward; at noon to the Northward; and in the evening to the East. It is caused by the unequal expansion of the sides of the monument by the heat of the sun. What confirms it is that a shower suddenly cooling one side also produces a movement.

Railroad Dividend.—A dividend of eight per cent has been declared on the Capital Stock of the Georgia Southwestern Railroad on the operations of the first year.

Presentiments.—The Albany, N. Y., Journal, in speaking of the late melancholy accident in that city, by which Mr. Bamber lost his life, gives the following interesting particulars:

"It seems to have been a settled conviction of the deceased that he would die a violent death. Sitting in Mr. Cagger's office, at 7 o'clock on Friday evening, just about an hour before the accident, he gave a short history of his family, and mentioned the fate of several relatives. His father, while engaged in felling a tree, was struck in the breast by the falling tree and instantly killed. Others of his family had met a similar fate. It is a singular fact, too, that Mr. Bamber entertained a strong presentiment of some immediate evil, which he expressed at various times on Friday last. During that day he more than once declared his desire to make a will, running over some accounts and bills, etc. He was most warmly devoted to his young wife, and left her reluctantly on that fatal evening. Before going out he requested her to play a favorite air on a piano he had recently purchased for her, and as if conscious of some impending danger, he would get up to go and then come back and insist on her repeating it. At length he kissed her, and promising to return immediately, left her to meet his terrible fate."

When brought back to his boarding house, a lady boarder, to whose husband Mr. Bamber bore some resemblance, fainted, supposing it was really her husband who was almost burned to death. Busied in restoring and consoling this lady, it was not until Mrs. Bamber went up to aid the principal sufferer, that she realized her own affliction. Every feature of this appalling accident is melancholy. The widow, we believe, is hardly yet seventeen, and has been married not yet a year. She is moreover an orphan."

A machine for palating window blinds has been discovered by Samuel Fields, a painter of Worcester, by which one man can paint easily eighty pairs of blinds in a day, and not work over ten hours.

Lake Pontchartrain.

The examination recently made by me of the bottom of this lake, has resulted in a proof that it is, on the line examined, everywhere firm and reliable, for works of any character which it may be desired to construct upon it.

There exists, it must be confessed, a possibility that the firmness indicated by the lead may be but superficial, and that beneath the crust of shells which covers nearly the entire bottom of the lake, there may be a soft or treacherous stratum. But this is not likely, for the following geological considerations and view of the formation of the delta:

The whole delta, including the bed of the lake, is formed by deposits from the Mississippi river.

The matter transported by the river is distributed in this manner: The coarsest particles are drifted along the bottom of the channel, and are deposited near its mouth, or forced up the inclined sides of the channel, and left along the banks, wherever the currents lose their velocity, and their consequent ability to transport. These are chiefly small fragments of siliceous rocks. The abundant matters, capable of extremely fine comminution, are held longer in suspension, and being nearly of the specific gravity of the water, are carried farther, and deposited in the nearly tranquil eddies.

The river's mouth has never been nearer to the lake than its present channel—otherwise the lake would not preserve a depth equal to the depression at the present mouth of the river. The material composing its bed must, then, be of the alluvial character, which the waters could transport to a distance, by very gentle currents. This material is the blue clay which is so well known for its ductility and tenacity, wherever it has had time to become compact. Over the entire extent of the lower delta, particularly on the lakes, bays and prairies

The trembling prairies, or the bed lake or lagoon beds, filled with vegetable matter, by gradual encroachment from the sides. Beneath them all (as I know of them can be very deep), is the blue clay. The encroachments of the lakes, in several localities, is going on still; and at a time not very long hence, geologically measured, such lakes as Maurepas, Des Allemands, Ouachia, Catouachia, and their bayous, may become trembling prairies.

On the north shore of Lake Pontchartrain, the division, or drift-lines, show an easy slope towards the Lake; and it may be, and is indeed probable, that for a few miles in the lake the substratum is composed of the clay and sand alternations that make up that geological formation. But if so, the foundation is not less reliable for any practical uses, than if the whole were blue clay.

On the lowest portions of the drift-lines near the Lake, are found in many places beds of gumbo-lien shells. These do not belong properly to the formation, but are any existing species, now inhabiting the Lake in the vicinity.

This indicates a change of relative level of the lake and that shore by which a portion of the land formerly under the brackish water of the Lake is now elevated several feet above it. We are enabled by an inspection of these drift-like beds of shells to form some idea of the character of those beds beneath the ridges. They are seldom more than two feet thick, and are in places where they have been heaped up by the waves of by human agency.

If this is reliable authority, the levee will be found to have a similar thickness on the bottom of the lake, if resting upon or based on the surface for the support of piles, driven through them into the basis of earth beneath.

From these considerations, I have given confidence that the bottom of Lake Pontchartrain is sufficiently firm for the support of any work of engineering which the progressive spirit of the age and the exigencies of our people may indicate as necessary.

It remains to be seen whether the depth of the water, and the violence of winds and waves, are obstacles which should deter us from undertaking to construct a railroad through the lake, to avoid the difficulties and the distance on the route around it. This argument I defer for another article.

Crops, etc.

Many New Cotton.—One hundred and thirty-eight bales of the new crop arrived yesterday morning on the M. Relf from Alexandria, and eight hundred and fifty-five on the Natchez No 2. from Vicksburg and the coast.

The first bale of cotton of the new crop has reached Tallahassee. It is a week before its time. The Sentinel of the 17th says: "During the last two days, both cotton caterpillar and the boll worm have been detected on and apparently all the plantations in this vicinity. Both of them are proving very destructive and pointers wear long faces."

The Pamplin, Ark., Traveller of the 14th says: "The weather has been pleasant for the past two days. We had a fine rain on Tuesday last, just enough to revive the crops and planters. The prospects of the farmers are very excellent."

The Marshall, Harrison county, Texas, Republic of the 14th, has the subjoined paragraph: "We have had one or two delightful rains within the last few days, which have held the cankerworm from ravaging, and the cotton crop of cotton. In some parts of the country, cotton was suffering and began to shed badly; but this rain, the bottom crop being already made, renders a tolerable crop at least certain for this region."

The following is an extract from a letter to the Nacogdoches (Texas) Chronicle, from Tamoon, Cherokee county, and dated the 8th inst.: "Corn is generally a fund of plenty. Some of our farmers have this year raised over 50 bushel per acre—twenty bushels to the acre is not an over estimate. The cotton crop will turn out equal to any I have ever seen in Illinois or Missouri, while the average of cotton crops cannot possibly fall short of a bale to the acre."

The Jackson (Miss.) Southron says: "The crops are exceedingly fine. But few complaints are made of the appearance of the worm. Many planters have already commenced picking their cotton."

The Homer (Claiborne parish, La.) Advocate of the 14th inst. says: "Since the settlement of this parish we are informed by that very respectable individual, the oldest inhabitant, that he has never seen such a corn crop, both for the bottom and fine uplands. Seldom, indeed, does the cotton crop promises fair. We hear that it is opening finely all through the parish."

The Pueblo Indians in Washington.—The delegation of Pueblo Indians, from New Mexico, now in Washington, who were assaulted and stoned by a gang of boys, while passing through the streets of that city a few days ago, have addressed the following letter dated the 13th inst., to the Hon. R. H. Weightman, the delegate from New Mexico:

"Dear Friend: After saluting you, in company with your body and the children, we beg leave to inform you that, upon our arrival here, we were highly gratified and delighted to have reached such a delightful country, and to have seen our well-beloved President—the father of all our republic and country.

"To-day, sir, we are deprived of the liberty of walking in the streets to amuse ourselves on account of the bad management of some parents who do not restrain their children. On the 12th instant we went out, and were stoned by the boys without having given them any cause to do so. You are to determine what steps should be taken to remedy this evil. Having nothing further to communicate, we beg leave to assure you of our esteem, and desire to be of service to you."

The letter was written in the Spanish language and signed by Jose Carlos Vigil and Jose Maria Vigil y Lucero. They appear to be very intelligent men, and deserve to be protected. Mayor Maury, it is said, is endeavoring to find out the authors of the outrage. Major Weightman, in communicating the letter to the press at Washington, says:

"The great amount of natural and untearable property of the government here, some of which is invaluable as the records, etc., the obligation to protect foreign ministers, etc., should, it seems to me, suggest that more liberal appropriations for this district generally, and particularly for the maintenance of a sufficient police, might be made by Congress, not only without injustice to the people of the United States, but consistently with its duty to protect the people's property, and to carry out national obligations."

The editor of the Hillsboro (Ala.) Patriot has seen the model of a machine for topping cotton, invented by Col A. Dickson, from which great things are expected. The Union describes it as follows:

"The machine is trunnelled along between the rows like a wheelbarrow. The driving wheel propels two sets of reforming blades—one set in a horizontal direction, which tops the cotton, the other in a vertical direction, which lops off the ends of the branches where they are lapping across the rows. It is so constructed that the horizontal blades may be lowered or elevated, to suit the height of the cotton, while in operation, at the will of the operator, and is designed to be so lightly constructed that one person may operate with it with ease going over ten or twelve acres per day. It tops two rows as it passes along."

New Railroad Car.—The Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad Company put on the road, on the 10th inst., a new car, with the arrangements and ventilators to prevent the annoyance suffered from dust. The ventilators are so fixed at the top as to prevent the cinders from the locomotive from getting in, and the shots permitted to escape at the side—thus creating a current of air from the top to the sides of the car, and not in from the side as in the case of all other cars.

Recent experiments, it is stated, have shown that steam, as generated in steam boilers, is an effectual extinguisher of fire. A foreign journal states that it was applied to a fire on board a steamship, from the boiler, with the most complete success. It was also tried at Trenton, in an iron foundry, with the same result.

During the mock trial of Louis XVI., he was asked what he had done with a certain sum of money, a few thousand pounds. His wife's fate had been, and the tears came into his eyes at the question. At length he replied: "I loved to make the people happy." He had given away the money in charity.

The quarterly returns of marriages, births and deaths in England for the quarter to the 31st of March, have just been published; the numbers are as follows: Marriages 32,068; couples; births 150,126; deaths 100,513. In neither case is there any remarkable departure from the average.

Letters received in Paris, from Cheschell, in Africa, have announced that the ancient seed of corn, which was used during the time of the kings of ancient Egypt, the Pharoits, had been sown in the garden of a farmer and produced several ears, which offered a new species entirely unknown to modern agriculture.

The Cincinnati Times says, two funeral trains met at the Two Mile House, near that city, the one going to the cemetery and the other coming from it. Both stopped, and the men alighted to drink. A general fight ensued, in which several persons were severely bruised, and the coffin considerably damaged.

A passenger in one of the New York omnibuses, a day or two since, in order to have no delay in settling his fare, put the sixpence for that purpose into his mouth. The coin unfortunately slipped into his windpipe, where it lodged, causing immediate loss of voice and danger of suffocation. After much suffering by the patient it was extracted by cutting into the windpipe.

Congressional.

Washington, August 18, 1852.

Senate.—Petitions of an unimportant character were presented.

Mr. Gwin introduced a bill granting land to California, to aid in the construction of a canal across the Sierra Nevada valley.

Mr. Dodge reported a bill to establish an additional land office in Minnesota territory, which was taken up and ordered to a third reading.

Mr. Hunt reported back the bill to extend the warehousing system by establishing private bonded warehouses.

Mr. Fish gave notice that on Friday he would move that the bill known as the land distribution bill, be taken up.

Mr. Hale submitted a resolution directing an inquiry as to the expediency of re-annexing the Ladies Islands to the United States. Laid over.

The bill from the House granting land to the States for the relief of the indigent insane, was referred to a select committee.

The Michigan ship canal bill was passed.

The Senate then, on motion of Mr. Davis, took up the River and Harbor bill.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce, was changing the phraseology of an appropriation for the removal of obstructions at the mouth of the Mississippi river.

Messrs. Downs, Cass, Bright, Borland and Pratt opposed making amendment to the bill: though not perfect, it was still better to have it as it was, than run the risk of losing it.

Messrs. Soule, Atchison, Butler, Rusk, Mason, Hunter, Chase, Hale and Bell contended against being forced to adopt the principle that a bill, no matter how defective, should be adopted, because of a supposed danger of its failing in the House. This principle would be to make the Senate the mere tools of the dominant party in the House.

Mr. Atchison reminded the Senate that this bill was in nearly all particulars the bill vetoed by Mr. Polk.

Mr. Cass said that he voted for the bill vetoed by Mr. Polk. He had even gone to Mr. Polk, and suggested considerations why he should sign the bill.

Messrs. Davis and Seward desired that this amendment should be adopted, and let the test be taken on the first amendment appropriating money.

The debate was continuing when the letter was closed.

House.—Mr. Curtis, of Pa., concluded his remarks in opposition to the bill constituting the Wheeling Bridge a post road, and insisted, in conclusion, that the Representatives of Virginia, Ohio, and even Pennsylvania, were not impartial judges in a case so affecting their interests.

Mr. Newton, of Ohio, followed, who contended that the bridge was not a nuisance, so far as the Government is concerned, but is a connecting link and great thoroughfare. He referred to the decision of the Supreme Court, by which the bridge is ordered to be elevated, which he said had not been alluded to in debate; he contended that if it were so elevated, the capital invested in the structure would not be secure, in the absence of legal authority; and concluded by comparing the interests of the entire company, which the question involves, with that of six or seven steamers, whose business would be reduced by the railroad connecting, by means of this bridge, the Atlantic States with those of the West.

Mr. Stewart, of Mich., said the bill was an important one, but there were other important measures requiring consideration; and as the subject must be well understood, he moved the previous question, which was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. Walsh, of Md., previous to the "previous question" being put, obtained permission to publish the remarks which he wished to make; but which the operation of the "previous question" prevented.

Previous to putting the main question, Mr. Giles, Chairman of the Committee on Post-offices and Post-roads, commenced a speech closing debate. He dwelt on the importance of the bridge to the people of Ohio, Indiana and Virginia; for the continuance of which the Representatives from Pittsburgh to Mississippi were in favor; alluded to the compact between Congress and the State of Ohio, by which a road was to be constructed to the Ohio over that river, and through the State, and contended that Congress having failed to provide the means of communication, it was lawful for the State to do so.

He went into a history of the facts connected with the bridge; pointed out the continuous and rapid means for traveling which it would afford when completed, and was about to show the impossibility of elevating the bridge in accordance with the decision of the Supreme Court, when the morning hour expired.

On motion of Mr. Houston, all debate on the bill making appropriations for the navy, was limited to half an hour, after the House shall again go into committee.

The House then went into committee, and again took up the bill.

An amendment, proposed by Mr. Stanton, of Tenn., increased the salary of the Navy agent at Memphis, was adopted.

Mr. Stanton then submitted the amendment, to which he spoke yesterday, relative to building ships of war, to replace unserviceable vessels.

Objections were taken by Mr. Jones, of Tenn., to the introduction of the amendment, on a point of order, which the chair sustained.

Mr. Stanton appealed against the decision, which was reversed—yeas 91, nays 73.

Mr. Houston said the vote in favor of the amendment came with a bad grace from those who supported the increase to the Collins line of steamers, who are now proposing to add to the navy, notwithstanding the argument that was used formerly, that the Collins line should be maintained, because in the way the navy could be increased in case of necessity.

Mr. Chandler, of Pa., said it was never contended that the navy was to be dispensed with, and that the defence of the coast should be neglected, in the face of the powerful navies of the Old World.

Several amendments were moved, varying the sum, which were lost, and the original amendment was adopted—yeas 70 nays 50.

A considerable time was occupied in discussing the question of patronage in the appointment of midshipmen, the object being to place it on the same platform as that of the cadets of West Point, an amendment to which effect is still discussed.

By Telegraph.—Five and a half o'clock—The House at 4 o'clock adjourned, without taking the vote on the Naval Appropriation bill. The Senate discussed the river and harbor amendments till toward 5 o'clock, and then adjourned without taking any vote.

Louis Napoleon's Intended Marriage.—The European papers contain various rumors of Louis Napoleon's intended espousal of the Princess Wasa, of Baden, a lady of whom it is said that she mingles in her blood that of the most celebrated of the Kings of Sweden; Charles the XII, Gustavus Vasa and Gustavus Adolphus, as well as that of the celebrated Beauharnais family of which Louis Napoleon himself is a scion. She is the daughter of the Prince of Wasa, an officer in the Austrian army, who was the son of Gustavus Adolphus the Fourth, a king who was compelled to abdicate, when Bernadotte assumed the sway. The mother of the Princess was a daughter of the Duke of Baden, who married a Mademoiselle Beauharnais, niece to Josephine, the Emperor Napoleon's first wife.—Hence she is related to Louis Napoleon, whose mother was Hortense Beauharnais, daughter of the Empress Josephine. The fortunes of the Beauharnais family are as remarkable as that of the Napoleon family. An English paper, whence we derive the above facts, says:

Of the two children of the Empress Josephine, the daughter, Hortense, married Louis Bonaparte, King of Holland, and the history of her descendants is now beginning—whereit will end who can say? Her son, Eugene, became King of Italy, and married a daughter of the King of Bavvaria, by whom he left two sons and two daughters. The eldest son married Donna Maria, the present Queen of Portugal, but unfortunately died a month afterward. The other son, the Prince of Leuchtenberg, married a daughter of the Emperor Nicholas, of Russia, who is determined to make him a King as soon as soon as a kingdom can be carved out for him. Of the two daughters of Eugene Beauharnais, the eldest is the Queen of Sweden; the other is the ex-Empress of Brazil, widow of the once famous Don Pedro. She, though no longer an Empress, yet lives very comfortably at Lisbon with her daughter, now twenty-one years old, who will probably soon day or other likewise marry a King. So much for some of the characters in the great drama to be performed in Europe, of which the first act is now in progress.

Telegraphic Items.

Further from Havana.

New York, August 20.

Passengers arrived by the Crescent City give a sad account of the state of affairs in that city. The yellow fever, the cholera and the small pox are raging there with great virulence and have proved very fatal among the troops. Out of a garrison of one hundred and twenty soldiers and one of the stallions, one hundred and ten have died of the cholera. Almost every vessel in the harbor has some cases on board. The Government is sending detachments of troops into the country to preserve them from contagion. The prisons are filling up rapidly, and the disease are very fatal in them. Many of the prisoners are dying, and yet numbers of Creoles are daily consigned to the most loathsome dungeons. Almost every Creole family in the city is under the surveillance of the police, and arrests are made upon the slightest grounds of suspicion.

Wheeling Bridge.

Baltimore, Aug. 20.

The House of Representatives yesterday passed the bill declaring the Wheeling bridge a Failed States post route. This annuls the recent decision of the U. S. Supreme Court which ordered the bridge to be removed on the ground that it is being in obstruction to the navigation of the Ohio River.

Wheeling Bridge Case.

Washington, August 20.

The vote in the House of Representatives yesterday, declaring the Wheeling bridge a post route, and a legal obstruction, was 137 yeas and 11 nays.

Congressional Proceedings.

Washington, Aug 20.

After passing the Wheeling Bridge bill the House yesterday took up the Naval Appropriation Bill, which was discussed without public action until adjournment.

The Senate had under consideration the Civil and Diplomatic Bill, which was finally postponed, when the River and Harbor bill was taken up. An amendment was adopted providing for opening the channel at the mouth of the Mississippi river.

The French Fishermen.

Boston, Aug. 20.

Advices from Labrador have been received here, which state that the British cruisers have driven the French fishermen off that coast.

Four Days Later from Europe—Arrival of the Atlantic—Interesting Commercial News.

New York, August 22.

The Collins steamer Atlantic arrived here this morning bringing dates from Liverpool to the 11th instant, four days later than the accounts brought by the Canada. The following is a summary of her news:

Liverpool Markets.

Liverpool, August 11.

The demand in the Cotton market has been moderate since the departure of the Canada, and the sales are limited to 32,000 bales for the three business days. Of the 32,000 bales have been taken for speculation, and 4000 for export. The imports for the same time are 40,000 bales. Prices were without any material change, and the quotations are for Middling Orleans fair, to 5¾, and for Middling Uplands 5¾ to 5¾ per lb.

Flour has advanced 6d to 1s per bbl. Corn has been in fair request at an enhanced prices. Wheat has advanced 3d to 4d. Lard is firm at previous rates. Provisions generally are unchanged in prices. Rice has been firm, but a small business has been done.

The Crops.

Accounts from the agricultural districts of England and Ireland are unfavorable, but for the wheat and potato crops. The crops in France, however, are reported to be in good condition and the harvest is promising.

Money and Trade.

There has been an increased pressure on the money market, owing to the recent accounts of the condition of the Fishery question. Consols have further declined, and are now quoted at 96¾ to 97 for money and account.

The Manchester trade has been active, and prices have considerably improved.

Havre Markets.

Advices from Havre to the 10th represent the cotton market as quiet, but the quotations were unchanged. Of the sales official portions rates. For sugar the demand was mod rate of the last quotations.

Arrival of the Asia.

The Cunard steamer Asia arrived at Liverpool on the 7th inst.

General News.

France and Tripoli.—The report of the bombardment of Tripoli by the French forces proves to have been incorrect. The difficulties were settled without proceeding to bombard the city.

Napoleon Bonaparte, son of Jerome, has been appointed on a temporary mission to the Government of the United States.

England and Acadia.—The British Government has given an assurance to the Emperor of Austria that an eye will be kept on Kossuth while he remains in England.

The fishing question continues to occupy a good deal of the attention of the English Journalists, and the subject is discussed with the most amicable feelings toward the United States.

Another Freshet.

Baltimore, August 23.

Heavy rains within the last day or two have swollen the streams very much, and travel between this city and Philadelphia has been suspended for two days, owing to a part of the railroad having been washed away.

Congressional Proceedings.

Washington, August 23.

The Senate on Saturday continued the debate on the River and Harbor, and the Civil and Diplomatic, bills, but adjourned without definite action on them.

In the House a bill was passed allowing soldiers of the late war to surrender such of the bounty lands as are worthless, and select other lands in their place. The debate on the Post-office Appropriation bill was continued without important action.

New Minister to England.

Washington, August 23.

The Senate to-day confirmed the nomination of Joseph R. Ingersoll, as Minister to England. In place of Mr. Lawrence.

Collision and Awful Loss of Life.

New York, August 21.

The steamers Atlantic and Ogdenburg yesterday came into collision on Lake Erie, and the former immediately sank. She was crowded with passengers, most of whom were emigrants bound for the West, and three hundred lives were lost.

Congressional Proceedings.

Washington, August 24.

In the House, yesterday, the Speaker appointed the following members as a Select Committee to investigate the Gardiner Claim, and the connection of Secretary Corwin therewith: Messrs. Johnson, of Tennessee, Howard, of Texas, Duncan, of Miss., Chapman, of Maryland, and Preston, of New York.

The House then took up and debated the bill for the better protection of the lives of passengers on steamboats, but final action was not taken on it.

The Senate sat until a late hour last night, occupied in discussing the River and Harbor Bill. Mr. Douglass offered an amendment authorizing the different States to levy tonnage duties on vessels for the purpose of improving Rivers and Harbors.

Mr. Cass and Mr. Smith spoke in opposition to the amendment, which was withdrawn, Mr. Douglass avowing his intention to introduce it during the next session.

The Senate adopted an amendment appropriating $100,000 for the removal of Red River raft. The appropriation for the improvement of the Missouri river was stricken out.

During the session a message was received from the President of the United States, enclosing the correspondence relative to the Sandwich Islands. The correspondence was ordered to be printed.

New York Markets.

The Cotton market is yet quiet, and sales limited to 900 bales, without any material change in prices. Flour is in good request, at $4.50 per barrel for State brands. Mixed Corn has advanced to 72½ cents per bushel, with a active demand. Pork is steady with sales of Mess at $10 75 per barrel. Beef is quiet, and prices unchanged. Bacon Shoulders have sold at 8½ cents per lb.

Ohio River.

Pittsburgh, Aug. 24.

There is now three feet seven inches water in the channel, and the river is rising slowly.

A Discovery.—The New York Gothamite of the 14th inst. has the following paragraph:

"A gentleman of this city is preparing a paper, which will shortly be published, collected principally from ancient documents and authentic journals of Hudson's voyage, that will prove most conclusively that the present Island of New York is not the Manua-hatta of Hudson; that, on the contrary, it was the present site of Hoboken, at that time an Island and even no less than a century ago, as was also the present site of Jersey City. Don't be startled gentlemen of the historical society, for it can be shown as plain as the nose upon your face, or else the English language is incapable of expressing itself so as to be understood. Wait a few days."

A discovery has been recently made in France in regard to the increase of fish, by which it is possible to increase their numbers to any required extent. We hope this may lead to the replenishing of all our rivers with salmon, pike and trout. The government of France, by giving encouragement to the discovery, has caused the price of fish, in some parts of France, to be reduced, to one-fourth the former price.

A Stately Bridge.—The New York and Buffalo Railroad, connecting Buffalo with the Erie Railroad at Hornellsville, via Warsaw and Portage Falls, is now completed and running, except the bridge over the Genesee at Portage Falls, which is to be completed on or about the 20th inst. Of this bridge the Wyoming County Mirror says: "This immense structure is nearly completed. Those who have not seen it should go now, as it is worth fifty miles travel to see them raising it. It will be, if not the wonder of the world, the wonder of the thousands who will visit it annually. We are not aware that there is another bridge in the world as high as this, and are confident that there is not, of similar structure.

"It is 235 feet from the river to the track, and 220 to the top of the railing; and the length is 1000 feet. The suspension bridge at Niagara Falls is 230 feet high and 795 long—so that Niagara is beaten in that respect. And yet, though the work is reared to such an astonishing height, it has the appearance of perfect safety. We are told that by calculation they know that it would bear twenty times the weight of any train that could be put upon it. We think we should not fear in the least to ride over it the first time. We understand it is in contemplation

THE CROPS AND WEATHER.—Corn is selling in Austin at 50 cents per bushel, though that price is not expected to be maintained; 25 cents is the price on Webber's Prairie and in many other places, and this will probably continue to be about the average price in the country.

The Galveston News says: We are sorry to learn that the late rains have extended along the coast counties, and considerably into the interior. As was to be expected, they are having a very injurious effect on cotton. We do not learn that the worm has yet made its appearance except in a few places, but if this wet weather continues, the worm is almost certain to do great damage. But even now we learn that the heavy rains have done much injury to the open cotton, by beating it upon the ground.

Soundings in Lake Pontchartrain.

Since it has been seriously proposed to construct a railroad through Lake Pontchartrain, to avoid the difficulties and to save the great distance of passing around it, all light thrown upon the practicability of such a work must be interesting to the public.

After some inquiry, I found that no systematic soundings of the lake had been made of recent date, and that the first inquiry relating to the work, could not be with safety answered, namely: What is the depth of the lake on a line suitable for the direction of the road?

For the purpose of satisfying myself in respect to the depth and character of the bottom of the lake, I have made a very careful sounding on two lines, the one from the harbor at the end of the Pontchartrain railroad to Mandeville, 22 miles; and the other, from Madisonville to Pontchartrain railroad harbor, 27 miles.

LINE TO MANDEVILLE.

Many soundings were made that are not here recorded; but about three soundings per mile give the following depths:

First Mile: 7 feet, in harbor; 10 feet at extreme of new ... 9 feet one mile from lake shore, to the hotel.

Second Mile: Gives 10, 10, 14; 3 gives 17.5 each; 6 and 5 give the same; 9 gives 18, 18, 17.5; 7 gives 17.5, 18, 18; 8 gives 19, 19.5, 19.5; 9 gives 19, 19.5, 19; 10 gives 18.5, 18, 17.5; 11 gives 17.5, 18; 12 gives 18, 18.5, 18; 13 gives 17.5, 18, 18; 14 gives 17.5, 17, 17; 15 gives 17 each; 16 gives 16 each; 17 gives 16.5 each; 18 gives 15, 17, 16.5; 19 gives 15, 5, 14.5; 20 gives 14, 12.5, 13; 21 gives 12, 11.5, 11.5; and the 22d mile gives 11.5, 11, 9.5, to the end of the Mandeville wharf.

The total mean depth appears from these data to be about 15.6 feet, and omitting three miles on the north, and two miles on the south side of the lake, (the mean depth which five miles is 11 feet) and the mean depth for the 17 miles is 17.8 feet, with a maximum depth of 19.5 feet.

MADISONVILLE LINE.

From the wharf at the railroad terminus, the right line to the harbor in front of the Chefuncta river, is 24 miles. The width of the bar is 2000 feet, from 16 feet water outside to 11 feet water inside. The actual lake width from the rail... or from the new canal, to the Chefuncta light, is 24 miles.

Soundings made at mean tide, the lake standing at a mean level.

From the wharf where the boats lie, where the soundings give 7.5 feet, out to the extremity of the new pier, where there is 9.5 feet water, the bottom is soft mud, and the lead (of 9 pounds) sinks three or four inches into it. Beyond the wharf, the mud on the bottom grows firmer, to the distance of one mile from the end of the pier. From thence the bottom is hard, covered with shells, or is a mass of clay and disintegrated shells, almost the entire distance for 19 miles. And thence to the Chefuncta bar, the soundings gave occasionally tough clay, but mainly hard bottom. Some of the soundings showed a thin stratum of ... bottom. But at no place did the lead indi... ...ft bottom, such as I have found at many places, in... ...ar angels of the Mississippi river, and in the other ... and bayous of the lower delta.

The soundings were as given below, commencing at the extreme of the new pier, and crossing in a right line to the Chefuncta light-house.

We find in the Baltimore Sun, the following additional items by the steamer Canada:

Notwithstanding the accounts that the potato rot had appeared in Ireland, it can only be regarded as partial, and at least counterbalanced by the abundance of the sound crop.

The London Standard says: "If we are not misinformed, the maritime powers will be invited by England and France to consider the situation of Mexico, with a view of establishing her independence, both financially and politically, so that a barrier may be established to the aggressive spirit of America in the South."

The Cologne Gazette, in a telegraphic dispatch to Berlin, states that the Prussian Gazette declares the secret convention of the Northern Powers, published in the London Morning Chronicle, to be a mere fabrication.

In a sitting on the 29th ultimo, the Germanic Diet adopted by a large majority the report of the commission appointed to ratify the treaty respecting Denmark, with Prussia and Austria. By this vote, the affairs of the Duchies are concluded. The nobles of Saxe Coburg Gotha have lodged with the Germanic Diet a protest against the new Constitution of the Duchies. The Duke, on his part, protests against the absorption of the Duchy of Lauenburg into the Danish Monarchy.

The Cologne Gazette states that friendly relations are re-established between Prussia and Westphalia.

Dates from Lisbon are to the 20th ult. The Ministry having been defeated, tendered their resignations, which were not accepted, the Queen preferring to dissolve the Chamber of Deputies. The elections are to take place immediately, preceded by a new electoral decree.

The vine disease had manifested itself in the province of Malaga, and committed great ravages.

A complete failure in the vines and vintage of the Island of Madeira is announced.

The commercial conference between France and Belgium, which was interrupted by the Belgian Ministerial crisis, is resumed.

A letter from Posen states that 1800 had died (out of a population of 12,000) from cholera. A fire had also lately consumed eighty houses, and the greatest distress prevailed in the city.

Domestic politics in England are extremely quiet, and will doubtless remain so until Parliament reassembles in October.

The aspect of public feeling in the United States, respecting the encroachment in the fisheries, has awakened much attention among all shades of politicians. The general opinion of the press is in favor of the English reading of the treaty, but the Government is blamed by many of the leading journals for using the show of force without due previous notice: at the same time, it is stated that the nineteen ships, of which a list is given in the Colonial papers, are not more than the usual fleet on the British American and West India station, while one of the vessels, the Jane, mentioned as sent to the scene of difficulty, is, in fact, being paid off at Woolwich. The apprehended trouble has caused considerable feeling, and with other circumstances has had a depressing effect on the funds.

At first, however, no particular significance was attributed in London to the note of Mr. Webster respecting the fishing rights, as the matter was considered susceptible of an easy and amicable adjustment. The Daily News winds up an article on the subject by almost accusing the Derby Government of wishing to foment war abroad, for the purpose of stopping progress at home. The Times hints that Mr. Webster may, perhaps, be courting popularity, and blames the British Foreign Secretary for seeking to protect the trade by bounties, at the same time aiding with the British Government's interpretation of the treaty.

The English Charge d'Affaires has succeeded in procuring the punishment of the Turks who assassinated the steamer Victoria's passengers.

The crusade against the press continues in Piedmont, two editors being fined for articles against the press.

Letters from Naples announce that Gen. Frangi was to be superceded in the Government of Sicily, either by the Prince of Ischitalla or by Count Trapano, brother of the King.

RETURN OF CAPTAIN MARCY.—The Fort Smith (Ark.) Herald, of the 14th inst., says:

Capt. Marcy, Capt. McClelland and Dr. Shumard, arrived at this place on the 10th inst., having completed their examination of the country upon Red River. Capt. Marcy goes to Washington to make his report to the War Department, while Capt. McClellan is ordered to San Antonio, Texas, to report in person to the Commander of the 8th Military Department.

We learn from these gentlemen that they ascended all the principal branches of Red River to their sources—that the country over which they passed, for the first two hundred miles above Fort Arbuckle, promises very superior agricultural qualities. The soil is excellent, producing a very heavy growth of grass and other vegetation, the timber large and abundant, while numerous clear spring branches, flowing rapidly over rock or gravel beds, make this the best watered country that can be found.

It is very elevated and rolling the atmosphere pure and elastic, and it can not prove otherwise than healthy. Indeed, these gentlemen represent it as being the most beautiful and desirable country for farmers that they have seen in the South West.

This is a country which must settle before many years, and as it is contiguous to our borders, and near this place, the Arkansas must be the channel through which the product of the country will find its way to market. This country abounds in copper ore of a rich quality, specimens of which were brought in by gentlemen of the expedition.

The command, while it was in the plains, with the exception of a few cases of scurvy, was very healthy. There were no deaths, and all returned in good health and spirits, not even losing an animal upon the entire expedition. The command returned to the Brazos from Fort Arbuckle.

We learn from Capt. Marcy that he met with no molestation whatever from the Indians; all that he saw were peaceable, and committed no depredations. The result of this expedition will, we think, prove of much importance to the country generally, and particularly to the State of Arkansas, as it lays open to us a new and very extensive district of fine country west of us, which has heretofore been wholly unknown, and which might have remained so for a long time to come. In addition to which, the places of resort of many bands of the prairie Indians have been discovered; and in the event of a war with them, this information would be highly important. These facts, with the geographical and geological information that has been obtained, will, we are confident, make this one of the most important expeditions that has been made upon the prairies.

NEWS BY THE CANADA.—We take from the Charleston Courier, the following telegraphic summary of the news brought by the steamer Canada:

England.—A rumor prevails in London that France was about to call a meeting of the marine powers to protest against what it terms the aggressions of the United States on Mexico.

The advices received in London from Australia, are of the most favorable description. The yield of gold continues steadily on the increase, and the weekly production is estimated at £100,000 sterling.

France.—The Paris Monitieur has published an ordinance emanating from the French Minister of Police, which has for its object the more effectual suppression of clandestine publications.

The Conference with Belgium had been resumed.

Belgium.—The States General had resolved to reject the Commercial Treaty with France.

Prussia.—The Cholera is raging dreadfully in this country.

Barbary.—It is reported that the French fleet had bombarded and captured Tripoli. [In the month of June last, it appears that some differences had arisen between the French Consul, M. Pelissier, and the Pasha. One was in consequence of the Algerine Jew possessing a French passport, perfectly en regle, having been arrested and thrown into prison, where he suffered much ill-usage. M. Pelissier claimed him, but the Pasha refused to give him up, on the ground that he was a Tripolitan subject. M. Pelissier then sent in a strong protest on the subject. Another cause of difference related to two French deserters, who had entered the Pasha's cavalry as veterinary surgeons. As they were most harshly treated in consequence of their being Giaours, they refused to serve any longer, but the authorities refused to let them leave the army, and they were obliged to apply to the Consul for redress. As, however, they were deserters, he could not do anything, unless they agreed to deliver themselves up to him to be sent to France. They preferred doing this to remaining, and openly announced their intention of doing so. Both of them were seized and thrown into prison, whence M. Pelissier was unable to obtain their liberation. He considered it his duty, under the circumstances, to immediately send in a fresh protest, which, we presume, together with the first, met with no attention, and hence it is probable arose the bombardment and capture of the city.] Bos. COURIER.

A THRILLING INCIDENT.—The Boston Mail of the 14th inst, records the following thrilling incident:

"A most thrilling incident took place at the vault of Mount Ida Cemetery, on Monday last, during the funeral ceremonies of the late James Ilyan. Upon the arrival of the procession at the vault, the coffin was taken from the hearse by the bearers, and carried into the vault, followed by the relatives of the deceased. A portion, if not the whole of the bearers came out, when the flooring of the vault gave way, and sank with a tremendous crash, some six or eight feet, carrying all, corpse included, down with it. No one was injured, but the fright produced even upon the stoutest heart at such an accident, in such a place, and under the circumstances, cannot be described, and scarcely imagined. There are two stories or apartments in the vault, one of which is under ground, and is used for stowing bodies in the heat of the summer. The timbers supporting the floor over this, had become so rotten, that when any considerable weight was placed upon them they gave way.

THE WEATHER AND THE CROPS.—A dispatch from Newberry, N. C., dated the 18th inst., says:

For several days past the weather has been remarkably cool for the season. It is now the middle of August, yet winter clothing is requisite for ease comfort. It is quite a favorable time for pulling fodder, large quantities of which harn been garnered in fine condition during the last week. The early corn crop is, of course, mature, and is beyond contingency. The only danger to be apprehended now is that arising from the overflowing of the water courses. The yield of corn will be immense. The cotton crop looks remarkably well. The plant is very full of blooms, which promise to stick to the stalk and mature. It is in very few and limited sections that we hear of its shedding. The rust is making its appearance in small spots on the gray lands; as yet it has done no serious injury. Altogether there is a good prospect of a large yield of cotton.

RETURN OF MR. LAWRENCE FROM ENGLAND.—The return of Mr. Lawrence from the Court of St. James is no longer a subject of speculation. The Newburyport Herald, in reference to Mr. Lawrence's return, says:

"We have a hint from a well informed source, that Mr. Lawrence returns from England at the request of some of his business associates in Massachusetts, who desire his advice and assistance in consummating some of the important manufacturing operations which have been in embryo for some years, and to which they and he are largely interested. Among these is the Essex Company at Lawrence, which is condncting its operations on a gigantic scale, and is now engaged in one of its works in constructing an enormous mill, six hundred feet long, for the manufacture of Bayge de Laine, an article not before attempted in this country. The mill, it is stated, will require but a million dollars to complete, if but it is the opinion of many that to complete and operate it will require double that amount of capital. As it is a new undertaking, it is of course liable to be a very losing or very profitable concern, according to the knowledge and skill displayed in its construction and management, as well as the state of the times."

CATHOLIC APPOINTMENTS.—The Rev. Dr. Charles Stonestreet, the new Provincial of the Society of the Jesuits in the United States, has made the following recent appointments: Father Flemigan is appointed to Baltimore to take charge of the new college, Father Rice is appointed to St. Joseph's, Philadelphia.

The Union Whig Convention.

Seventh—Augustus Reese, R. M. Orme, R. A. Ward.

Eighth—T. H. Pothill, H. H. Cumming, W. W. Anderson.

The Convention, then adjourned to the next afternoon.

SECOND DAY.—The Convention was called to order at 3 P. M., and Mr. Trippe, chairman of the Committee of Twenty-four, reported that there was no way through which a union with the Scott Convention could be effected, and recommended the nomination of candidates for President and Vice President other than those now before the people. The committee also reported the platform adopted by the Whig National Convention in their recent session in Baltimore, as the platform of the Third Candidate Party of Georgia, and submitted an electoral ticket for the party, as follows:

First District—Hamilton W. Sharp, of Thomas.
Second District—Wm. M. Brown, of Marion.
Third District—Washington Poe, of Bibb.
Fourth District—Blunt C. Ferrell, of Troupe.
Fifth District—Warren Aiken, of Cass.
Sixth District—Y. L. G. Harris, of Clark.
Seventh District—John J. Floyd, of Newton.
Eighth District—Philip S. Lenie, of Jefferson.

The committee likewise reported instructions to the electors nominated, to support in the event of the ticket being elected, Daniel Webster for President, and Charles J. Jenkins for Vice President.

The whole report was unanimously adopted.

The following Executive Committee of the party was then appointed, and soon after the Convention adjourned sine die:

Jas T. Nisbet, Bibb; W. S. Norman, Monroe; Gen. R. H. Rutherford, Bibb; R. M. Orme, Baldwin; Thomas H. Pothill, Jefferson; Stephen Fither, Marion; F. C. Sullivan, Sumter; P. W. Alexander, Chatham; Chas. Turner, Pike; W. S. Jones, Richmond; A. Cloud, Chatham.

LATER FROM BUENOS AYRES.—By the bark Swan, which arrived at Baltimore on the 17th inst., the Sun received the following letter:

Rio de Janeiro, July 4, 1852.—By the arrival to-day at this port of a French steamer of war, we receive advices from Montevideo to 26th June. Political matters are in a bad condition at Buenos Ayres. Gen. Urquiza has dissolved the "Sala" in consequence of their opposition to the treaty entered by the Governors of the different provinces, and he has assumed the supreme control, and placed the province under a military subjection.

It is thought by many that his reign will be a short one, as, from his increasing tyranny, he is making many enemies.

Our city is now quite free from sickness. The yellow fever has almost entirely disappeared.

The sailing this morning of the barks Swan and Isabella Hyne, causes much excitement among the betting circle. Some heavy bets have been made on their run home—the Swan to your city and the Hyne to New York.

The bark Baltimore has not yet reached this port. She sailed from Hampton Roads on the 2d or 4th of April. Much anxiety is manifested for her safety.

OFFICIAL APPOINTMENTS.—Judge Conklin's nomination as Minister to Mexico, has been confirmed by the Senate.

Postmaster General Hall has been nominated for the vacant Judgeship, and Lorenzo Burrows, of New York, for the Postmastership.

THE YACHT AMERICA.—The late accounts in the English papers show that the yacht America was not beaten after all; for it seems, first, that a mistake was made in steering her at the outset, by which she suffered much loss of time; second, that the wind was light—the America requiring a six knot breeze; third, that she was not allowed to carry full sail; fourth, that taking advantage of these circumstances, the other yachts got directly in her wake while she was going before the wind and took away her breeze.

QUARTERING ON THE ENEMY.—The Baton Rouge Comet, referring to the democratic barbecue at Bayon Gonla, tells the following story: "The man that got on at the point, was one of the peculiar geniuses of the coast. He hailed the boat, and she landed for him, for not one of the true blues should be neglected. The men from 'the Point' was a peculiar looking specimen. He had on red striped boots, with short nunentionables, to show the freshness of the leather—a smell surtout—a kind of Palto that came midway his rotundity, and terminated in deep pockets behind—his neck-cloth was blue, and his hat bell-shaped, a kind of Caleb Quotem of a fellow—he got on at the 'Sardine'—went to the barbecue—got his dinner, and came back to the same spot where the boat found him, where, after being landed, he jumped up and sang out: Hurrah! pour Scott et Graham."

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT.—It is stated on good authority that the British Minister has proposed, under instructions from his government, to negotiate an international copyright, similar to that recently concluded between England and France. He desires to secure for British authors the privilege of copyrighting their books, and thus controlling their publication and sale in the United States. President Fillmore has signified his willingness to enter upon such a negotiation, and the subject is now under consideration.

THE MISSISSIPPI AT HALIFAX.—The steam frigate Mississippi arrived at Halifax on the 16th instant. She was received with a salute from the Citadel and ship-of-war Cumberland. She was also visited in the afternoon by the officers of the garrison.

DECEPTIVE TOKENS.—The Journal of Commerce states that large quantities of false tokens, ostensibly issued as business cards, are manufactured at Waterbury, Ct., closely resembling the double eagle, the eagle, and half eagle, in circulation. They are richly gilt with pure gold, and, except the inscription, resemble the genuine coin so closely as to deceive the unwary.

APPARATUS FOR RAISING SUNKEN VESSELS.—The Cleveland Plaindealer notices a new invention for the above purpose, which consists of large, air-tight canvass bags, sixty feet long, and eight feet thick. They are sunk, attached to the wreak, and then inflated. Their lifting power is 250 tons. The propeller City of Oswego is to be raised by the use of this apparatus.

THE NEW CUNARD STEAMER ARABIA.—We notice by the European Times, that the new steamship is appointed to leave Liverpool for New York, on her first trip, on the 6th of November next.

CUSTOMS OF THE SEA.—Accordlog to the "customs of the sea," if goods in a vessel are injured during the voyage by rats, and it appears that there was no cat on board, the owner of the vessel must make good the loss. The custom carefully provides for the question arising on the death of the cat during the voyage. In this event, the master must provide himself with a new cat as soon as he can beg or buy one; and for the damage done by the rebellious rats during the interregnum between the demise of the old and the accession of the new cat, the owner of the vessel is not responsible for this inevitable accident.

RAVAGES OF THE CHOLERA.—About forty deaths from cholera have lately occurred at a village in Indiana called Bompas. At Potosi and Lexington, Mo., the disease still rages, and a number of prominent citizens have died.

PAGANINI'S HEIR.—A German paper says that the celebrated violinist Paganini left to his only son, Achilles, a fortune of two millions of francs and the title of nobility. An anecdote of Monsieur Achilles shows that the proverb, "What the fathers add, the sons subtract," will not be likely to apply to him. While yet a boy, Achilles was one evening present with a couple of gentlemen at the house of the famous singer Labiache. Four candles were burning on the table. This luxury of lights troubled the boy's feelings; after a little while he silently got up, crept on tiptoe to the first light, and while the gentlemen were eagerly engaged in conversation, blew it out. Labiache winked at it, and let him go on. Thinking himself unobserved, he presently blew out the second, and then the third light. But as he was about to pursue the same process with the fourth, Labiache said to him in a friendly way: "Child, if you blow out that light, we shall be unable to see." "We don't need light to talk by," was the answer of the boy, now the possessor of two millions.

A reporter's life in Ireland is not a path through a garden of roses. "They receive no accommodation," says the Clonmel Chronicle, to enable them to discharge their laborious duties. They are crushed out of the best places, and sometimes out of every place, and have then to take their notes in the best way they can, with perhaps a crowd of people either trampling on them or squeezing them to death. It is impossible for any reporter to follow a speaker for two hours, upon his knee, with five or six heavy men lying on his back." The latter observation is hardly a figure of speech.

A commodious and splendid brick edifice has just been completed—ninety-seven by forty-seven feet, three stories—which for stability, convenience of arrangement, and for number, size and comfort of private and school rooms is not surpassed by any similar one in the State. The Principal resides in the building, and with his lady and competent female assistance, superintends the Boarding Department. A lady will reside in the Seminary, who faithfully discharges the duties of matron and nurse, so that at all times, and especially to sickness, pupils will find the comforts, kindness and attentions of home. The Principal, with the aid of female teachers, who also live in the Seminary, diligently guard and form their morals, manners and habits.

There is but one session of ten months. The ensuing school year will commence on Thursday, the 23d of September, 1852. Pupils can enter at any time during the year, chargeable from the time of entrance. No deduction will be made but by special arrangement with, or at the discretion of the Principal.

Boarders in the Seminary study two hours at night under a teacher. They retire at 9 o'clock at night—rise early in the morning. A SHORT SERMON.

...Mark x. 23: "How hardly shall they that have ...ches enter into the kingdom of God!"

The lesson taught us in this remarkable ...ying seems to be this, to wit: that riches in-...ase the difficulty, and lessen the probability of ...alvation.

First, the acquisition of wealth must en-...gross a very large proportion of our time and ...houghts. All observation and experience ...has shown, that to acquire wealth is a most ...difficult enterprise—an enterprise in which a ...very small proportion of those who enter the ...list are successful in winning the prize. Most business men will tell you that to make ...money is a comparatively easy matter, but to ...keep it, to invest it judiciously, requires an ...economy, a self-denial that but few can exer-...cise, and a shrewdness and business capacity ...that not many possess.

Making wealth, then, is a difficult and ab-...sorbing pursuit—a pursuit that allows little ...or no time for any other interest. Your real ...money-making, wealth-gathering man, is a ...man of one business. You do not find him ...reading Bulwer or Byron; he has no time or ...money to spend at balls or parties. He has ...but little time for literary cultivation or so-...cial enjoyment, although most men have a ...natural aptitude for these things; much less ...time has he, then, for things spiritual, for ...which he has no aptitude, but a repugnance, ...for "the carnal mind is enmity against God." ...The man's social or domestic relations, or ...early habits, may carry him to the house of ...God at times; but then he goes with a mind ...pre-occupied, and truth, the truth of God, ...falls upon him like a pebble upon a deep and ...rapid stream. It may ripple the surface for a ...passing instant, but the rushing water passes ...on and obliterates the impression forever.

Ask the irreligious man, who is rapidly ...growing rich, why he is not religious: he ...tells you he scarcely knows why—that really ...he has been, and still is, so busy that he has ...no time to pay any attention to the subject; ...and this is one of his chief reasons why he ...will not join the Church and try to lead a re-...ligious life; he fears that it would take too ...much of his precious time, for it is the first ...maxim of his philosophy that "time is mo-...ney." Nearly all that we have said in rela-...tion to the acquisition of wealth, might be ...repeated in relation to the caring for and ...keeping it—for wealth, in any aspect, is to ...him that is identified with it, time and ...thought-engrossing; but we pass on.

The second place, to say that the pursuit ...and the possession of wealth introduces us into ...occasions unfriendly to piety. It, I believe, ...ranks as a truism, that those who knew men ...best have least confidence in them. Much ...buying and selling brings us to know many ...men, and to probe them at the tenderest ...point—their interest. Men will talk fair ...enough. Oh, they are vastly kind and amia-...ble; but just touch their interest, just reduce ...their rhetoric to the logic of dollars and ...cents, and the real man, unmasked, stands ...exposed to view, a selfish creature, ecce Ilag ...his own. Sometimes men possessing piety, ...like Judas of old, will betray their Saviour ...for thirty pieces of silver. The fortune seek-...ing man but too often witnesses such exhibi-...tions of human character, and the tendency ...is to lessen his confidence in men, and even ...piety itself. He has so often been deceived ...that he almost believes that every man has ...his price, and that there is none good—no, ...not one.

But when wealth is made, it introduces the ...maker of it into the company of men like ...himself, who have spent their lives in the ...pursuit of riches—and of the abundance of ...the heart the mouth will speak—all their ...conversation will be of money, stocks and in-...vestments; and God, and man's high and ...holy duties, will not once be named. How ...can that man be pious? How can he break ...away from the grasp of old habits and strong-...ly linked associations? It can "hardly" be ...done at all. Ask any rich pious man, what ...he thinks would have been his chance for ...salvation if he had waited to seek God until ...he acquired a fortune and surrounded him-...self with all its embarrassments, and he will ...tell you that he fears the hope of salvation, ...in such a case, would have been a slender ...and a broken reed.

Those who are born to the possession of a ...fortune won by the toil and economy of ...others, are most always surrounded by the ...young, the gay and thoughtless, to whom ...penitence and prayer are strange things. ...They are generally quite too well satisfied ...with themselves to feel the need of either ...penitence or prayer. "Soul, take thine ease," ...is the soothing language they are wont to ad-...dress themselves. Oh, how difficult it is to ...rend these silken bands, escape these pleas-...ing toils, and cry with a heart crucified to ...the world, "God forbid that I should glory, ...save in the Cross of our Lord Jesus Christ."

Thirdly, riches are unfavorable to humility and dependence upon God. Do you deny or doubt the proposition? then to the law and the testimony. (Psalm xlix. 6) "They that trust in their wealth, and boast themselves in the multitude of their riches."

St. Paul believed the proposition—hear what he bids Timothy do: "Charge them that are rich in this world, that they be not high-minded, nor trust in uncertain riches." Once more, Rev. iii. 14: "Thou sayest I am rich and increased with goods, and sayest I have need of nothing." I need not say how many wealth makes purse-proud—how many, especially among the young, are vain and arrogant, and think themselves better and far superior to those whose fathers have not been so successful in gathering worldly gear. I scarcely need to add, by way of concluding that proposition, that such tempers of mind are at the utmost possible distance from that poverty of spirit to which the kingdom of heaven is promised.

Fourthly, riches are unfavorable to self-denial and zeal. Because they furnish the means of sensual gratification; and although those who have toiled, economized and grown rich may, from habit and principle, resist the temptation which their means and their associations subject them to, all observation and history teach us that we are not to expect this of the young, who have heired their wealth. They have not been bred to habits of self-denial they do not see or feel the necessity for the practice of a constant and rigid economy; then, too, they are subjected to the powerful, and to them well-nigh irresistible influence of association.

The class to which they belong are for the most part a luxurious and self-indulging class. One individual in this class, like one drop in a rapid stream, is borne away by the current. It is, then, as a general rule, too much to expect of this class, that they will "deny themselves," for this would be to frustrate what most of them conceive to be the chief end and value of wealth—a means of personal gratification—and yet we are taught by the highest authority, that if any man will follow Christ he must "deny himself."

Riches are unfavorable to zeal, because they necessarily occupy much time, and absorb a great proportion of the thoughts of those who are occupied in either making or caring for wealth. Now such is the constitution of our finite natures, that we are not and can not be acted upon by more than one grand impulse at a time. It is a matter, then, of extreme difficulty for one who is very anxious to be rich, or who is already so, to be zealous for God. But the influence of wealth is not merely negative—it is, unless controllable by Divine grace, positively productive of vice and endangering to the soul; for we are taught that "they that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition."

The two great sins of the wealthy irreligious class, are licentiousness among the young, who feel that wealth is only desirable as a means of indulgence, and covetousness among the old, whose only happiness consist in accumulation. Every reader of the Bible knows—every observer of society sees—the great difficulty of salvation to licentious and covetous men.

If, then, the above reflections be allowed to be just and truthful, it follows as an inevitable consequence that riches increase the difficulty and lessen the probability of salvation, which is the proposition that we have sought to maintain.

We will close this short discourse with two or three brief reflections.

First, then, in view of the soul-endangering tendency of wealth, let us "seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness," that being armed with the more than mortal might of faith, we may be able to "overcome the world."

Second, not to pine and sigh for riches; they do not always bring content to those who possess them; but they always do bring danger to the soul. "Having food and raiment"—that is, things necessary and convenient—"let us therewith be content," for riches on earth often take to themselves wings and fly away; but in heaven there is an inheritance that fadeth not away.

Lastly, let us remember that God, our Almighty Friend, will withhold nothing from us if we walk uprightly. If, then, God does not give us riches, he sees in his wisdom that they would not be good for us, but might prove a "temptation and a snare," and drown us in destruction and perdition. Our poverty may be the Divinely appointed instrumentality to make us and our "little ones" rich towards God in faith and good works.

And now to God, as is most due, be rendered all praise, dominion and glory, forever. Amen.

J. B. WALKER.

Louisiana, August 26, 1852.

PASTORAL RELATION.

A solemn lesson, inculcated by apostolic experience, demands more attention than it receives: "I have learned in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content." Modern pastors and flocks may do well to study it for their protection against the sullen murmure of discontent, and the wild freakishness of caprice; and to master it for the perpetuation of peace, the benefit of posterity and the honor of their Redeemer.

The pastoral relation has its trials. They are inseparable from the infirmities and obliquities of fallen humanity in all its conditions. Avoided in all shapes, they can not be; but endured in any shape in which heaven sends them, they may be. If clouds arise and winds blow and thunders roll and storms fall, threatening a general wreck of earthly hopes and prospective quiet, the disturbed elements are not to be hushed by flight, but by simple trust in God and fidelity in duty. Certain it is, that in one church there may be a Diotrephes, who loveth to have the pre-eminence; and in another, an Alexander, the coppersmith, who doth the ministry much injury; in a third, a Hymeneus and Philetus, who err from the faith, and draw away disciples after them; but shall they triumph in their wickedness? Shall they drive the man of God from his place, while he is ready to impart to them not the gospel only, but his own soul? Never! Let his heart be firm as the iron-ribbed oak; let the purpose be steadfastly maintained, to abound yet more and more in the work of the Lord, and the demon of discord will flee, the Holy Spirit will descend like a dove, and sweet peace shall supervene upon the terrors of conflict, and heaven's richest blessings shall flow in channels wrought out by the action of the very waters of strife. [Doctor Sterrs' Sermon.

THE APOSTOLIC EPISTLES.

That so large a portion of the New Testament should consist of epistolary correspondence is a striking phenomenon; still it was natural and necessary in the circumstances. The early churches often needed counsel, warning and instruction. They had no written oracles to appeal to, and therefore the apostles, as the living depositaries of inspired truth, were obliged to communicate with them in the form of "doctrine, reproof, correction, and instruction in righteousness." These letters are, therefore, the fervent outpouring of pastoral zeal and attachment. They are not abstract impersonal treatises—mere systems of theology. Like other letters, they have their peculiar charm. They are written without reserve and in unaffected simplicity. Sentiments come warm from the heart without the shaping, pruning and punctilious arrangement of a formal discourse. There is such a fresh and familiar transcription of feeling, so frequent an introduction of colloquial idioms, and so much of conversational frankness and vivacity, that the reader associates the image of the writer with every paragraph, and his ear seems to catch and recognize the very tones of living address. These impressions must have been often deepened by the thought that the letter came from "such an one as" Paul, always a sufferer, and often a prisoner. If he could not speak, he wrote; if he could not see them in person, he dispatched to them these silent messengers of love.

We have alluded to Paul as the principal letter writer in the New Testament. When that change which passed over him with the shock of a spiritual earthquake had subsided into resolute attachment to the new religion, what ardor and heroism were seen to be united in him—what a rare combination of intellect and heart, of enthusiasm and perseverance! Still with him there was no stoical abnegation of humanity; while he lived for the world, he lived in the world. He shrunk from the scourge, and declared himself a citizen of Rome, and the shuddering expectation of a Roman dungeon suggested the warmth and comfort of a "cloak." The culture of the schools was in him "baptized with the Holy Ghost and with fire." Words are often unable to convey his thoughts; they reel and stagger beneath the weight and power of his conceptions. And whether we turn to his alarmed appeal to the people of Lycaonia, where he was taken for the god of eloquence, to his oration before the critics and judges of the Areopagus, or to his pleading at the bar of Felix and Agrippa—or whether we survey his letter to the Church in Rome, in its fullness, profundity and compacted system—or his Epistle to Corinth, so varied and magnificent in argument, so earnest and so persuasive in remonstrance and vindication—or the missive sent to Galatia, so vivid and startling in its surprise, indignation or sorrow—or that to Ephesus, so opulent in thought and exalted in sentiment, as if to compensate for the costly books of magic which had been given to the flames—or that to Philippi, so warm and exuberant in its congratulations to the first European city where the gospel had been proclaimed—or that to Colosse, exposing the insidious assaults of a specious philosophy, which corrupted the purity and marred the simplicity of the gospel—or his twin communications to Thessalonica, calm, affectionate and consolatory—or those to Timothy and Titus, replete with the sage and cordial advices of paternal kindness, and long and varied experience—or the brief note to Philemon concerning a dishonest and fugitive slave, who had been unexpectedly brought to "the knowledge of the truth"—or, the epistolary tracts addressed to the Hebrews, with its powerful demonstration of the superior glory and the unchanging permanence and spirituality of the New Dispensation—to whichever of these compositions we turn, we are struck with the same lofty genius and fervid eloquence, the same elevated and self-denying temperance, the same throbbings of a noble and yearning heart, the same masses of thought, luminous and many-tinted, like the cloud which glows under the reflected splendors of the setting sun, the same vigorous mental grasp which, amid numerous digressions, is ever tracing truths up to first principles—all these the results of a master mind, into which nature and grace had poured in royal profusion their rarest and richest endowments.

Similar in character are the other and catholic epistles of the New Testament—the epistle of James, so severe, lofty and individualizing in its tone, so like the personal teaching of Jesus, as seen in the Sermon on the Mount—the two epistles of Peter, the very image of himself in warm impulse and aspiration, and so full of Jewish allusion and associations, quite in keeping with the spirit of Him who was "the Apostle of the Circumcision"—the three epistles of John, so redolent of love, "the bond of perfectness," and ever recurring to the necessity of a holy life as the true accompaniment and realization of an orthodox creed; and lastly, the brief chapter of Jude, a volcanic denunciation of Antinomian licentiousness and fruitless formalism.

In the epistles what specimens have we not of almost every form of composition—description, narrative, argument, oratory—bold invective and sudden apostrophe—antithesis and climax—the brief words of anger—the sad regrets of disappointed hope—the soft breathings of affection—the vehement outburst of self-vindication—the long and effective argument, often ending in an anthem—logic swelling into lyrics—the terse deliverance of ethical maxims, and the cordial greeting and kind remembrance of former friends. No wonder that Longinus adds Paul of Tarsus to a list of names, "which were the crown of all eloquence and Grecian genius." There are some passages in the Epistles to the Corinthians which have all the vehement and thrilling penetration of Demosthenes, and other sections in the same books, which, in elevation, imagery and music, have no parallel, even in the Platonic dialogues. DREAM OF GALILEO.

Translated from the German, by J. M. Reiter.

Galileo, who has made himself immortal in science, lived now in a quiet and honorable age at Arcetri, in Florentine. He was already robbed of his noblest organs, notwithstanding he always rejoiced at spring, partly on account of the returning nightingale and the odoriferous blossoms, and partly on account of the lovely recollections of his former friends.

Once, in his last spring, he was led by Vivani, his youngest and most grateful pupil, into the field of Arcetri. Perceiving that for his strength he had gone too far, he begged, rather in fun, of his leader, not to bring him beyond the line of Florence. "You know," said he, "what I had to promise to the holy Inquisition." Vivani seated him on a mound of earth; and as he here was nearer the flowery herbs, and as it were in a cloud of odoriferousness, he remembered the longings for liberty that befel him once in Rome, at the approach of spring.

He was just about to pour out the last drop of bitterness he had towards his cruel persecutors, when he quickly dropped and reproved himself with these words: "The spirit of Copernicus might become angry." Vivani, who knew nothing of the dream to which Galileo had reference, asked him for an explanation of these words. But the old man, for whom the evening became to cool, wanted to be led back before he gave it.

"You know," began he, after a short repose, "how hard my fate in Rome was, and how long the time of liberation was lengthened out. When I found that the powerful intercession of my protectors, the Medici, and even my revocation to which I lowered myself, remained without effect, I cast myself upon my couch full of bitter contemplations, and of inward revoltings against Providence.

"As far as I can remember, cried I, 'How unblamable thy life has been! how laborious and zealous in thy calling; has thou traveled through the labyrinths of false wisdom, to search for the light which thou could not find? How hast thou sacrificed all the powers of thy soul to break through to truth, and fight them all to the ground—these antiquated, mighty prejudices. Parsimonious, has thou not often fled the table after which thou lustest, and the bowl that thou wouldst have enjoyed drawn from thy lips, so as not to become indolent in works of the Spirit! How often, when all around thee lay in careless repose, and recruited the exhausted body for new scenes of voluptuousness, hast thou trembled of cold when contemplating the wonders of the firmament, or in dark and cloudy nights waked beside the glimmering of the lamp, to proclaim the honors of God and to enlighten the world. Wretch! what is now thy fruit of all these labors? What benefit hast thou now of all the glorification of thy Creator, and the enlightening of mankind? That grief now dries up the moisture of thy eyes, and they die daily, these most faithful helpers of the soul; and very soon these tears which, thou canst not restrain will destroy their weak light for ever.'

"Thus spake I to myself, Vivani, and then I cast a glance full of envy upon my persecutors. 'These unworthy ones,' cried I, 'who veil in mysterious forms, and cover their vice under an honorable garment, and the wise, who hold up the torch of light, they strike madly to the ground, that his light disturb not their voluptuous slumber! These abject ones, who are only active for their lusts, and the ruin of the world, how they laugh in their palaces of sorrow! how they enjoy themselves in continued reelings of life! how the populace bows reverently before them, whom they cheat out of the produce of their fields, and prepare unto themselves feasts of joy from the fat of their herds and the juice of their grapes! And thou, unhappy one, who didst only live for God, who never permitted a passion to rise in thy soul, except the holiest and pure, for truth; who, a better priest of God, revealed the wonders in the system of the world, and also in the worm. Must thou now miss the thing after which thou pantest? the thing which even to the beasts in the woods, and the birds in the air, is not denied, Liberty? What eye watches over the destinies of men? What just and unprejudiced hand distributes the riches of life? The base it permits to draw every thing to itself, and the worthy is deprived of all.'

"I continued my complaints until I sank into sleep; and immediately a venerable old man came before my couch; he stood and beheld me with pleasure, whilst mine eye, full of wonder, rested on his brow and his silvery locks. 'Galileo,' said he finally, 'what thou now sufferest thou sufferest for truth which I taught, and they that persecute thee would also persecute me, had not death saved me to yonder eternal liberty.'

"'Thou art Copernicus,' cried I, and locked him, before he could answer me, into my arms. 'O they are sweet, Vivani, those relations which nature has founded; but how much sweeter yet are the relationships of congenial souls! how much dearer and cordial than even the bonds of brotherhood are the bonds of truth! With what forefeelings of an enlarged sphere of action and elevated powers of soul and communication of the treasure of all knowledge, one hastens to meet the friend that steps towards us, led by the Hand of Wisdom!

"'Behold,' said the old man, after the embrace, 'I have taken back the integument that once enclosed me, and will now be to thee what I shall be to thee in future, thy guide; because there, where the unfettered spirit, in restless activity, untiringly continues to work; there, rest is only change of work. Self-searching in the depths of the godhead only changes with instruction, which we impart to those of late arrival; and the first, who shall in future lead your soul into the knowledge of the Eternal, am I.

"He then led me by the hand to a lowered cloud, and we took our flight into the immeasurable heavens. I saw here the moon, Vivani, with her heights and vales; I saw the stars of the milkyway, the Pleiads and the Orion; I saw the specks of the sun, and the moons of Jupiter: all that which I saw here below at first I saw there better, with the naked eye. I walked on the heavens full of ecstacy and joy over myself, like a philanthropist on earth walks among his benevolent works. Each hour here below worked through, was there fruitful of bliss, and of such a bliss he never can feel that stops empty of knowledge. Therefore shall I never, Vivani, not even in this trembling old age, desist to search after truth; for he who sought it here, to him blooms there eternal joy, wherever he looks, from every insight, from every destroyed doubt, from every uncovered mystery, from every faded error. Behold, I feel all this in those moments of rapture; but only this, that I felt it remained with me; my overfilled soul felt each single felicity in the ocean of them all.

"Whilst I thus saw and was astonished, I lost myself in the greatness of Him, who, full of wisdom, created all this, and through his ever working love bears up all things. The conversation of my guide raised me to still higher comprehensions—not the limits of your senses, said he, are the limits of the Universe; and if, from inconceivable distances, an army of suns sparkle towards you, many thousands shine to your glances concealed in the endless ether; and every sun, as also each surrounding sphere, is peopled with feeling beings and thinking souls. Wherever paths were possible, there worlds are rolling, and wherever a being could feel happy, there beings wander! not a space was left in the whole immensity of the Eternal, where the economical Creator had not created life, or serviceable stuff for life; and through this whole innumerable variety of beings, there exists down to the smallest atom unbroken order. Eternal laws tune every thing, from heaven to heaven, from sun to sun, and from earth to earth, in delightful harmony.

"'But why do I tell thee this now, Galileo, for this bliss no spirit comprehends that is still fettered to a lazy companion, and no farther than the companion can endure, and who feels drawn back into the dust when he had just began to rise.

"The cloud that bore us had sunk back to the earth, and rested now, as I thought, upon one of the hills of Rome. The capital of the world lay before us, but full of deep contempt I reached forth my hand from my height, and said they may think themselves great, the proud dwellers of these palaces, while purple clothes their bodies, and gold and silver deck their tables of all that Europe and India can furnish; but like the eagle upon the worm in the silk weaving, so look down the wise upon the blunt weak—for they are prisoners in their souls that can not go beyond the leaf upon which they cleave, whilst the free wise steps upon his heights and overlooks the world, or soars upon wings of contemplation up to his God, and walks beneath the stars.

"'As I spake thus, Vivani, the brow of my Guide became solemnly beclouded, his brotherly arm sank down from my shoulders, and his eye shot a threatening glance at me, piercing my very soul. 'Unworthy one,' cried he, 'so hast thou already felt upon earth these joys of heaven, hast made thy name glorious among the wise of the nations, hast heightened the powers of thy soul, so that they soon may, freer and mightier, continue to work in knowledge and truth through an eternity; and now that God counts the worthy to suffer persecution, and thy wisdom shall become a reward unto thee and clothe thy heart with virtues, as also thy spirit with knowledge, now is the remembrance of all good annihilated, and thy soul revolts against God.'

"'Here I awoke from my dream and saw myself cast back into my stern prison. With a flood of tears I wetted my couch. Then I raised mine eyes in the midst of the shades of night and said, 'O God, full of love, has the nothing that became something through thee found fault with Thy ways? Hath the dust, whom thou gavest a soul, hath he to his account written as a reward what were gifts of Thy mercy? Hath the unworthy whom Thou, on thy bosom, you on thy heart nearest, to whom thou hast presented so many a drop of bliss out of Thine own cup, hath he thy grace and thy privileges forgotten? Then smite his eyes with blindness! let him no more hear the sound of friendship! let him become gray in prison! With a will spirit shall he bear it, thankful for the membrance of past pleasures, and happy in the prospect of those to come.'

"'It was my whole soul, Vivani, which I poured forth in this prayer, and not the murmuring of the unsatisfied. Only the willing, thankful surrendering God receives; he has created me to much happiness, for behold I live free here at Arcetri, and even just today hath my friend let me among the flowers of spring. He groped after the hand of his scholar to press it thankfully, but Vivani received it into his own, and led it honorably to his lips."

Xenophon, and the rest of the philosophers, esteemed wisdom the greatest wealth and content the highest bliss.

When passion is permitted to usurp the throne of reason, its power is lost.

SMALL TALK.

Stop, reader! Ills not so fast along the highway of these columns; stop and peruse this article. If you are like myself, you skim the choicest and the shortest articles from your paper, especially the shortest, and leave the rest. I hate few things more heartily than long articles in a newspaper. And, Mr. Editor, one of the leading excellencies of your sheet is the brevity of your extracts and communications. True, shortness is no excuse for dullness; but there are not many things more delicious in this world of bores—of men bores, tongue bores, newspaper bores, book bores, pulpit bores and stump bores—than a short, well written article. Therefore, reader, I pray you stop: let me plead for this scrap. "Is it not a little one?" Just see, how short it is. I do not promise you shall not be bored, but then the infliction will soon be over.

We referred, in our last, to a want of appropriate preaching at revival meetings. There are other evils quite as formidable on such occasions. Not one of the least is the great anxiety of brethren to occupy the pulpit, especially at popular hours. A special effort is to be made. After the manner of a farmer of small force, who wishes to roll his logs, every preacher within reach is invited. They come—the people are in fine spirits—surely, they will have a glorious time. The preacher in charge considers the amount and peculiarities of each brother's talents, and his judgment indicates whom to place in the pulpit, and to whom to assign other work less prominent. Now, if he could just keep up this arrangement all the time, the meeting would prosper. But can he do it? Will not this latter class bolt, unless they can let off their artillery from the pulpit? Have you not met ministers of this sort, Mr. Editor? If you have not I have. They come there to make a flourish, and if not allowed, become soured and peevish, and begin to mutter something about the preacher in charge being a thick-headed numskull, who can not appreciate their talents. Does not this either prove that their object in preaching is to show off, and not to save souls; or that they think that they know better what is good for the meeting than the conductor does? Yes, every brother must have a chance, or he goes away dissatisfied and embittered in his feelings. Why, in his own neighborhood he is a great man; he commands large congregations; the people think him a powerful, fine preacher. Why, then, should he be kept in the background on this occasion? He can not understand it. The secret is, my brother, you are not quite so great a preacher as you imagine yourself to be; or while you may have more talent than others, in a certain line, your talent may not suit this particular occasion. The object is to do good. If you can do more in some other place than the pulpit, you ought to be satisfied; and if you are not quite so smart as another, dont blame the preacher in charge for finding it out and acting accordingly.

This leads us to notice a very prevalent error, in inviting too many ministers to a meeting, unless all, except one or two, will consent to work elsewhere than in the pulpit. We care not what may be the talents and tact of all the preachers, a multitude of them preaching, one after the other, can not have the same force and wide-spread effect as one or two can have. What one of the former builds up his successor often demolishes. I have known meetings completely ruined by having too many preachers. Indeed, one good, effective, prudent minister, by occupying the pulpit at every prominent hour, can accomplish more than a dozen. He can follow up his blows in regular succession, until finally the tallest bow.

This lead us, also, to remark on the want of independence in preachers in charge, in putting up ministers to preach, especially on revival occasions, simply to save their feelings. What an inadequate motive, when the interests of souls are at stake! He is willing to bore his congregation with an almost unendurable or inappropriate sermon, and run the risk of materially injuring his meeting, simply to avoid wounding the feelings of a single man. Shame on this lack of courage and independence. A minister who realizes the true nature of his calling, ought, I had almost said will not, take offence at such a course. He will say, "Lord, send by whom thou wilt send, but send." He is willing to work any where where he can do the most good. But I am reminded of my promise to be brief, and therefore break short off, until our next interview.

METHODIST PRESS.

THE ISSUE.—The Northern Christian Advocate accepts the challenge we noticed last week, as given by the New York journal:

"The question is one and indivisible: Is it best to tolerate slavery in the M. E. Church? On this question Dr. Bond takes the affirmative and we the negative. We acknowledge his ability in controversy, and would gladly avoid the discussion, if it could be done without injury to truth. That he will make good his position, we do not believe, since it has not been given to man to accomplish impossibilities."

The "Northern" is an influential General Conference paper, having a circulation of about 10,000. Two Conferences have already taken its ground on the subject. It is no wonder that they are tender on slavery—one of them (the Oneida) has become too conscientious to use United States postage stamps! Really we do not understand the following, moved by one Silas Comfort:

"Whereas, the use of post-office stamps may, by possibility, subject the most circumspect to the groundless imputation of fraudulent intentions, therefore

"Resolved, That we deem the practice of using them one of doubtful expediency, and recommend to forego the trifling convenience which their use secures. Adopted, and ordered published in the N. C. Advocate."

IMPROVEMENT.—Our brethren of the Memphis Advocate are stirring up their patrons to the purchase of a press for their good sheet. It is printed now by contract. The last paper contained cheering news of revivals, and over two hundred conversions.

A NEW GENERAL CONFERENCE.—We extract from the Guardian, (Toronto, Canada) of 18th ult., the following news. The editor says the Canada Conference has not taken any steps towards the organization—it was only a matter of conversation and not of action with them. The Methodist Church in British North America is not present mainly constituted of separate districts, independent of each other, and in allegiance with the Parent Conference, which controls and assists them:

"The Wesleyan Methodist Church in this country has at present under consideration a subject of vast importance to its future welfare and usefulness. It is the organization of a Federal Union of the Methodism of British North America, embracing Eastern and Western Canada, the Hudson's Bay Territory, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Newfoundland, the whole of which to be governed by a Federal Conference, after the manner of the General Conference of the M. E. Church in the adjoining republic. This movement, be it understood, has not originated with the church in this country, but has been suggested by the Parent Conference in England, and is now brought under the consideration of the Wesleyan body here, by their ministers, for the free expression of their opinion and judgment."

BISHOP BASCOM.—We had set apart the Rev. A. Steven's article on Bishop Bascom, in last Quarterly Review, for "copy," but on second thought let it go. The writer put his guage critical to his subject with an air inconsistent, as it seemed to us, with a just appreciation of him. The Southern Advocate publishes the article, but puts in a few caveats. The editor denies that Dr. B. used snuff, that he exhibited the slightest gaucherie or embarrassment in the best company, and that his pulpit character was elaborately formed on the rules of oratorical art. On this last point we think Mr. Stevens will get the greater number to agree with him. The vindication, as far as needed in the case, has been well put in. Our contemporary says of Mr. Stevens' article:

"It is the nearest approach to a just appreciation of Dr. Bascom's mental character, that we have noticed on the part of a Northern writer. Taken as a whole, the portraiture may be regarded as satisfactory evidence that sectional prejudices are yielding to the touch of time; and that Dr. Bascom's identification of his fame and fortunes with the Southern M. E. Church, however it may have led to a temporary depreciation of the high qualities he undeniably possessed, will not permanently affect his reputation in the Northern portions of the United States."

MINISTERIAL EDUCATION.—The excellent pro tem. of the Richmond Advocate (Rev. J. Bayley) has some thoughtful remarks on this subject. He thinks too much consequence is attached to it in the speeches and essays of the day—an undue and invidious elevation given it. We do not think his position high enough for the present movement of the Church on the subject of education. Doctor Lee differs from J. B., if we understand them both. The following definition is unexceptionable:

"What is education for the ministry? We think it is that kind of physical, mental, moral and religious training, which qualifies a man, in connection with the gifts and calling of the Holy Spirit, for the great work of calling sinners to repentance."

J. B., no doubt, estimates correctly the attainments of some sprigs of divinity. Let him speak for himself:

"It is quite amusing sometimes to observe how little some of these young graduates know of those subjects, which, of all others, they ought to know the best. The following ... in a certain college, ... periodical: ... late catechetical ... to, an ... examiner, well ... ...ding-gearing ... enjoyed ... the following ... test:

LITERARY NOTICES.

[The following notices were prepared for last week, but unavoidably omitted. Those whose favors are acknowledged will excuse the delay.]

BAPTISM: a Treatise on the Nature, Perpetuity, Subjects, Administrator, Mode and Use of the Initiating Ordinance of the Christian Church; with an Appendix. By T. O. Summers, D. D.: 1852. 12mo., pp. 252.

Through the mail we have a copy of this work, by the kindness of the author. If it does not get a speedy and general circulation in the range of our readers, we shall be tempted to supply them with it by extracts. The author, in his candid and thorough mode, has exhausted the divisions as the divisions exhaust the subject. It is a Church text-book of high order. Without noticing it farther at this time, we advise our friends to possess it.

ANALYSIS OF THE PRINCIPLES OF CHURCH GOVERNMENT, particularly that of the M. E. Church. By M. M. Henkle, D. D.: 1852. 18mo.; pp. 172.

We have noticed this book as about to appear, and we thank the author for a copy. Those who have read it as it appeared in the weekly religious press, will be pleased at its permanent form. It presents a favorable view of our Church government, especially on the mooted points of the day.

MASONIC COLLEGES.

The Masons, though secret in their club rooms, are in these late times manifest in their energetic support of education. On our table are two catalogues, that witness this:

Auburn (Ala.) Masonic Female College.—Rev. D. S. F. Douglas, President, with a faculty of four professors, an extensive course of study, and one hundred and six students. We have seen the college buildings. They are commodious, and located in a pleasant part of one of the pleasantest villages of Alabama.

Masonic College of Lexington, Missouri.—Rev. F. L. B. Shaver, President, with a faculty of two professors, and two adjunct professors in Preparatory department. Total of students, one hundred and forty.

Orville Institute, Dallas County, Ala.—This institute was chartered last February. Rev. J. R. Malone, A. M., President, assisted by two male and two female teachers. The session begins on the 6th inst. Vocal music and military tactics taught free of charge. Classics will be organized upon a college basis. Rev. W. W. Thorne is President of an able Board of Trustees.

REVIVAL INTELLIGENCE.

Near Brandon, Miss. Conf.

BROTHER MCTYEIRE: We have recently had a gracious revival of God's work in this vicinity. Week before last a meeting began about eight miles from Brandon, and continued for ten days. There were fifty-one accessions to the Church. Brothers Daughtry, Stewart, Thomas and Gardiner labored with zeal and fervency. May such revivals occur all over our country. Yours, H.

Brandon, Aug. 24, 1852.

P. S. There will be two camp meetings in Rankin county—at Sanni, embracing third Sabbath in September, and at Shiloh, embracing second Sabbath of October.

Pearl River Circuit, Miss. Conf.

REV. H. N. MCTYEIRE:

Dear Brother—In the Covington District, Pearl River Circuit, at China Grove Church, there was recently held a quarterly meeting by the Presiding Elder, Rev. John Lusk. The meeting closed on Monday. We had quite a refreshing season; seven joined the Church; six white and one black. In many places on the circuit Bro. Green says there is quite a good time, and some seventy have joined the Church, and near that number professed religion.

As the result of quite a small effort, I send you six new subscribers to the Advocate, and hope to send you more soon.

Yours, in Christ Jesus,

N. B. RAIFORD.

Pike county, Miss., Aug. 26,

Talladega District, Ala. Conf.

We are happy to hear of another year of spiritual prosperity within the bounds of this district. The Presiding Elder, Rev. W. H. McDaniel, writes 23d ult:

"My district is in a flame of revivals—All the preachers are doing their duty, and at their posts. Glory to God for his mercy."

MOBILE, ALA.—Dr. Hamilton, pastor of St. Francis Street Church, writes on 1st inst:

"We have had some 15 or 18 conversions in a few days, and hope for many more."

BAYARD TAYLOR'S TRAVELS.—A letter from Constantinople, of the 19th July, mentions that Bayard Taylor had just reached that place. He came overland from Egypt by way of Aleppo and Brousa, and appeared in Constantinople in the full costume of a Turk, as large as life. He found the country this side of Aleppo quiet, except near Tarsus and Adana. At Aleppo he found that some of the Mussulmans who had been engaged in the massacre of the Christians there in 1850, had succeeded in obtaining seats in the City Council. The French Consul is still prosecuting a demand for satisfaction for the murder of a Roman Priest at Aleppo. It was for a long time believed that he had been murdered by Jews, but it is now said that the Consul has evidence that he was murdered by members of the City Police, in revenge for his success in building a Christian Church. Nothing has, as yet, been done by the local Government towards indemnifying the Christians of the city for their losses during the outbreak there, except some old guns by the Government to rebuild one of the churches then destroyed. The embarrassed state of the finances would be alleged as the cause for the delay.

SOUTHERN METHODIST CHURCH,

IN WASHINGTON CITY.

MY DEAR DOCTOR: The propriety, the necessity for establishing a Southern Methodist Church in Washington City, the capital of our nation, is obvious to every Southern man. The whole South is deeply interested in the enterprise, and steps have been taken to accomplish this object. A small, intelligent and growing society has been formed. A church edifice, neat, spacious and nearly new, located in an eligible part of the city, has been purchased from the Presbyterians for $4000, which originally cost them $9000. A parsonage has also been furnished with neat and comfortable furniture, and some alterations have been made in the church edifice. Having done our best at home to meet all these expenses, we yet owe a debt of three thousand five hundred dollars, which will soon be pressing, and which must be liquidated in order to place our cause in the Metropolis upon an independent and permanent foundation.

All other Christian denominations have large and fine churches in the capital. The Northern Methodists have seven, and in addition, they took steps recently in their General Conference, in Boston, to build a grand Metropolitan Church in Washington, to cost $50,000. The South also should be represented. Southern members of Congress, Southern men who visit Washington with their families, visitors from every part of the South, Southern men who, from time to time, receive offices under government in Washington, Southern men who remove to Washington and settle there, and Southern men who now reside in Washington, all should have a church there congenial with their sentiments, taste, religion and principles. It is common ground, a common cause, and a universal interest should be felt and manifested. Seldom has an object so pleasing, just and important appealed to the sympathies and liberality of the South for support.

Nor is the cause without friends. Already have several places nobly responded. Please publish the following subscriptions, made to liquidate the above debt. In future, I shall send you a list of subscriptions that shall be made, till the debt is cancelled and we are free. I hope to be able soon to report something from every circuit and station within the range of your paper:

Several churches in Virginia	$584 00
Hampton, Va. Nobly done!	35 37
Louisville, Ky. (Preachers $50)	150 00
Missionary Board, Louisville, Ky	500 00
Rev. C. A. Marshall, Vicksburg, Miss.	100 00
	$1,369 37

This is encouraging. Never a wiser appropriation made by the Missionary Board, for Washington City, at this time, is missionary ground to the Church South. A thousand thanks to the generous men who compose the Board, and who made the appropriation unanimously and heartily. Let every preacher in charge of a circuit or station in the South, take up a collection for us, and send it on, small or large, to the Metropolis, and the work is done. And if the preachers hesitate to do this, let the membership encourage them to do it. It can not interfere materially with any local interests. The Presiding Elders can do something. The ladies can help—God bless them!—they have helped—they will help. The patriotic women of Carthage cut off their hair to make ropes, and furnish the materiel of war, when Carthage was exhausted in the siege by the Romans. Remember the "widow's mite." The contributions may be directed to me in Washington City, D. C., or to Rev. Chas. A. Davis, who is our Treasurer. One and all, help.

Pastor of the M. E. Church, South,

HOLY GHOST PREACHING.

SUMMERFIELD, Ala., Aug. 27.

DEAR BROTHER MCTYEIRE: "There is too much of human preaching in the Church at the present day. The Holy Ghost has no chance to warn and work upon the people, with its "still small voice," because the preacher, with his "sounding" tones and "tinkling" sentences, is so conspicuous. Instead of hiding behind the Cross, and presenting the Gospel in its purity and holiness, he comes out as Trojan Alexander came out before his host, clothed in a panther's skin and striding lion-like, expecting to see his enemy cower and tremble at his fearful presence. Instead of preaching the perfections of God, and his plan of redemption, he preaches rhetoric and scientific composition. Instead of relying upon the instructions of the Bible and the energies of the Holy Ghost, he relies upon the instructions of the schoolmaster, and the energies of his own intellect. Instead of trying to please God and win souls to Christ, he aims to please the multitude, and win the best places in the Conference.

When he should cauterize, he coaxes. When he should administer a bitter potion, he gives a sugar plum; when he should point his finger to a man in his congregation, he points to a fly upon the wall. In short, it is a time-serving performance, from the flaring prologue to the fying peroration.

I do not say how much of such preaching there is, but I do say there is too much of it; and I am right if there is any.

We have reason to thank the Lord in and around Summerfield that he has sent us a different ministration this year—a minister full of his mission, abounding in the love of God, and eloquent with the sentiments of the Holy Ghost. Should this meet the eye of Bro. C*, we hope he will not lay the flattering unction to his heart that it is with his altogether we are so much pleased, but rather with the "glad tidings of great joy" of which he is the willing and useful interpreter. He has but one reason to feel truly heaved, and that is, that God has selected him as the channel through which to pour out a flood of light upon some portions of a darkened world.

We believe him to be one of the most powerful and efficient instruments of God within the bounds of the Alabama Conference. I judge not so much by a close criticism of his performance, as by the immediate and subsequent results of it. When I go to hear him preach, he seldom lets me off without the tribute of a tear—aye, many tears—to his holy message; and I have observed that he often exacts the same thing from his whole congregation, saint and sinner. It is from the fullness of his heart that he preaches, and from the fullness of their hearts his hearers respond.

Bro. C. is not polished, nor graceful, but rather rough, and somewhat rude. If by this, however, he reminds you of the rugged mountain cliff, the similitude does not cease when you contemplate the mountain's dark sublimity. His want of polish is more than compensated by his power. Evil, in his view, (so it would seem) has taken deep root all over this fair heritage of ours; and not only taken deep root, but sprung up, in giant forms, and forest-like overshadowed the land. This forest is to be felled. To meet the exigency, he goes not forth in gloves and silks, with golden hatchet and silver saw; but with brawny arms and upturned sleeves he shoulders the woodman's axe, and goes right earnestly to work. We believe all this is the result of the Holy Ghost working in our good brother, "to will and to do of his own good pleasure." Glory be to God, and success to the minister of his own sending!

We have become deeply attached to Bro. C. here, and we are grieved and sad that his health is not good—that his arduous labors are fast wearing him out. The power of God working within frail humanity often proves to much for it. Nor is it wonderful that the fire of the Holy Ghost, burning brightly within so weak a vessel, should soon melt it down. We hope, if the Conference can do any thing to lighten Bro. C.'s labors, it will, at its next session.

There is one more item I might mention. The missionary spirit never burned so brightly as now. Bro. C. has reached to the very bottom of our pockets, every time he has made a collection. Our circuit will send to the next Conference at least three, and I think four dollars, where she usually sends one. With great respect, yours, etc.,

A LAYMAN.

GERMAN MISSION CHURCH.

MACON COUNTY, Ala., Aug. 18.

BROTHER MCTYEIRE: In company with Bro. Garrett I went from Warrior Stand camp meeting to Mount Zion meeting-house, on Crawford Circuit, to a quarterly meeting. Thursday and Friday belonged to the colored people. Their masters gave them these days for a jubilee, which was turned to a two days' meeting for them. We preached to them, held a love feast, and administered the Lord's Supper to them. A large number attended. I was very much pleased with the good order that prevails among them, as also with the decent appearance they made. All were cleanly dressed in good clothing, and looking happy and well. If any taint of abolitionism had still lingered in my mind, it would have been dispelled at this meeting. I was much interested at their love feast; many spoke of their masters and mistresses in the highest terms of love and attachment. Some said that they had a good old master gone to Heaven, and they expected to meet him there. If these good brethren that hold this large community of servants dont earn the love and regard of the people in the North, they have the love of their servants, as also their willing obedience.

On Saturday and Sunday, large congregations of white people filled the house. On Sunday afternoon they held their missionary meeting. I was called on to make a speech, and at the close of the meeting subscriptions were taken up, which, in connection with the general collection, amounts to $121 12, all of which was directed to our Mission Church. Thus, you see, I am doing a little for our German mission cause. I am treated with much kindness by this kind-hearted and hospitable people. I am unable even to express my gratitude. May the Lord reward them and bless them abundantly! I have fallen so much in love with this people and country, that I should like to stay here and spend the remainder of my life among them. I have not been idle since I left New Orleans, but am constantly employed in traveling and preaching.

I am now at Enon, lodged very comfortably at Father Bank's house, and am sharing the kind hospitality of this lovely family. To-morrow evening commences a camp meeting, which I am invited to attend. I hope to have an opportunity of doing more for our Mission Church.

My health is good, and even much better than when I left the city. The kindness of friends, and the traveling about in a healthy country, is well calculated to brace up a melancholy mind and a feeble body. I believe that this is one of the healthiest parts of country for and near. Doctors have very little or nothing to do, except what they do in their rich cotton fields.

The preachers are generally engaged in their work, holding protracted and camp meetings. The Methodist community up this way are going in for camp meetings, and that in the good old Methodistic style. Now and then I hear the complaint of coldness and lukewarmness in the Church, but on the whole, religion is making progress, and is prospering through this country.

I do not know the precise time when I shall be able to return to the city; but if I am to follow out the plan of the brethren here, it will not be before November. I shall soon write again to let you know of my success. Pray for me, that I may be able to live holy, and to order all my conversation aright.

I am, dear brother, your humble brother in Christ Jesus, JOHN M. HOPER.

TUSKEGEE, Aug. 27.

REV. H. N. MCTYEIRE:

My Dear Brother—Having a few spare hours, I will endeavor to improve them in writing you a few lines, and if you will be so kind as to straighten them up so that they can make a decent appearance in the Advocate, I will be very thankful to you.

My last was dated from Enon. From that place I went to a camp meeting, which was held on Chunenuggee Ridge, six miles from Enon. It commenced on the 19th and terminated the 25th. It was a refreshing time, from the presence of the Lord, for the Church here. I met many of God's servants here, and shall ever rejoice of having been favored to make the acquaintance of so many pious and talented ministers of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. There were no less than thirty on the ground—local and traveling preachers. I also was privileged to meet with a hospitable and zealous community of Methodists in this part of the country. This was one of the most quiet camp meetings I have ever attended—no disorder or disturbance occurred of any kind.

On last Sunday a missionary meeting was held, at which it was proposed to raise $2000—$1000 for a missionary to California, $500 for our German Mission Church in Orleans, and $500 for colored missions.

The California mission came first before the congregation, with its able and eloquent speaker, Dr. Block. After the Doctor had delivered a heart-stirring address, the call for $1000 was promptly responded to; but by this time my faith for our German cause became little indeed. However, I arose and made some abrupt remarks; after which Dr. Ellison made a short but impressive speech in behalf of our German missions, and then all my doubts of success were instantly dispelled by seeing the sum of $550 made up for our Missionary Church in Orleans, without any difficulty whatever.

In the afternoon, Dr. Dawson addressed the congregation in behalf of the colored missions, and then $500 more were raised. This is doing things by the whole, and not by halves. I have often been at missionary meetings where the congregations have been much larger, but such a display of missionary zeal and liberality I have never seen before. Brother Armstrong, the P. Elder, had charge of the camp meeting, and all belongs to Eufaula District. He assisted me much.

At all the places where I have visited yet, I have found warm friends and liberal hearts, and especially so on Chunenuggee Ridge. May God bless this dear people. I consider it a high privilege of being honored to travel through this country as a Methodist preacher, in the Church, South. If my mind ever was prejudiced against this Church, it was because I knew no better. This I write with an honest, upright heart. I am sorry, from the bottom of my heart, that this noble, generous people in the South is so often misrepresented. If I have one wish above another it would be this, that I might be permitted to stay here and spend the remainder of my days in this country in the service of God.

If I meet with similar success at other places, we will be able in a short time to erect our Mission Church in Orleans. O, how my heart rejoices at the prospect of seeing at last the long-wished and long-sought object accomplished. I call this a new era in the history of our German missions in N. Orleans. Only let the Church help us in building good houses of worship, and God by his assisting grace will help us to fill them with precious, immortal souls, for whom Jesus has died.

Suppose they allow me, at the next Conference session, to take a transfer to Alabama Conference? A mission among the blacks is as lofty a station as I could desire. What say you? But then the German missions lay near and dear to my heart; and if it cost my life in the city I am willing to lay it down so I finish my course and run the race that is set before me. J. M. HOPER.

THE SABBATH SCHOOL LESSON.

BY LIZZIE LAWRENCE.

"Well, children," said Mrs. Grny, to her little daughters, "what was your lesson about this morning, at the Sabbath school?"

"About Ephesus, the Ephesians, and the great temple of Diana," said Sarah.

"Yes," said Lelia, "it was about all that; but I do not know much more about it now than I did before. I wish you would tell me something about Ephesus, Ma; I want to understand it better. The girls said it was a pretty lesson, and Miss Winslow talked at a great rate about ruins, colonnades, temples, jackals and the Christian faith, and much more that I do not remember; but for my life I can not see it has any thing to do with the lesson."

It was evident Lelia was out of humor. Her lesson that morning was recited badly, and she blamed her teacher more than herself for the failure.

Mrs. Gray saw the difficulty, and in her own quiet way she tried to restore Lelia to her usual good temper. This she knew could be done by making her think of what she had learned. "Now, Lelia," continued she, "tell me where Ephesus is, or rather where it was."

"Ephesus," said Lelia, promptly, "was a flourishing, populous town in a Roman province, in Asia Minor. It was a town of wealth and contained many inhabitants, and besides, it was a place of resort to the people of all the world, who came to trade and worship at the great temple of Diana."

"Very well," said Mrs. Gray, "now tell me something about Diana."

"Diana," said Lelia, with some hesitancy, "was by the ancients known as the goddess of hunting, chastity, and——"

"And," continued Mrs. Grny, "the Ephesians being an idolatrous people, they placed the image of this goddess, which was made of ebony, in the temple that bore her name, and which was ranked as one of the seven wonders of the world. This temple was two hundred and twenty years in being built; was four hundred and twenty feet long, two hundred and twenty broad, and was supported by one hundred and twenty-seven pillars, each pillar the gift of a king; it was also handsomely adorned with beautiful statues."

"Great indeed was the temple of Diana," said Lelia. "But how, ma, came this great temple in ruins?"

"It was burned three different times," said Mrs. Gray. "First on the day Socrates was poisoned; the second on the night Alexander the Great was born; and the last time by an edict of Constantine the Great, who, being a Christian, commanded all heathen temples to be demolished, and now the site of this famous temple can not be found by the modern traveler."

"Those shrines, ma, what were they?"

"They are supposed to be representations of the temple made of silver, which those who came from a distance to worship would purchase, and keep not only as an object of worship, but as an ornament of beautiful workmanship. As Demetrius and his fellow craftsmen made great gain by selling these shrines, it was to their interest, you see, to raise the great outcry, for fear that gain should be lost."

"But still," said Lelia, "I can not see any just reason why the city should go into ruins. Parts of it are now under a marsh, and it is not all inhabited but by wild animals."

"Examine a little more closely," said Mrs. Gray, "and you will see. St. Paul continued three years in this city, preaching the gospel of our Saviour. Many believed, and a flourishing Christian church was established there. After he left, he wrote that beautiful letter, known as the Epistle to the Ephesians, the design of which is to establish, both in the doctrines taught them, to give them exalted views of God, and of the exceeding and dignity of our Saviour. Now if we refer to Revelations, we find St. John addressing the angel of the Church of Ephesus (i. e. the pastor) and the believers, because they had left off their first love. The Church continued flourishing for a time, we may suppose they profited by the warning, but finally declined, and the candlestick was removed, i. e. those Christians that were in the Church were left to the mysterious watchfulness of their Lord. Ephesus, and the country once peopled by early Christians, were overrun by the Mahomedens and the worshipers of the false prophet. No vestige of the temple that Demetrius was afraid would come into disrepute can now with certainty be found. Yet the Ephesians are numbered with things of the past, while Christianity, promulgated by the Saviour and preached by St. Paul, is still gathering strength, and will roll onward with immortal vigor, until every nation shall drink of its peaceful and life-giving streams. In the lesson before us we see the watchful care of God over the Church, his faithfulness in performing his promises, and finely exhibits the triumph of the true over a false religion."

Lelia listened to her ma with fixed attention, then in low murmur, as if to herself she said, "It is a pretty lesson; I can think of all Mr. Stephens said about the ruins of Ephesus; but in school this morning I could think of nothing. I wish teachers——"

"Could keep their scholars in a good humor," said Mrs. Gray, laughing.

Sarah, who was older than Lelia, now subdued by what she had heard; but after a pause, she said, "What a beautiful view we have holy religion this opens to us. If I am not fully convinced of its Divine origin, I should now say, I am not only almost, altogether a Christian."

COMMERCIAL STATEMENT

For the Year 1851-'52.

The year that has elapsed since the date of our last annual statement has been one of great activity in all branches of business throughout the United States, and we believe, of unexampled prosperity in all the commercial States in Europe and America. One of the leading causes of this condition of commercial affairs is the vast yield of the precious metals by the California mines, the products of which are scattered with a remarkable equality of distribution throughout the country among all classes, of our country, and through many portions of Europe. Thus, what were luxuries to many classes but a short time since, are now mere comforts, and what is to be found throughout the land. Prices have generally advanced as money became abundant and consumption increased; always being ruled, however, by the extent of supplies; and for some articles the great increases of domestic production, in our markets, have prohibited an upward tendency in the rates. The exceptions, however important, are few and accounted for. Extensive systems of internal improvement have given additional employment and increased compensation to the mechanic and the laborer, and there are few that remain idle, or poorly paid. In our own city and State the spirit of enterprise has carried every thing before it during the short year closed. Internal improvement Conventions have been held together in our Municipal Hall the oldest and most patriotic spirited men of the South, and systems of roads stretching far to the North, and into the South-west, have not only been projected, but the means have been provided to carry out the plans, and their construction no longer doubtful. The election which has been placed upon our enterprise by the present Constitution of the State, are, we confidently hope, about to be taken, for the adoption of a liberal organic law which has been revised by a State Convention composed of men chosen by their fellow-citizens as most worthy to be entrusted with so important a charge. The vote of the people upon the new Constitution is to be taken on the first Monday in November of the present year. Hardly a question can be raised of its adoption, by the popular voice, can exist. The absolute necessity for the changes involved in some of the provisions is so obvious, that the fact of its possessing many objectionable features cannot but fail to produce any very serious opposition to the instrument, as a whole. Succeeding this great measure, in point of time, and scarcely of little less importance to this city, was adopted, by the people, to the consolidation of the three Municipalities under one responsible government, and the annexation of the City of Lafayette to NewOrleans. The action of the business community, with regard to these measures, has given confidence to men in our midst, merchants at a distance and abroad, at home and abroad, a degree of confidence that all these classes have entertained for many years past. One of the first acts of the new City Government was to provide for the payment of the debts contracted by the municipalities in past years, many of which were illegal and under protest. Another was to authorize the issue of dollars to the NewOrleans and Jackson Railroad, one million six hundred thousand to the Pontchartrain and Opelousas Railroad. The feeling of the people was shown by the vote ratifying this subscription, and also by a very heavy tax upon real estate for its payment, a most unpopular measure, but one which has had a most decided effect upon capitalists. The old unsatisfactory evidences of debt were converted into new ones, which, representing $2,000,000, at six per cent., were placed in the market in NewYork. Nearly all our citizens themselves, including many of our most business men, the whole amount was taken by the house, at a handsome fraction above par. In brief, the facts that we have thus briefly touched upon, are all of equal significance, but of minor interest, to the limits will barely permit us to refer, we think the prospects of NewOrleans were never brighter for the opening of this new commercial year. There is reason to expect abundant crops of every description American produce during the next year, while an abundant supply of the precious metals will have effect to increase the demand proportionately. To this, the recent accounts from Great Britain, in anticipation that the crops there will be short of the deficiency. Cotton, the article which is the basis in commerce, as receives the greatest influence from the motion of peaceful relations between the United States and Europe, has been produced during the past season without parallel in commercial history. Thus far, the crop of 1852-'53 promises to be equally large. It is yet, however, entirely too early to make calculations in this regard. The crops of Tobacco and Sugar have also been unusually large. Owing to this increase in the supply of all these staples have averaged considerably less than they were during the preceding year, though in January last the rates for Cotton have since declined, the range of the market during the last month of the year has been and close at a considerable advance.

The following table will show the Receipts and Exports of the principal articles of domestic production at NewOrleans, during the last two years:

COTTON—The Cotton crop for the year 1851-'52 exceeded 3,000,000 bales, of which large quantities still have found a market, or an outlet, at this port. The 1,430,103 bales received, 37,455 were brought from ports in Alabama, Florida and Texas, and are not included for in the Cotton Statements of those ports as received. These deducted, we find the receipts proper to be 1,392,650 bales. The exports of the year amount to 1,433,961 bales, of which 777,251 bales were shipped to Great Britain, 106,304 to France, 70,000 to the North of Europe, 133,530 to other foreign ports, and 258,542 to the Northern and Western markets of the United States. The stock remaining on hand at all ports, including all in process and platforms, and on the not cleared, was 9632 bales. The receipts proper at this port for the year ending 1st Sept. 1853, were 950,220 bales. The exports were 907,458 bales, and the stock remaining on hand 15,390 bales. The increase in the receipts proper for this year over the last, is thus shown to be 42,430 bales; and in the exports 438,503 balen, while the stock remaining on hand is 5858 bales less than that on hand at the close of last year. The first bale of the crop of 1852-53 was received on the 1st of August, one week later than the receipt of the first bale of the crop of 1851-52. The total receipts of the new crop up to last evening were 4965 bales, against 8772 bales to the close of the preceding year.

The year opened with a declining Cotton market, the downward tendency having prevailed during a period of eight months, and prices having fallen from 14¼ to 9¾¢ ₱ lb for Fair. The rates continued to decline during September and October, and on the 1st of November we quoted Middling at 6¾@7, Good Middling 7¼@7½, Middling Fair 7½@7¾, and Fair 8¾@8½¢ ₱ lb, establishing a decline during the first two months of the year, of 10¼¢ ₱ lb. Prices rallied slightly in November, but not of again during the following month, and on the 1st of January our quotations for Middling were 6¾@7½, and for Fair 8@8¾¢. During the month, however, they recovered nearly ½¢ ₱ lb, and remained rather steady until the 1st of May, the better qualities showing a gradual improvement, and the market closing with April very firm for all grades. An upward and rapid movement followed, and on the 1st of June we quoted Middling at 9¾@9¾, and Good Middling at 9¾@10¼. Prices since have mostly ranged within those figures, but with a degree of irregularity that has rendered quotations nearly nominal. At the close of the year we quote as follows:

The Tobacco market, like that for Cotton, opened, at the beginning of the year just closed, with a downward tendency in prices, consequent upon the improved appearance of the crop. On the 1st of September our quotations were, for Lugs 3¾@5¼, Inferior to Common 5¼@6¾, Fair to Fine 6¾@7¾, Choice and Selections 7¾@8¾ ₱ lb. During this month there was but little alteration in these rates, though they were rather feeble, but before the end of October they declined ¾¢ ₱ lb. The downward tendency continued with very slight fluctuations during the next six months, and in the beginning of May our quotations were, for Lugs 2@3¾, Inferior to Common 3¾@4½, Fair to Fine 4¼@4¾, Choice and Selections 5@5¾¢ ₱ lb, showing a decline, since the beginning of the commercial year, of 2@3¾¢ ₱ lb. This was the lowest point reached during the year. At the close of the month of May an advance of ¼@½¢ had been established on the lower qualities, and ¾@1¢ on the finer ones. The improving tendency has since been well sustained, and at the close of the year we quote Lugs 3@4½, Inferior to Common 4¾@5¼, Fair to Fine 5½@6, and Choice and Selections 5¾@7¾¢ ₱ lb. Mason County has generally ranged at 4@8 and 8¾¢ ₱ lb.

The fluctuations in the price of Sugar have been much greater during this year than the year previous, and have reached a much lower point. At the opening of the year we quoted Fair at 6¾@6¾¢ ₱ lb, from which the rates gradually fell off until February, on the 1st of which month the quotation for Fair was 3½@4¾ ₱ lb. Since that date, however, a steady improvement has prevailed, and at the close of the year we quote as follows: Common 4½@5½, Fair 5½@6, Prime and Choice 6¾@6¾¢ ₱ lb. The following are the rates for Fair on the 1st of each month during the year:

September	5½@6¼	January	3¾@4¾	May	4¾@4¾
October	5¼@6¼	February	3¾@3¾	June	4¾@4¾

MOLASSES—The receipts of Molasses from the Interior during the year have been 220,014 bbls, against 185,217 last year, and 190,206 the year before. The exports have been 92,118 bbls, against 68,940 last year, and 111,990 the year previous.

Prices have generally ranged considerably lower than during the preceding year, the following being our quotations for Prime Rebolled on the 1st of each month of the year just closed. The rate to-day is 26@28¾ ₱ gallon:

September	36@39	January	20@20½	May	26@28
October	36@39	February	21@21	June	26½@27½
November	34@35	March	20@24½	July	24@26

FLOUR—The receipts of Flour during the year have been 928,184 bbls, against 929,250 last year, and 575,100 the year before. The exports have been 539,280 bbls, against 575,000 last year, and 218,340 the year previous.

Notwithstanding the fact shown above that the receipts of Flour during the last two years have been nearly equal—the excess, if any, being with 1850-51—prices have ruled considerably lower during the last, than the preceding year. The following table shows the prices of Superfine Ohio and St. Louis on the 1st of each month during the year, and we quote, at the close, the former at $3 87½@$4 00, and the latter at $4 12½@$4 25, extra and choice brands ranging 50¢@$1 ₱ bbl above these rates.

CORN—There has been a small increase in the receipts of Corn during the year, the total arrivals amounting to 1,392,400 sacks, against 1,253,850 last year, and 1,175,220 the year before. The exports have been 875,974 sacks, against 523,300 last year, and 450,000 the year previous. The past year has not exhibited such remarkable fluctuations in the rates of Corn, as did the preceding one. Prices have not touched either of the extremes that we then noticed, these extremes being, in 1850-51, 30 and 90¢ ₱ bushel. The average of the rates, however, has been lower. The following table will show the prices of Mixed Corn on the 1st of each month during the year. The closing rates are 55@57¢ ₱ bushel:

September	41@ 43	January	56@ 56	May	46@ 48

PORK—The "Hog crop" for the year has been a short one, as our Western friends very early in the year informed us would be the case. Yet the falling off has hardly been so great as many were led by their representations to suppose it would be. During the last two years, except for a short period early in the present year, we have had a constantly advancing market, and prices have gone up since the 1st of September, 1850, at an average of more than half a dollar per month per bbl. The price of Mess, on the above date in this market, was $10 25@$10 50 ₱ bbl. To-day the price is $21 50@$22 00 ₱ bbl.

The receipts of Pork during the year have been 279,416 bbls, against 310,400 last year, and 543,740 the year before. The exports have been 169,485 bbls, against 193,600 last year, and 405,500 the year previous. The following are the rates for Mess on the 1st of each month during the year just closed:

Sept	$16 00@16 50	Jan	$14 00@14 50	May	$17 25@17 50
Oct	15 50@15 75	Feb	14 75@15 25	June	18 00@18 50
Nov	15 50@16 00	March	14 75@15 00	July	20 00@21 00
Dec	15 75@16 00	April	18 25@16 75	August	21 00@21 00

BEEF—The receipts of Beef for the year have been 43,106 bbls, and 10,070 hhds and tierces, against last year 34,807 bbls and 12,156 hhds and tierces, and the year before 52,070 bbls and 14,500 hhds and tierces. The exports have been 38,040 bbls, against last year 41,750, and the previous year 55,270.

Although the supply of Beef has exceeded that of last year, the average price has been considerably higher, though the difference is not nearly so great as was observable in the Pork market. The price for Mess in the beginning of the year, was $14 00@$15 00, but during October and November it fell off to $13 00@$14 00. It has subsequently fluctuated a little, but during the past two months the rates have been rather steady at $14 00@$15 00 ₱ bbl for large and small lots, at which the year closes.

LARD—The article of lard for the year have been slightly in excess of those of last year, but largely below those of 1849-50. They are 124,748 bbls and tierces, and 160,010 kegs, against last year 113,860 of the former, and 148,210 of the latter, and the previous year 218,170 and 236,200 respectively. The exports have been equal to 790,390 kegs, against last year 735,700, and the year previous 1,554,849 kegs.

Prices ruled high at the beginning of the year, as they had done for five or six months previously, and continued, to do throughout September, though in October they declined 2½¢ ₱ lb. In November the rates further gave way ½¢ for bbls and tierces, and 1½¢ ₱ lb for kegs, and the remainder of the old crop was sold at this decline. The new crop came into the market in January at 8½¢, and 9¼¢ for prime in bbls and kegs, and up to the 1st of June improved ¾@1¢ ₱ lb on those rates. The tendency has since been upward, and at the close of the year we quote prime, in bbls and tierces, at 12½@12¾, and in kegs at 12¾@13¢ ₱ lb. The following table will show the rates for prime in bbls and tierces and in kegs, on the 1st of each month during the year:

Sept	10¾ and 12½	Jan	8 and 8½	May	9¾ and 9¾

BACON—The receipts of assorted Bacon during the year amount to 47,952 hhds and casks, and 3490 bbls and boxes, against last year 40,150 of the former, and 8750 of the latter; and 39,200, and 29,210 respectively, the year previous. The receipts of Hams have been 39,075 hhds and tierces, against 44,320 last year, and 20,100 the year before. The exports have embraced 49,788 hhds and casks of assorted Bacon and Hams, against 47,090 the year before, and 64,929 the year previous.

The year opened with high rates in the Bacon market, the range in September being 8¾@9¾ for Shoulders, and 11¾@12¾ ₱ lb for Sides. In November Sides fell off to 6¾, while Shoulders remained nearly steady, but in December both articles declined, and on the 1st of January we quoted them respectively at 7½ and 8¾¢ ₱ lb. The tendency from that time was upward, with some fluctuation in May, and for a few days in August holders realized 8¾ and 11¢. These extreme rates have not, however, been sustained, and our quotations, at the close of the year, are 8¾@8¾¢ for Shoulders, and 10@10¾¢ ₱ lb for Sides. We subjoin the rates for Shoulders and Sides on the 1st of each month during the year:

Sept	9 and 10	Jan	7¾ and 8¾	May	8¾ and 9¾
Oct	8¾ and 11¾	Feb	7 and 8¾	June	7 and 9¾
Nov	8¾ and 11	March	7¾ and 9	July	8¾ and 10
Dec	8¾ and 9¾	April	7½ and 8¾	August	8¾ and 10

HEMP—The receipts of the year are 12,414 bales, against 25,403 last year, and 34,792 the year before. The exports are 15,817 bales, against 22,104 last year.

The transactions of the year in this market have been on the most limited scale, and our quotations for several months past have been nominal at $80@$88 ₱ ton.

LEAD—The receipts of Lead during the year embrace 205,114 pigs, against 321,420 last year, and 414,850 the year before. The exports 251,040 pigs, against 306,400 last year, and 410,120, the year previous. The receipts, in round numbers, during the last ten years have been as follows—during which period a remarkable falling off has been exhibited:

Years.	Pigs.	Years.	Pigs.	Years.	Pigs.
1843-44	572,000	1846-47	650,000	1849-50	415,110
1843-44	582,000	1847-48	460,000	1850-51	320,000
1844-45	730,000	1848-49	408,800	1851-52	205,000
1845-46	788,000

A writer in Bellow's Commercial Review states the products of the Upper Mines, received at St. Louis, for about the same time, to have been as follows:

Years.	Pigs.	Years.	Pigs.	Years.	Pigs.
1845	473,649	1848	732,443	1849	625,560
1846	884,931	1847	802,886	1850	537,439
1844	6,360	1849	687,969	1851	540,000
1843	516,000

There is no means to ascertain the exact product of the Lower Mines, but they may be estimated at 150,000 pigs annually.

Our port has been used as a depot, rather than a market, for Lead, and the sales during the last two years have been on a most limited scale. For months together we have not had a transaction to report. Still, it forms an item of considerable importance in the business of the city. It furnishes a fair quota of employment to our steamboat men and draymen, commissions to our merchants and freights to our shipping. The few sales of the year have been made at $3 75@$4 55 ₱ 100 lb, the latter rate being our nominal quotation, for Lower Mines, at the close.

COFFEE—According to the annual Coffee Statement of Mr. H. T. Londsdale, the direct imports of Rio Coffee, during the year ending on the 1st of July last, were 325,051 bags, against 276,247 the year before, and 220,258 in 1849-'50. We also received this last year 84,821 bags Rio coastwise, making a total of Rio of 360,778. Mr. Londsdale states the sales for consumption in 1851-'52 at 373,276, for 1850-'51 at 345,781, and for 1849-'50 at 263,415.

The total exports from Rio de Janeiro from 1st May, 1851, to 1st May, 1852, were 1,525,770 bags, against 1,043,400 bags during the previous twelve months, being a decrease of 117,717 bags.

The exports from Rio to all ports in the United States from 1st May, 1851, to 1st May, 1852, were 907,424 bags, against 777,224 bags for the same period previous year, being an increase of 130,200 bags.

The stock of Rio Coffee at all the importing ports of the United States on 30th June, 1852, was estimated by Mr. Londsdale at 130,000 bags, same period previous year 67,000 bags, leaving a decrease of 63,000 bags; from which it is ascertained that the quantity taken for consumption in the United States for the past year, is about 845,000 bags.

The direct imports of Rio Coffee at this port for the year just closed, are 343,033 bags, against 271,870 last year, and 224,811 the year before. The following table shows the range of prices on the 1st of each month during the past year. Our quotations, at the close of the year, are 8¼@8¾¢ ₱ lb:

September	8¾@8¾	January	12¾@13¾	May	9 @9¾
October	8 @8	February	11¾@12¾	June	9 @9¼
November	8¾@9¼	March	11¾@12¾	July	8¾@9
December	8½@9	April	9 @9	August	8¾@8¾

BAGGING AND BALE ROPE—The receipts of the year comprise 58,400 pieces of Bagging, and 90,411 coils Bale Rope, against last year 70,014 of the former, and 105,220 of the latter, and 58,100 pieces and 85,950 coils the year before.

We give below the ruling rates of both articles on the 1st of each month during the past year, at the close of which we quote Power-loom Bagging at 13¾@13¾¢, and No. 1 Rope at 9¼¢:

Sept	14 and 6¾	Jan	12¾ and 6¾	May	12½ and 8
Oct	14 and 6¾	Feb	13¾ and 6¾	June	12½ and 8¾

Dec	12½ and 6¾	April	13¾ and 6¾	August	13 and 8

EXCHANGE—The Exchange market has exhibited a degree of steadiness throughout the year as will be seen by the following table of rates for Sterling Bills on the 1st of each month. One quotations at the close are 110@110¾ for bills on London, 5f. 12½¢@5f. 15c on Paris, ¾@1¾ ₱ ct. discount for 60 days, and par@¾ ₱ ct. premium for sight, bills on New York:

FREIGHTS—The Freight market has presented none of the buoyancy that was observable in the preceding year—and the range of rates has been uniformly low. The following table shows the rates for Cotton to Liverpool on the 1st of each month during the year, and we quote the closing rates at ¾d for Cotton and 50s for Tobacco for Liverpool; ⅞¢ for Cotton and $7 00@$7 50 for Tobacco for Havre, and $1 25 ₱ bale for Cotton, and $3 00 ₱ hhd for Tobacco for New York:

SETTING GLASS WITHOUT PUTTY.—The method of setting glass without putty is recently invented. The following: The window sash is made entirely of wood, the outside permanent. The inside is framed in such a manner that the parts can be readily removed, for the purpose of inserting the glass, which is placed between slips of India rubber, which, when the parts of the sash are replaced, causes the glass to be perfectly firm. The moveable parts of the sash are secured to their place by a knob screw which make a pretty finish. The advantages of this method of setting glass must be obvious upon a moment's reflection.

EARTHQUAKE.—The shock of an earthquake was felt in Augusta, Ga., about twenty minutes before three o'clock on the morning of the 25th ult. The vibrations were sensibly felt, and several persons in the city were so started as to run out of their houses into the open air. The noise and vibrations lasted about six seconds. The editor of the Constitutionalist says he is certain as to the time, but the foreman of that printing office says he distinctly felt vibrations at half-past one o'clock. There were probably several shocks.

THE LOCK OF MR. HOBBS IN ENGLAND.—The London correspondent of the Philadelphia American states that Bramah's celebrated prize lock has been withdrawn from public view. It will be remembered that Mr. Hobbs succeeded in picking this lock, and that he received a reward of two hundred guineas for his skill. The Messrs. Bramah made some alterations and improvements in the lock, and again placed it in the window in Piccadilly, with the original offer of the reward appended to it. It remained in their window a few days, when a report reached the Messrs. Bramah that Mr. Hobbs intended to try his luck a second time. The lock was immediately removed, and has not since been seen. The writer adds:

"Hobbs' patent American lock is being manufactured at Birmingham, Sheffield, Wolverhampton, and in London, in large numbers, and of all sizes, and at prices ranging from six shillings to fifty pounds each. In a few days the office of 'Hobbs' American Lock Company' will be opened in Cheapside, for the sale of these American locks. The Bank-lock, price fifty pounds, has already been placed on the vaults of the Bank of England, the East India Company, and several private banking establishments in the city."

MARRIAGE BY PROXY.—We find the following notice of a marriage, by proxy, in the Washington National Intelligencer:

"Married, at the Spanish Legation, on Tuesday morning, August 10, by the Right Rev. Dr. McGill, Bishop of Richmond, Jose Maria de Mogollon y Cemiquano, of Madrid, present by his proxy, the Spanish Minister, to Aggrippina, third daughter of Alexander Norman Macleod, late of Harris, Scotland."

THE EARTHQUAKE AT AUGUSTA.—The Auguste (Ga.) Constitutionalist gives the following particulars of the earthquake which was recently experienced in that place and vicinity:

The vibrations were sensibly felt, and several persons in the city were so startled as to run out of their houses into the open air. We were awakened from a sound sleep by the rattling of the windows of our dwelling, and by a faint, dull, rumbling noise of distant thudee. We awoke with the impression that some one was beating at the back door of the story below for admission, but almost instantly became satisfied that it was an earthquake. After the noise and vibrations, which lasted about six seconds, ceased, we arose and looked first at the Southern portion of the heavens. The stars were shining brightly and tranquilly, the air was still, and the sky in that direction was suffused with a delicate roseate tint. We went immediately to the adjoining room and looked to the Northeastern sky. It wore the ordinary appearance of a cloudless heaven.

As we referred to our watch a very few minutes afterwards, we speak with certainty as to the time. The foreman of our office, however, is very positive that he felt vibrations which he says seemed to be from South to North, and heard the rumbling noise of an earthquake about half after one o'clock. He left the printing rooms at ten minutes after one, and had retired to his room and to bed, on the opposite side of the street, but a few minutes, and before he went to sleep the shock occurred. If so, there were certainly two shocks at least, which is highly probable. We believe it is the uniform custom of earthquakes to notify their existence by repeated shocks. We await with much interest, details from other and distant portions of the country.

INUNDATION AT AUGUSTA—Loss of Life at West Pascagoula.—The Mobile Tribune learns from a correspondent that the late storm raged at West Pascagoula with great violence. The wharves, bath-houses, and out-houses of all descriptions were carried away, and nearly all the Seed old casks, which added so much to the beauty of the place, were laid low by the tempest. Two white men, whose names were not learned, were killed by the falling of a tree.

At Montgomery, Alabama, on the 31st, a dispatch was received from Augusta, Ga., stating that the town was four feet under water. Two bridges had been washed away, and it was reported that property to the amount of a million of dollars had been destroyed.

The storm also raged at Columbus with great violence. The Enquirer of the 31st ult. says:

One of the heaviest rain storms that has been experienced about here lately, took place on the night of the 26th, by which all the streams near this place were so much swollen as to stop traveling for a day or so. The Chattahoochee river rose higher than it has been for several years, and we learn that the plantations below this place, lying near the river, have been almost wholly submerged, doing material injury to the growing crop thereon. The factories here were compelled to suspend operations, and the damage some of them may have received is yet not known correctly.

On the Muscogee railroad, the cars went out on Saturday morning, and nineteen miles below the city the conductor found a part of a bridge had been carried away by the rise of a creek. On returning with the train, when within seven miles of town, a part of the embankment was found missing, which had slid off with the track since the cars had passed over. Everything, however, is righted at present, and the cars are running as usual.

The Pensacola Gazette of the 28th ult. has the following:

On Tuesday last there commenced one of the most severe storms that we have witnessed for many years. The wind, at first easterly, gradually shifted round, first southerly, then westerly. Wednesday and Thursday, the wind blew steadily, with tremendous force, and the rain fell in great quantities. From two-thirds to three-fourths of the main wharf was carried away—leaving only the outer end remaining. All the bathing houses have been swept away. We have not heard of much damage having been done to shipping, but fear that we may yet hear of many wrecks upon our coast.

AN INCIDENT.—A passenger who was on the ill-fated steamer Henry Clay, relates the following incident connected with that sad disaster:

"He had been on the bow of the vessel, and was one of the first to escape. Upon reaching the shore, he counted twenty-three persons who sank to rise no more. He reckoned at the sight, and was just turning to leave the spot when he saw a little boy, only seven years of age, emerge from the smoke and flame on the after part of the promenade deck, kneel down and clasp his hands as if in prayer. He remained in this attitude but a moment, and then leaped into the water. Our informant watched the little fellow as he went under the water, expecting not to see him again. Presently the young hero rose to the surface, brushed aside his auburn ringlets, and struck out manfully for the shore, which he reached in a short time. Upon landing, he sat down upon the bank, exclaiming, 'Oh these poor people! I wish I could help them!' and then burst into a flood of tears at the awful scene of suffering and death before him. What a noble heart was in that boy, who, so young, could not only ask deliverance from danger of his Heavenly Father, but feel for the sufferings of others! Does it not also speak volumes in the praise of the mother of that boy!"

THE LATEST ACCOUNTS.—At one o'clock Friday the Advertiser issued an extra containing the following further particulars of this unparalleled tempest:

Friday, ten o'clock A. M.—The sun rose clear and bright this morning, but the desolation it revealed was sickening to behold.

On every hand are evidences of the dreadful struggle with the tempest. Of course the excitement among our citizens is very great, as incidents come in one after another swelling the already fearful catalogue of disaster and ruin. Below will be found such additional items as we have been able to gather.

Our reporter informs us that the Sea Drift and Mischief boat club houses, situated in the marsh opposite the city, have been carried off.

The houses of the Dutch settlers, numbering several families, who were employed in gardening in the marsh, are believed to be destroyed with their inmates. One man, whose name we did not learn, floated out upon a log, and was picked up. He states that his family were all drowned.

Brig Machigonno, lying at Government street wharf, with freight, having a large portion of her cargo, consisting of twenty-seven bales of cotton, upwards of 100 barrels of turpentine and ten tons of iron, on the wharf, was blown off, carrying most of the wharf holding the freight, with her. They remained together in the stream for about three hours, when they parted, and the wharf and freight floated down and lodged upon Pinto's Island, where it still remains. The vessel is not seriously injured.

The wharf-owners are the heaviest losers by this calamity. Most of the wharves are seriously injured, if not entirely destroyed. A large expenditure will be required to replace them in their former condition. The work of pulling apart, preparatory to re-building, has already commenced.

We hear that the bridges across Three-Mile Creek have been carried off. There are also reports of serious loss of life in that quarter, but the particulars have not reached us. Every hour increases the list of the dead and swell the amount the amount of property destroyed.

Twelve o'clock, M.—We have just returned from a visit to the overflowed district, and the prospect is even more gloomy than we supposed. The water has entirely receded, and left a picture of desolation beyond the power of language to portray. Water and Commerce streets are filled with hogsheads, barrels, boxes, and bales of every description. Damaged sugar, coffee, bacon, flour—indeed, goods of every description—line the streets, and the stores bordering them are undergoing the process of purification.

Front street is almost entirely barricaded. Logs, trees, merchandise, drift-wood, etc., are intermingled and piled up to the height of several feet. The deposit is much more offensive than we at first supposed, and the effluvia arising from this mass of decaying matter is almost stifling. We are glad to observe several hands at work removing these deposits, and we hope the number will be largely increased.

We have been shown a letter from Mr. Goodwin, the Engineer of the Mobile and Ohio Railroad, from which we are pleased to learn that the damage to the track is comparatively light, much less, indeed, than we feared. Mr. G. has been along the whole line since the storm, and reports that the damage can soon be repaired, and the track put in running order in four or five days. This will be most gratifying intelligence to our citizens, as it speaks highly for the durability and excellence of its construction.

We learn from a gentleman just from the bay, that not only the trees bordering the shore, but the bay road itself has been entirely removed. The waves now lash against the fences fronting buildings on the North side of the road. Thus has disappeared one of the most beautiful drives of which our city could boast. There seems to be no end to the tidings of destruction. The loss is not confined to business houses and business men. Numerous private dwellings have been seriously injured, to the extent of hundreds of dollars.

ARRIVAL OF THE JUNIOR—POINT CLEAR HOTEL SAFE—Half-past 12 o'clock.—The Junior has just arrived, and brings the gratifying intelligence of the safety of the inmates of the Point Clear Hotel. A load of anxious forebodings have thus been removed, and men breathe freer and look more hopefully upon the disaster.

The water at the Point came up to the porch of the main building, and the wharves, bath-houses and out-buildings of every description (the kitchen excepted) were carried away. The hotel has been closed for the season.

The same destruction marked the entire eastern shore—bath-houses, fish-houses, wharves, etc., etc., were scattered like playthings by the breath of the tempest.

Several thousand feet of lumber, deposited upon the wharf at Stark's mills, was lost with the wharf,

The steamers Daniel Pratt and Col. Clay, and two or three lighters, have gone to the aid of the stranded vessels in the bay.

The Advertiser of Saturday has the following additional particulars:

We conversed last evening with Mr. Freeman, of Hollywood, who states that the storm will occasion no serious interruption with the Eastern Shore. The bath-houses, etc., will soon be replaced, and by to-morrow a pier will be extended sufficiently to form a safe landing for passengers. The wharves will soon be rebuilt in the best manner. We are glad to learn this, for the closing of the Point Clear House will throw a good many out of supposed-to-be permanent summer quarters.

We shall soon begin to hear news from abroad; while we hope for the best, we fear the worst.

Eight P. M.—The steamer Daniel Pratt has just returned from Mobile Point. By a passenger on board of her, we learn that the schooner Eagle, from New Orleans, was lying, dismasted, above Dauphin Island.

Three schooners were soon off the Point the night preceding the height of the gale making eastward, but they have not since been seen. The rumor that the house on Send Island—this was not mentioned in our report—was carried off, is unfounded. The light-houses at Mobile and Choctaw Points were slightly injured.

MISSISSIPPI CITY.—There was a considerable destruction of property at this point, though fortunately no lives lost, that we could hear of. Among the houses blown down, were the carriage house, stables, and both houses of Mr Palfrey, cashier of the Branch Bank in this city. Venerable live oake that stood unscathed for centuries, were torn from their roots.

BILOXI.—The storm here, as at Mississippi City, raged with extraordinary violence. Houses and fences and trees were hurled about, and consternation for a time was the predominant feeling among the numerous families from this city that have summer dwellings at this point. There is no loss of life reported on shore, though great fears were entertained for the safety of numerous parties out on pleasure excursions. A party of seven left Biloxi on Tuesday on the little sloop Ringgold, on a pleasure trip to Horn Island. Nothing had been heard from them at Biloxi up to four o'clock yesterday afternoon.

HOLLYWOOD.—The Daphne Hotel and the Hollywood House escaped the tornado without suffering any material damage. The wharf, bath-houses, fish-houses, were, however, totally destroyed.

Loss of Life at East Pascagoula—Loss of Several Yachts with their Crews.

PASS CHRISTIAN, August 23.

Messrs. Editors—By the arrival of Mr. Cree's little steamer from Pascagoula, I learn that the late gale has been very destructive there to life and property.

On Tuesday night, the Oregon, for Mobile, landed several passengers at East Pascagoula wharf, but in consequence of the heavy wind and rain, they concluded to stay at the warehouse on the pier head until morning. After breakfast some of them who had families on shore started up the wharf and reached the shore in safety. About 11 o'clock, the gale increased, and in a few minutes the warehouse, pier-head and the entire wharf was swept away, together with the three persons who had remained in the warehouse. I could not learn their names, but understand that they were from New Orleans. The porter of Badeau's Hotel, a black man, who had just left the pier-head with a cart-load of baggage, was also blown from the wharf and drowned. Nearly all the large oaks in front of the (late) Hotel, were blown down and the bank washed away close up to the fence in front of the Hotel. Almost all the out-houses of the dwellings on the ... were blown down or unroofed. At West Pascagoula ... yacht "Manchac," whilst two of Mr. Cree's negro men were on board, for the ... pose of paying out more ... cable, to enable her to ride ... gently all night, sudden...

Heart-Rending Catastrophe—A Steamboat Run Down on Lake Erie—Three Hundred Lives Lost.

ERIE, August 20.

The steamer Atlantic came in collision with the propeller Ogdensburgh at two o'clock this morning, and sunk in about half an hour.

The loss of life from the Atlantic is estimated at 250 persons, while about a like number were taken on board the propeller, which was leaking badly, but they succeeded in reaching this port with her.

A dense fog prevailed at the time of the collision.

Captain Petly, of the Atlantic, is safe, but sustained some injury. The first mate was also saved.

The steamer Clayton has gone to the wreck.

All the passengers saved by the Ogdensburgh had nothing on but their night clothes.

The steamer kept on her course, the officers hoping to be able to reach port, although the boat was leaking badly; the water, however, gained rapidly on them, despite the efforts of the crew, and by the time they had proceeded about two miles from the spot where the collision took place, it was found that the vessel was rapidly sinking, the fires in the engine-room being extinguished by the water.

The emigrants, who could not understand a word spoken to them, by their cries and terror added to the horror of the scene.

A very dense fog prevailed at the time of the collision.

Immediately after the collision, which was very severe, the utmost confusion prevailed amongst the steerage and deck passengers, a very large portion of whom were Norwegian emigrants, and several, it is thought, in the terror and darkness that prevailed, jumped overboard at once.

Captain Petly, although seriously injured, with the assistance of the crew, endeavored to calm the fears of the passengers, assuring them that there was no danger.

The cabin passengers and all who could be made to understand, were exhorted by the captain and officers to remain calm, and provide themselves with chairs, settees, beds, etc., all of which were patent life preservers, and would buoy them up in the water. Numbers, however, unheeding, and not understanding the advice given them, rushed overboard to certain death.

At about half past two o'clock, amidst the wild shrieks of the passengers the steamer settled and sunk. The propeller had kept in the wake of the Atlantic, and these on board her did all in their power to preserve the lives of the hundreds of human beings who were now seen struggling in the water.

The fog was a sad hindrance to their efforts, but some two hundred and fifty were rescued from the Lake, and taken by the propeller to Erie. A large number left at once on the Sultana for Cleveland; others came down in the cars this morning.

From the best information we can gain, we are led to believe that some three hundred lives are lost. The following is a list of the cabin and second class passengers, as ticketed from the office here. The names alone are known without initials, and the places named are cities in which the passengers procured their tickets; but it is not certain that in all cases they reside there:

Cabin Passengers for Chicago.—Mr. Osborn and child, New York; Mr. Read, do.; Mr. Field and family of three, do.; Mr. Frost, Boston; Mr. Calkins, Albany; Mr. Lake, do.; Mr. Fairbrother, do.; Mr. Bushnell and brother, do.; Mr. Lawrence and family of three, Utica; Mr. Clarke and family of three and one child—residence not known; Mrs. Cornwell, sister of Elihu Burritt; F. O. Mosher, Canada.

For Waukegan —Mr. S. Chamber, New York; Mr. Britton, do.

For Milwaukee.—Mr. Hanley, residence not known; Miss Myers, do.

Later from Texas.

By the arrival on Monday morning of the steamship Yacht, Capt. Thompson, we have received Galveston papers to the 27th inst. The Yacht came from Brazos Santiago, but brought no Brownsville papers, and we miss most of our exchanges from the interior.

REPORTED INDIAN MASSACRE.—The Northern Standard is informed that Capt. Stevens, of Fort Belknap, with two officers and fifty-six men, were killed lately by Comanches, thirty miles from that post, and that expresses have been sent to the forts below for reinforcements.

We do not think there is much confidence to be placed in the rumor. It appears to be a regular game with the Indians, to keep their white friends in a state of excitement.

THE CROPS.—The Leon Pioneer says the cotton worm has made its appearance in Leon county, though not to an extent sufficient to do material damage. The cotton is there opening finely, and promises an abundant yield.

On the road from Clarksville to Austin corn is said to be selling at twenty-five cents per bushel.

JUDGE MCCOMBS.—This gentlemen, who recently resigned his seat on the bench of the First Judicial District of Texas, has published an address to the people of the district, in which he states that the salary of the office is entirely too small, and recommends an increase.

FROM THE RIO GRANDE.—The Delta makes the following extracts from a letter written from Brownsville by Capt. G. K. Lewis:

"Preparations are being made in the State of Tamaulipas for a coup d'etat. The governor elect, Ramon Pretto, is entitled to his seat on the 15th inst., but, it is understood, that Jesus Cardenas does not intend to surrender the reins of government, without being compelled to by force. Both parties are arming for war. I think that Cardenas will be overthrown; if he is not, this frontier is lost to business. The cities in favor of Pretto, are Victoria, Tula, Tampico, San Fernando, Matamoras and Camargo. The only support that Cardenas can count on, is Mexico, but I do not think that will win. If Cardenas succeeds, you will hear of something important—like the declaring Aristn dictator—from this country.

"Macedonia Capistran, he who has been one of the head men of Matamoras for some time past, Miguel Tiferona, and the Carvntiles Ludlane have all left for Victoria; the impression is that they have taken the road for Victoria, in order to purpose of murdering Rufino Rodriguez, the newly elected deputy to the Legislature of States, being a strong Pretto man. I think the report has much truth in it, as the parties named above are going in pursuit, are fit men for assassins.

"A man by the name of Peter, a servant of Major Chapman, was killed by ——— Thibault, at Point Isiaud, on Monday last. The circumstances, as far as I have been able to learn them, are as follows: Peter went into the house of Thibault, and committed some indecencies, when T. put him out. He afterwards returned, and repeated what he had previously done, upon which T. pushed him off the counter, on which he was seated, and, falling on his head, broke his neck. Thibault will be bound over or committed for trial at the next term of the District Court.

England and the Fisheries.

Wilmer & Smith's Times, received by the steamer Canada, comments on the fishing troubles. It says:

The intelligence which has recently arrived from the United States is of a very painful and distressing character, for which we have mainly to thank our present protectionist Government. Another of those annoying ruptures has occurred which has so often, during the past twenty years, alienated the sympathies of the people of the two countries, and brought them to the verge of a hostile conflict. When the North-east boundary and the Oregon questions were settled, it was hoped that collisions of this kind would in future be rendered impossible, but the bunglers who have now possession of power in this country evidently took with jealousy at the kindly feeling which has recently sprung up between the British and the American nations. Never, during the memory of living man, has there existed between the two countries such amicable relations as have prevailed during the last six months.

When, in December last, Louis Napoleon swept away republican institutions in France, and erected on their ruins a grinding despotism, the invasion of England was a project, the probability of which was discussed on both sides of the Atlantic, and the occasion gave rise, on the part of our American cousins, to offers of aid and assistance in the event of a project so infamous being attempted. The Americans regarded England as the last home of European freedom, and the contemplated desecration of our soil by a foreign foe gave hardly less offence to the Republicans on the Western Continent than it did to our countrymen at home. A burst of indignation was evoked on all sides of the most sbcering and patriotic kind, and matters remained in this happy state until a few weeks ago, when our new Colonial Secretery, Sir John Pakington, contrived, by sending an armed force to maintain the rights of our North American Fisheries, to set the two countries once more by the ears, and thus do rekindle the old animosities which had been all but obliterated by recent events.

It is for this carrying out of this nice slice of colonial patronage (the bounty system)—to please, probably, some hanger-on of the present feeble executive in Downing street, and to show at the same time our dislike of Republican institutions, that we are to risk a war with our best customers, the United States, and thus bring once more into full play all the national antipathies which recent events had happily been the means of allaying. If the American fishermen were invading our waters, surely a representation to the authorities at Washington would have met the case much more effectually than the undignified course which has been pursued in the instance before us.

It would have shown the Americans, at all events, that trumpery as this thing is altogether, we had not descended to reprisals without some warning, and such courtesy would have mollified much of the indignation which is now hurating out in all parts of the United States. From the men who heaped unsparing ridicule upon Lord Palmerston because he enforced the claims of Don Pacifico under British guns, we had a right to expect something dignified in a little matter; but really to employ the maritime power of England in putting down a few poor American fishermen—to send across the broad Atlantic men and munitions of war for a purpose so ignoble, is as degrading to our national pride as it may eventually prove injurious to our national interests.

SUICIDE.—DR. BOGGS, a homeopathic physician, committed suicide in Savannah, on the 24th ult., by taking prussic acid.

LINES SENT WITH A BOUQUET OF EXOTICS TO A FRIEND....By EULALIE.

O! wearily pass by the hours,
Of this long, sultry, summer-time day;
And I'll joy when the for woodland bowers
Are clothed in eye's mantle of gray.

Too deep is the stillness around me—
Too wild are the thoughts of my brain—
And too painfully long have they bound me
In the links of their mystical chain!

But longer, the shadows are creeping
Adown the green hills in the west;
And the last golden sunlight is peeping,
On the river's broad, mirroring breast.

Then I'll shake off this lethargic feeling,
As morn shakes the dew from her wings;
While happy thoughts come o'er me stealing,
Like the notes that my pet bird now sings.

And by the soft light 'round me falling,
I'll leave my lone lattice awhile;
For the voice of the flowers seems calling,
The gloom of my heart to beguile.

O! sweet is their odorous breathing!
And the light of their tear-laden eyes
Glows with joy, while the star-beams are wreathing
Their smiles round the Queen of the skies.

I'll gather some buds that I've cherished,
And sprig of geranium tree,
That the dews and the zephyrs have nourished,
And twine in an of 'ring for THEE.

O! simple the gift is—and faded
Will be their soft petals, so rare,
Ere they reach thee; and all darkly shaded—
Yet their sweetness will still linger there.

Thus, though Friendship's sweet flowers may decay
In long years of sorrow and gloom,
Still, the heart's sacred shrine, where they lay,
Will retain their exquisite perfume.

ANOTHER INDIAN TREATY.—Colonel D. B. Mitchell, Superintendent of Indian Affairs, in St. Louis, has received instructions from the Department in Washington, to hold a treaty with the Camanches, Kiowas and other Indian tribes of the plains. The treaty will be held this fall, at Fort Atkinson, or in that vicinity.

EMIGRATION FROM THE BRITISH PROVINCES.—The Quebec Chronicle says a large portion of the recent emigrants from Europe pursue a further course to the Western States, and attributes this result to the efforts of persons interested in various American steamboat and railroad companies.

The commodious and splendid brick edifice has just been completed—ninety-seven by forty-seven feet, three stories—which for stability, convenience of arrangement, and for number, size and comfort of private and school rooms, is not surpassed by any similar one in the State. The Principal resides in the building, and with his lady and competent female assistance, superintends the Boarding Department. A lady will reside in the Seminary, who faithfully discharges the duties of matron and nurse, so that at all times, and especially in sickness, pupils will find the comforts, kindness and attentions of home. The Principal, with the aid of female teachers, who also live in the Seminary, diligently guard and form their morals, manners and habits.

There is but one session of ten months. The ensuing school year will commence on Thursday the 23d of September, 1852. Pupils can enter at any time during the year, chargeable from the time of entrance. No deduction will be made but by special arrangement with, or at the discretion of the Principal.

B. A. FAHNESTOCK'S VERMIFUGE!

The Safest and Most Effective

REMEDY FOR WORMS.

TO THE PUBLIC.—Amidst the profusion of nostrums and patent humbugs, of the present day, the public should be cautious as to the remedies they purchase and use, when life is in danger from disease. It is a notorious fact that worms, both in children and adults, often cause death; and that very frequently they exist in the system when it is not suspected.

Many a helpless child has been laid in the grave, when the disease which induced its death has been entirely misunderstood, and when worms have really been the cause. Now, why not, in view of this dangerous enemy, make use of a remedy which many years of experience has proved to be a safe and certain remedy?

Since it was first put before the public, many worthless preparations have been forced into sale, which have had their day, and are now counted as so much trash; whereas, B. A. FAHNESTOCK'S VERMIFUGE is daily increasing in popularity, owing to its intrinsic worth. It is only to be used according to the directions, and if worms exist, they will certainly be expelled from the system.

☞ This remedy is sold by all Druggists in New Orleans, and all the principal towns in the U. States. my22 1y

CHURCH BELLS.

CHURCH, FACTORY, STEAMBOAT AND LOCOMOTIVE BELLS constantly on hand and PEALS and CHIMES of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron YOKES, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells, so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and springs also, which prevent the clapper from resting on the bell; thereby prolonging its sound. Hangings complete (including Yoke, Frame and Wheel,) furnished if desired.

An experience of thirty years in this business by their late father, enabled him to ascertain the best form for Bells, the combination of metals, and degree of heat requisite for securing in them the greatest solidity, strength and most melodious tones; which improvements, together with his very extensive assortment of patterns, are now held by the subscribers, who have grown up in the business, and who will use every endeavor to sustain the reputation which the establishment has heretofore enjoyed, both in this and foreign countries; the Bells from which have repeatedly received the highest awards of the New York State Agricultural Society and American Institute, and at which were completed Chimes and heavy Alarm Bells for different parts of the Union and Canada.

MATHEMATICAL INSTRUMENTS will still be manufactured by the subscribers, of which they will have constantly on hand an assortment of Transit Instruments, Levels, Surveyor's Compasses, (plain, nonious and improved,) etc. Also, Brass or Composition Castings of any size cast to order.

Also, the recommendation of a large number of our most influential COTTON FACTORS and COMMISSION MERCHANTS, all of which are included in the Agent's Circular. Also, to the following, received since the circulars were printed from JOHN F. MILLER, of Attakapas:

"In July last I was induced to apply the Bridgewater Mineral Paint to my Sugarhouse, and, in every respect, it has exceeded my expectations, and the representations made by the agents, Messrs. C. O. Rogers & Co. I cheerfully add my testimony to the numerous ones embraced in the Agent's Circular, and recommend the same to Planters and others, as the best Weather and Fire Protector I have ever known. Where I have applied it, it has been exposed to the sun since last July, and has neither blistered nor cracked, and has formed a solid metallic surface, which has proved entirely impervious."

New Iberia, Attakapas, March 16, 1852.

In addition to the above, we have in our possession innumerable certificates from equally respectable sources, which one has seen at our office; among which are those of Capt. Wm. Cutts, of the ship Charles Cooper; Brevet Lieut. Col. G. H. Talcott, New York Arsenal; Lt. S. Smith, Lieut. and Quartermaster U. S. Military Academy, West Point; Lt. R. Lee, late Superintendent, now Secretary of the Hudson River Railroad Company; Lt. D. McCallum, Ass't Engineer New York and Erie Railroad, etc.; proving conclusively, by being thoroughly tested, that it is both

FIRE AND WEATHER PROOF.

The bending, shrinking, or warping of the material upon which it is used does not affect the paint; in twenty-four hours it dries, and in four weeks becomes a perfect slate.

It preserves wood from decay, and neither blisters nor cracks by exposure to the hottest sun. For covering roofs of either iron, zinc, wood, canvas, or paper, it is also invaluable, and particularly recommended, as it is a certain PROTECTION AGAINST SPARKS AND CINDERS, and is furnished cheaper than any paint in the Southern country. BEST CHRISTIAN HYMN.

Eph. III. of Clement of Alexandria (in Greek) the most ancient Primitive Church. It is then and fifty years after the apostles to be of much earlier origin. Often sung by the "beloved disciple" he ascended to his reward. The version will give some imperfect spirit:

Hymn of tender youth!
Leading, in love and truth,
Through devious ways:
Christ, our triumphant king,
We come thy name to sing,
We here our children bring
To shout thy praise.

Spare art our holy Lord!
Thou all subduing Word!
Healer of strife!
Thou didst thyself abase,
That from sin's deep disgrace
Thou mightest save our race,
And give us life!

Thou art Wisdom's High Priest!
Thou hast prepared the feast
Of holy love:
And our mortal pain,
Not all in vain;
Thou dost not disdain,
To look from above.

Be thou our guide!
Our Shepherd and our pride,
Our staff and song!
Jesus! thou Christ and God,
Eternal word,
Across where thou hast trod;
Make our faith strong.

Now, and till we die,
Sing we thy praises high,
Joyfully sing:
All the glad throng
Who to thy Church belong,
Unite and swell the song,
To Christ our King.

MR. BROWN.

[The following is from the Presbyterian Herald. It tells a tale on Mr. Brown, the Methodist. But is there not a Mr. Brown in your Methodists? In hope that it may be, for the eye it is here republished. Ed.]

Mr. Brown is a rich common sense farmer. He lives in May. Mr. Brown sits in his house. He sits with his chair tilted back, slippered feet on the banisters of his loft hand holds a cigar leisurely puffs from time to time; holds a political paper; his mind in the conjecture of Mr. Jones, as to the respective chances of Scott.

Mr. Brown hearty step along the porch—a slap upon the farmer's shoulder.

"Hello!" drops the paper. "Well, Mr. Brown, how are you? Take a seat."

"I took at you wheat field there." Brown runs his eyes slowly over the field. It is a noble field—several feet down in the bottom before his whole field is evidently perfectly full of deep, rich, golden grain waving, low billows under the breeze.

"Mr. Brown, why don't you reap? Time to reap ago. It is so ripe every breeze shakes a bushel to rot on the ground. I told you a dozen times; I've come over this hot sun to tell you again. It's a shame!" says Mr. Brown. He slips on his coat and goes out and engages men to cut his wheat. They are to begin next morning. To their astonishment Mr. Brown proceeds to run cords around body and arms of each, so that they can barely walk and move his arms.

"Gentlemen," says he, "that field is, as you see, a very large one indeed. The grain is falling out every hour, and a storm may come in any moment and ruin every heard. There is no time to lose; so get to work and work like horses. At noon I will send you, if I can afford it, half an ounce of whiskey and a table spoonful of water for each of you. If I don't send it at noon, work on, work hard, and I will have it ready for you at night."

"The man is perfectly crazy, you say. O, well, I am not positively certain all of you exactly as I have said; but I believe it is all the exact truth, however unreasonable.

Mr. Brown is a member of the Presbyterian Church in good standing. He hears preaching, reads the religious papers, listens to reports of the Board of Domestic Missions, believes that the whole of this world is ripe for the harvest, believes that every hour people are dropping, like wheat grains ripened for the grave, and so perishing; that the great mass of God's redeemed will at last burst their prison and join them all to sing his ministers are but laborers; that Christ directs the Church to gather them in. He knows that the field is very hard, and the great field of souls to rend the flesh and tangle and thorns of the weary reaper. He knows the heats hot upon their heads, and that with discouragements that ministers are mere hirelings, not fed by ravens—but that God expects the Church to be sustained by her members. He knows these men have a family to support, a salary to pay debts to be discharged; that when the salary is not paid in prompt, quarterly instalments, they are hampered by debts; as much hampered in work as a reaper would be with his hands tied—more! Mr. Brown knows all this, yet he gives one dollar a year toward sustaining domestic missionaries, when he could give five, at least. Yet the harvest waves before his very eyes; he is exceedingly anxious it should be reaped—very! He is a type of nine-tenths of the professors. He professes to believe that Christ and the reaping of the gospel harvest is of infinitely more importance than all earthly things; just as immortal souls are of more importance than grains of wheat.

Now, if he acts in regard to that harvest of immortal souls as he does, he must act as I have imagined in regard to his own wheat field; else he either does not believe as he says, or he is frightfully inconsistent.

MAY A MEMBER OR MINISTER OF OUR CHURCH BE TWICE TRIED FOR THE SAME OFFENCE?

There is amongst us some difference of opinion on this question, which, if I mistake not, the good of the Church requires to be, and which I think may be, easily and quietly settled. I desire to make a few observations on the subject, and in doing so will endeavor to be as plain and practical as possible, and to lay aside all technical or legal phrases and modes of discussion, and will be as brief as practicable.

The object of penal laws and their execution, in a Church, is this: to keep out of it two things—immorality and heresy: and to do this to the greatest possible extent, and with the least liability to do injustice to an innocent person. What forms of trial are resorted to, or how many times an accused person may be tried, or whether tried at all, indeed, is matter of no importance, so that these ends are answered.

If an accused person may not be tried more than once for the same offence, it is because our existing laws forbid it; or secondly, because a sound analogy drawn from the concentrated wisdom and opinions of able men, in all time past, who are soundly versed in the science of justice, and which is usually called "common law," is against it; or thirdly, because of the reason of the thing.

It is admitted on all hands, that nothing in the Bible or Discipline is expressly written on the subject.

Then, secondly, what do we gather from civil or criminal jurisprudence on the subject? There is a maxim of the law to the effect, that a man may not be put twice in jeopardy for the same offence; but when is this maxim applicable, and what are its limitations? I imagine it only applies to penal offences, or to such offences, or rather such crimes, as are punishable, in some sense, corporeally. And it is for this reason that in such cases it is really a great punishment or disability, necessarily so, to subject a person to trial. A man is accused of larceny or murder, and he is first thrust in prison, where he remains for days or weeks, possibly for years, before he can have an opportunity of being tried; and if the charge proves to be groundless, he is liberated with the extremest regrets on the part of the State. But in the imperfection of human knowledge and human laws, the evil is unavoidable. Now the law, in order to steer as clear as possible between two evils, that of thus punishing the innocent, and letting the guilty go free, says to the accuser, "You must bring your proofs forward at the first trial, or we must set the man at liberty, though he be guilty; for it is better that occasionally a guilty man go free, than that man should, more than once, be subjected to an ex parte trial and punishment so severe."

But in all cases where the accusation and arraignment do not really amount to punishment, the rule does not apply. In fact, the law is not, in any case, opposed to two or more trials for the same offence, for it oftentimes does try a man several times, by a jury, for the same supposed offence. It only refuses to subject a man, more than once, to a real punishment, (that which is necessarily incident to an accusation and arraignment) in order to ascertain whether he be or be not guilty. But in all other cases, that is, in all civil suits, there is no prescribed end to litigation. If a man withholds my land from me, I can bring him twenty times to trial if I choose, if I fail nineteen times. And so if he withholds my money, or otherwise injures me. I know a legal decision may sometimes be plead in bar, to the same form of action; but that does not affect the principle; a man may sue me for money, though I hold his receipt for it.

The one trial principle, therefore, only applies where arraignment is really, or is likely to be, a punishment so severe that it is better, on the whole, that sometimes guilty men go free than that innocent persons should be subjected to this great disability more than once.

Then if there is nothing in our statute law, or in the analogy of the principles of justice as brought to our view in what is called the common law, is there any thing to be found in the reason of things that will forbid that a church member be tried twice for the same offence?

It is unpleasant to be arraigned and tried for an alleged immorality or heresy, though oftentimes not more unpleasant than for the accusations to exist, really, and be talked of freely without trial.

A church member is accused of fraud, and the proof on the trial is insufficient, and the prosecution fails. But afterwards other testimony makes its appearance, which is believed to be fully sufficient to establish the guilt? What is to be done? Must he go free? For what reason? Why may there not be a new trial, and the new testimony be introduced? No man can give a reason. Of course a second trial should not be resorted to without good substantial grounds. New trials are granted in all other courts, upon proper showing, civil, criminal and maritime. And why not here? It is to be remembered that no court ever finds a person innocent. He is presumed to be innocent until there is a finding of guilt. The verdict, in case of acquittal, only pronounces that the proof adduced is not sufficient to convict.

A minister is charged with, say drunkenness or falsehood, and the proof on the trial is not sufficient to convict. But shortly after other witnesses appear, who are ready to state positively that they saw the drunkenness or heard the falsehood. Must he go free? For what reason?

In case of a minister, it is impossible to give the semblance of a reason, for in truth he is tried whether he is accused or not. Once a year every minister of our Church is arraigned at the bar of the Church for trial, and the inquiry is solemnly made of all men, if they know or believe him to be guilty of any thing unbecoming his office. Well, one answers, as he is solemnly bound to do: Yes, I know him to be guilty of falsehood, and the proof is at hand, but there was an attempt last year to prove this same thing, and as these witnesses were not here then, it must not be proved now. It could not be proved last year, at the annual, or last quarterly Conference, as the case may be, and therefore it must not be proved now! Is there any logic, or any morals, or any justice, or any reason in this?

And moreover, how can every member of the Conference answer, as they all do virtually, that they know nothing against this brother, when one or more does know him to be guilty, or knew that it is alleged? And if it is alleged that he is guilty, though an attempt to prove this fact once failed, can the Conference solemnly certify to the world that he is a fair man, with nothing against him! Suppose a minister is charged with heresy, and the conflicting recollection of persons render it doubtful, and the Conference acquit him, and the next year the supposed heresy is produced in a written or printed form? Now, every member of the Conference knows him to be guilty, but he can not be tried a second time! Suppose he confesses his guilt? Still he can not be tried twice! Or suppose new witnesses are ready to testify to it. May he not be tried?

Some put the legal impossibility of a second trial upon the ground that the court has once decided, and it will certainly decide in the same way again. It is probable, and only probable, that with the same testimony the decision would be the same. All courts knowing themselves to be human and frail, recognise the possibility of their minds being changed by argument, and therefore oftentimes, upon reasonable showing, open and revise their own decisions. But with additional testimony, the question presented is a different one; and if the testimony now to be offered would have produced conviction at first, it certainly must do so now.

Other arguments might be adduced if it were deemed necessary: but it is believed to have been shown that the common law maxim against a second trial does not apply, where the mere arraignment is not of itself a great disability, as is the case in all ecclesiastical trials. And we have seen that the whole analogy of all legal jurisprudence favors the doctrine that a person may be tried by his Church, upon a good showing being made for a new trial, although there may previously have been a trial for the very same offence. Of course a second trial would not be granted upon mere application, but only because there is good ground to believe that justice requires it.

How can a quarterly or annual Conference adjourn, when testimony that has never yet been officially heard, is offered to prove that a minister of its body is guilty of immorality! If this testimony was not heard on a previous trial, it is the best of all reasons why it should be now. Plain, simple, even justice is this. LEX NON SCRIPTA.

The Sinner's Prayer.

God hath put arguments into the sinner's mouth to plead with him for mercy. "He, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money, come ye, buy and eat; yea, come buy wine and milk without money and without price." Rise, sinner, he calleth thee; go to the Lord; and when thou goest, tell him, Lord, thou hast bid me come, and behold here I am. I come, Lord, at thy word; I come for a little water, I come for thy wine and thy milk. I have brought no price in my hand, but thou hast bid me come without money and without price. Though I have no grace, yet at thy word I come for grace; though I have no Christ, I come for Christ; though I can not call thee Father, yet, being called, I come to thee as fatherless. "With thee the fatherless find mercy." If I am not thy child, may I not be made thy child? Hast thou not a child's blessing left to bestow upon me? Thou hast bid me come, come for a blessing; bless me, even me, also, O Lord. Wherefore hast thou sent for me? Shall I be sent away as I came? I came at thy word; do not say, begone out of my sight. I can not go at thy word; I will not go; for whither shall I go from thee? "Thou hast the words of eternal life." Since thou wilt have me speak, Lord, answer. Though I dare not say, be just to me a saint, yet I do say, I will say, I must say, "Lord, be merciful to me, a sinner." [Richard Alleine.

Man's constant prescription for the elevation of man, is to alter his circumstances—God's grand prescription for the improvement of man, is to change his heart. Man's plan is to give the patient a new bed—God's divine plan is to give the patient health. Man goes to the circumference, and tries by civilizing to get inward and ultimately to Christianize; God's plan is to begin at the center, Christianize the heart, and then civilize the whole circumference of the social system.

In spiritual confidence the devil will come in, as in all other good works, and cry, half mine.

MY SPIRIT MOTHER.... By EMILY R. PAGE.

'Twas a calm and quiet evening
In the golden autumn time;
Not a murmur broke the stillness,
Save the far off vesper chime—
Not a ripple woke the waters
From their soft and dreamy sleep,
Save as when a falling leaflet
Kissed the bosom of the deep.

Moonlight, soft and pure and holy,
Trembling through the misty air,
Resting on the placid waters
Like an angel smiling there.
Stars came down, a while to linger
On the peaceful wave asleep—
Seeming, in their lustrous beauty,
Floating jewels on the deep.
Heaven and earth the while seemed blending
Gently mingling into one,
Till the world was robed in glory
As the splendor of the sun.

Oh, the rare and hallowed beauty
Of that silent evening hour
Gently wooed my weary spirit,
By its soft persuasive power,
Far away from aught unholy,
Till earth's cares no more are mine—
Till one high and wholly impulse
Ruled alone by spirits shrine.

There, amid the dreamy moonlight,
Came a holy spirit-guest—
And the words she softly whispered
Thrilled with hope my yearning breast;
For she bade me bear Life's burdens,
All its weary weight of cares—
Calmly, with no words of murmur,
Firmly, with no doubts or fears.

Then in tones of sweetest music,
As the moonlight round her fell,
Whispered she one tender blessing,
Murmured she one fond farewell.
Upward through the silvery radiance
Of the clear and crystal air,
Wistfully I gazed and wondered,
As she slowly floated there.

Till a flood of golden glory
Closed around her pathway bright,
And the woven starlight hid her,
As a mantle from my sight.
Then I knew the angel vision
Which had blessed me as she smiled
Was my own sweet spirit-mother,
Watching o'er her wayward child.

And I knelt amid the silence,
And the shadows brooding there—
And I breathed my burthened spirit
Forth in deep and earnest prayer,
That my angel guest might hover
Ever near to bless and guide,
While my bark was wildly tossing
On life's dark tempestuous tide.

CONVERSION OF THE SOUL.

He who came down from heaven knew its nature; and, having a wisdom which confounded and put to silent shame those who sought to entrap him in his words—who was "very God," full well knew what was meant by the "kingdom of God," as appertaining to this world.

Hence his memorable declaration to Nicodemus, "Except a man be born again, he can not see the kingdom of God." [John iii. 3.

If we understand the "kingdom of God" spiritually, it must mean "righteousness, joy and peace in the Holy Ghost;" if we understand it literally, it must be Heaven.

First, then, can man as he is see the "kingdom of God" in either of the above senses?

Take an unconverted man who experimentally knows nothing of the righteousness by faith that enables one to keep God's commands, nothing of that joy "which is unspeakable and full of glory," and of that peace "which passeth understanding." Let him be admitted to a prayer meeting, at which the songs of Zion and shouts of praise to God are heard. Will not all appear "foolishness unto him?" And though he would never say one word against the hurrahs of soldiery, the shouts of the glee clubs, or the noisy clamor of the political parties thronging your streets—these things are all right—he would think the noise of a Methodist prayer meeting, in which souls were happy, as an abomination. He can not, in his carnal nature, enjoy what affords so much happiness to the followers of Christ. The Word that warms the heart, strengthens the faith and confirms the hope of the Christian, to him brings no enjoyment. To the society of the religious his whole nature is averse. He is "dead in sins;" and as a dead body has a heart that loves not, eyes that see not, ears that hear not, hands that handle not, feet that walk not, so he has a heart that loves not the spiritual life, eyes that see not the "things that make for his eternal welfare," ears that hear not the "glad tidings of good news," hands that handle not the Word, feet that go not in the paths of obedience. To thoughts of heaven, delightful contemplation of the state of the righteous beyond the gloomy confines of the tomb, to every thing of a religious nature, to the "kingdom of God," he is dead. He sees not the "kingdom of God." "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he (in his present state) know them, because they are spiritually discerned." 1 Cor. ii. 14.

Now, no blame attaches to a man for not delighting in spiritual matters, for so long as he remains irreligious, (as his heart rebels against the pure things of God, because they condemn him) it is a moral impossibility that he can delight in them. The sin lies here, in not using the instituted means of having a purified heart, so that he can have spiritual delights. He is not, then, manifest, that a sinful man does not, can not see the spiritual "kingdom of God?"

Heaven must be a place or state of unalloyed happiness. Scripture teaches that there are no tears, death, sorrow or pain—that there are "fulness of joy and pleasures for evermore." Reason teaches as well as the Bible, that physical, or natural evil, results from moral evil; that where no sin is, misery can not exist. Of Heaven, or the New Jerusalem, the Bible says: "And there shall no wise enter into it any thing that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination, or maketh a lie." Reason would teach us that any place entirely free from all sin must be one of bliss; that where God is nothing impure can come, and consequently that unless man become holy he can not see the literal "kingdom of God," the glorious state of the Beatified in the world to come.

There can be no sin in Heaven, else suffering would be there; hence, he that dies in his sins can not see God. This unspeakable glory belongs only unto "the pure in heart." The probability is that he who lives three score years and ten in the commission of wickedness, who has been completely fettered by its death-bringing habit, as habits grow stronger unless broken off, would not repent, if, beyond the grave, a million of years to him were given. Has he not had seventy years' probation, and did he not descend into the scale of sinfulness unto death, and can any one suppose that he shall not advance in his being as he died, and that as he would thus be always sinning, his punishment would not be eternal? An immortal being sins unto death against the greatest love of the Almighty; is not, then, the rejection of Christ, the best gift of God to man, the highest crime man can commit; and if so, must it not merit the heaviest penalty, and can that penalty be aught else than everlasting perdition?

He who contends that, no matter how wicked men are when they die, they all enter immediately upon a state of beatitude, should answer this question: "When and where does the soul lose its sin?" This, as any one can readily perceive, is a "hiatus" in the reasoning of the Universalist never, I think, yet ventured upon. Why does he shun it? Will he tell us that death wipes out the long account entered against man by the Recording Angel; I would ask him for "the law and the testimony," and he could give none. Death is a merely physical operation, separating the soul from the body. Can any one prove that this disunion cleanses the soul from its defilement? The Universalist says that sin meets its full punishment in this world, and therefore argues that death must be the closing scene in the tragedy of Sin. At the same time a learned gentleman of your city has acknowledged that "some men's consciences are seared," and yet, strange as it may appear, he contends that to be the greatest punishment that can be inflicted on them, forgetting a simple fact, that nothing can be considered as punishment (which word most certainly conveys the idea of suffering) unless man feels it.

The Universalist makes God more partial than the veriest tyrant of earth. The tyrant rewards those who serve him more than those who disobey his commands, even if he reward the latter at all. The parent, the teacher and the master, love those most obedient to their commandments, and shall we, for one moment, indulge the thought, so unjust to the character of the Great I Am, that in the consummation of time he gives the same glorious award to the most wicked and abandoned, who have served Him not, as to the pure and good who all their life time have walked in obedience to his Word—Eternal life? Believe this who can. He that truly entertains such a view of God, must make him the author of sin; for this is the only reason that can justify an unconditional, universal salvation. And I do not wonder that such an one does not obey the Gospel of the Son of God. Fatalism is the corner stone of predestination, as it is commonly understood, and of free redemption to all mankind. But I have dwelt long enough on this subject, and I will close by asking the question, "do the finally impenitent enter Heaven?"

I have asked the question, "When and where does the soul lose its sin?" The answer to this question leads us to the only means by which we can enter mansions of eternal bliss—the New Birth, or the conversion of the soul.

I wish to divest the subject of as much metaphysical discussion as possible; and hence I would ask the question, does the Bible teach the doctrine of this new and wonderful creation?

In the time of Ezekiel the promise was, "I will put a new spirit within you, and I will take the stony heart out of their flesh, and will give them a heart of flesh." In Deuteronomy we read, "The Lord thy God will circumcise thy heart, and the heart of thy seed, to love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul." We hear the voice of the royal Psalmist crying out, "Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me."

Here then in the Old Testament, that God would make man a new creature, by giving him a new heart, is plainly taught.

Perfect Love May be Regained.

Some years since I was inclined to think that one who had once enjoyed and lost the pure love of God, must never look to enjoy it again, till they were just stepping into eternity. But experience has taught us better things. We have now numerous instances of those who had cast away that unspeakable blessing, and now enjoy it in a larger measure than ever, and why should not this be your case? Because you have been unworthy? So were they. Because you have been an unfaithful steward? So had they been also, yet God healed them freely, and so he will you. Only do not reason against him. Look for nothing in yourself but sin and unworthiness. Forget yourself. Worthy is the Lamb, and he has prevailed for you. You shall not die, but live! Live all the life of heaven on earth. You need nothing in order to this but faith; and who gives this? He that standeth at the door. [J. Wesley.

The Christian's Crown.

That ye may close with Christ, remember there is a six-fold crown which shall be put upon your head. Would ye have a long life? Then come to Christ, and ye shall have a crown of eternal life. Would ye have glory? Then come to Christ, and ye shall have a crown of glory. Would ye have a knowledge of the mysteries of God? Then come to Christ, and he shall crown you with knowledge. Would you have eternal felicity and an uninterrupted happiness? Then come to Christ, and ye shall have an immortal crown. Would ye have holiness and sanctification? Then come to Christ, and ye shall have a crown of righteousness; yea he shall put a royal crown upon your head, a crown of gold. O, what a day, think ye, it will be when Christ shall hold your crown in hand, and shall put them upon your heads never to be removed again. [

Our globe, seen by God, is a law, not a mass of facts.

RELIGIOUS

The following from an address [illegible] delivered before the Alumni of Harvard University, is beautiful [illegible] we run our eyes over the list of her children, and see what a goodly fellowship of prophets, what a glorious company of apostles, she has sent forth into every field of Christian service; as we turn back to that first Commencement, on the 5th day of October, 1642, when "nine bachelors commenced at Cambridge, young men of good hope, and performed their acts so as gave good proof of their proficiency in the tongues and arts," and thence follow her along her starry way for more than two centuries—we might be almost pardoned for forgetting that she has, or ever had any faults. And could we but see something of a higher moral discipline, something of a deeper religious sentiment, something of a stronger spiritual influence, mingling with the sound scholarship which pervades her halls, and giving something of a fresher and fuller significance to her ancient motto, "Christo et ecclesiæ," could we but see a little more of the state of things here, which Thomas Arnold contemplated, when he nobly declared at Rugby, "It is not necessary that this should be a school of three hundred, or of one hundred, or of fifty, but it is necessary that it should be a school of Christian gentlemen"—there would be little or nothing more desired in her condition. I pretend not to know how this common want of almost all seminaries of instruction is to be supplied. But, O! let us be careful that the indulgence of sectarian jealousies do not result in a downright divorce between education and religion. Let us be watchful lest our disposition to do away all color for the idea of a State religion, shall terminate in banishing religion from our republican schools. Better, a thousand fold better that a seminary like this should be under the steady, effective, aye, or even exclusive influence of any one religious sect of vital Christianity. Let us, if we can, and as far as we can, so blend the rays which are reflected from every different view of the Bible, that they shall form one harmonious beam of Holy Light, streaming in at every door and window and loophole of our halls and chapels, and casting golden glories upon every pinnacle and buttress and tower. But let us be cautious, that in attempting to shut out any one particular ray which may be imagined to predominate in our academic atmosphere, we take no risk of shutting out the glorious sunshine of the gospel, and leaving the institution in this day of its highest intellectual advantages, in a condition of spiritual darkness:

"Dark, dark, dark, amid the blaze of noon—
Irrecoverably dark, total eclipse,
Without all hope of day!"

THE ENERGIES OF CHRISTIANITY.

Professor Stowe, of America, related the following tale at a meeting held in that country: "I knew a pious young man, who was sustaining himself at an institution by the labor of his own hands, and in him the true energies of Christianity began to develop themselves. His feelings became much affected by the spiritual condition of a populous neighborhood, which had never enjoyed religious privileges, and consequently did not appreciate them. He visited the families of that district from house to house, endeavoring to open a religious meeting among them. They would permit no such thing. Not discouraged, this young man turned to the children, and went round and invited them, one by one, to meet him on Sunday mornings in a Sunday school.

Several children acceded to the plan, and then he had to find a room to meet in, but every door was closed against him. He told the children to assemble under the shade of a tree, upon a grassy bank; and thither they went. He prayed with them, and taught them to study the Word of God, and the little children were delighted with their Sunday school. So it went on, from week to week, with increasing numbers and increasing interest, till one Lord's day morning opened with a cold storm of rain. The teacher repaired to his tree at the usual time, supposing that some few children might be there; and there indeed he found nearly all the school; wet and cold, it is true, but they had warm hearts in their bosoms, and how could they forego the enjoyment of their Beloved Sunday school for a single morning? The teacher took off his hat, and prayed as usual for the blessing of God upon the [illegible] and began to teach, when a man in the crowd told him that for that time he might bring the children into his stable. The teacher turned to the children and [illegible] offers us the use of his stable, a stable that Christ took [illegible] when he was a little child. Let us go." WRESTLING ... JACOB.

... II. 22:31, may be ... night and took his ... two said servants and his ... and passed over the ford Jab... and he took and sent them over ... ; and he sent over that which be... to him. And Jacob remained alone. ... wrestled with him until the ... dawn. And he saw that he ... him. And he smote the hollow of ... ; and the hollow of the thigh of Jacob was out of joint as he wrestled with him.

And he said let go me, for the dawn rises. And he said I will not let go thee, except thou bless me.

And he said to him, what (is) thy name? And he said, Jacob. And he said, not Jacob; it shall be called no longer thy name; but Israel, (Isreh-el, Warrior of God) because thou hast striven with God, and with Man, (God-Man [?]) and thou hast prevailed.

—And Jacob inquired and said, reveal now thy name. And he said, wherefore wilt thou ask for my name? And he blessed him there.

And Jnoob called the name of the place Penuel, (Penu-El, Face of God,) because I have seen God face to face, and thou hast preserved my life.

And the sun rose upon him as he passed over Penuel, and he halted upon his thigh.

This remarkable event was a scenic exhibition of the states of heart which a man passed through in agonizing prayer; of the victory which he gains; and of the way in which the Lord calls out and engages all the powers of a human soul to seek him.

Jacob's condition on the night before he expected to meet Esau, is the first act of this spiritual drama. It seems that he had stopped for the night, but there was doubtless but little inclination in the camp to sleep, with such foreboding. He rose up in that night, sent forward his family, and remained alone. His condition was helpless, absolutely without strength to meet his angry brother. His fear, desperation, the darkness of the night, and the knowledge that all was depending upon himself, are graphic of the condition of desperate, lonely helplessness of a man who comes to God to obtain mercy amid wrath. To Jacob what a horrible night was that! His eye turned only inward and upward.

Why he remained alone is evident from Hosea, who, speaking of Jacob's wrestling with the angel, says, "He wept and made supplication unto him." He determined to risk all upon prayer, for God was his only resource.

The second scene is the appearance of the angel: And a man wrestled with him. God placed himself in opposition to Jacob. Up to the moment of blessing the angel strove against him, else it could not be said that he wrestled. He thus called forth, helped and quickened, until he excited and engaged Jacob in his whole body and soul. So our Saviour to the Syrophœnician woman, was first inaccessible, then indifferent, and at last repulsed her. But her earnestness waxed with the discouragement, and her faith grew with her earnestness; she prevailed: "O, woman, great is thy faith; be it unto thee even as thou wilt." Thus men are taught by the Most High to labor fervently in prayer. "The Spirit also helpeth our infirmities, for we know not what we should pray for as we ought"—i. e., neither what nor how.

What could so well represent the all-absorbed, entire heart-struggle of determined prayer, Elisha, when he prayed the life into the widow's son, "lay upon the child and put his mouth upon his mouth, and his eyes upon his eyes, and his hands upon his hands; and he stretched himself upon the child." The man at midnight pressed his neighbor for bread, and would not be put off. Both have the power which belongs to Scripture fact and illustration; but this surpasses those in distinctness.

What an interweaving of faith and fibre, sinew and spirit! God with man and man with God intertwined! See the wrestlers, as their bodies are knit and their limbs interlocked. Who can distinguish which part belongs to the angel and which to Jacob. What condescension! God contends with man as his equal. Behold the intense interest of God in the prayers of man.

He saw that he could not overcome him. And he smote the hollow of his thigh. This condition of Jacob exhibits that sense of helplessness which is wrought in the heart by the Holy Ghost just before the answer to prayer. No doubt Jacob felt that all depended upon the success of that hour, and here in it came utter helplessness! Such state follows only upon the first. He that does not enter into a hearty struggle can not have this sense of sinking weakness—a feeling very different from that which, before any effort has been made, says I can do naught. Often in strong prayer there seems to be but little power of prayer. Having done all, attempted all, the heart feels all helpless, like a wrestler who, in his struggles, dislocates a limb. Still he is assured, "My strength is made perfect in weakness." Afterward he can say, "I take pleasure in infirmities, for when I am weak then I am strong."

"My strength is gone, my nature dies,
I sink beneath thy weighty hand;
Faint, to revive—and fall, to rise;
I fall, and yet by faith I stand;
I stand, and will not let thee go,
Till I thy name and nature know."

The fourth exhibition is that of great strength of purpose. And he said let go me, for the dawn rises. And he said, I will not let go thee, except thou bless me. The contest had continued long, for Jacob said, I will pray "till the day break and the shadows flee away." But there was yet another degree of resolve to be wrought in his heart. He was to bring all to a moment. The battle had converged to a point. All his want, his fear, his agony, his faith, his fainting, were brought to one last issue. The angel said, I must go, let go me; see, the day comes! He told all the concerns and energies of a soul centred in one moment, in one prayer, in one I will not let go. "I found him whom my soul loveth. I held him, and would not let go." "The kingdom of heaven ... and the violent take it by ...

The spoils of the battle ... of God—an illimitable ho... to Jacob. This contest of ... th of the Church of ... had preceded. He ... blessings of my progenitors unto the utmost bound of the everlasting hills."

Warrior of God, because thou hast striven with God-man, and thou hast prevailed! This event was an epoch in the history of prayer; the power of man with God had never risen so high. The power of faith in the arms of Samson lifted the gates of Gaza, and prostrated the temple of Dagon; the hands of David slew a lion and a bear; but Jacob in prayer met the Angel of the Covenant, who afterward shook Egypt, walled the sea, drowned Pharaoh, and saved the helpless multitudes of Israel. "By his strength," says Hosea, "he had power over the angel and prevailed." God by the mouth of his servants called himself after this, the "Mighty God of Jacob."

Truly, the sun rose upon him as he passed over Penuel. His fears and the shadows of the night had fled together; and when he halted upon his thigh he could say:

"Lome as I am, I take the prey;
Hell, earth and sin, with ease o'ercome;
I leap for joy, pursue my way,
And as a bounding heart fly home;
Through all eternity to prove
Thy nature and thy name is Love."

New Lexington Circuit, Ala. Conf.

Brother McTyeire: Truly the Lord is good and has done great things for us here, whereof we are glad. We have had some refreshing times in the early part of the year, and some added to the Church; but this was only the budding of better times.

I held a meeting of four days at the Bethel camp ground, assisted by Bro. J. Glover, local deacon of the Carrolton Circuit, whose labors were owned of the Lord, and our meeting was crowned with success. The meeting commenced the Saturday before the second Sabbath in July. Seventeen were added to the Church; four of that number from the Baptist Church, which, according to our rule, came into full connection at once. A number of backsliders were reclaimed, and the Church was much revived. Some eighteen or twenty professed to obtain salvation by faith in Christ.

I held a meeting in Northport, commencing the Friday night before the first Sabbath in this month. It continued for ten days, and resulted in great good, both to the church at Northport and Tuscaloosa station, for many of the brethren and friends from that station were in attendance and shared in the blessings of the Gospel of God. Some forty or fifty persons, including both sides of the river, professed converting grace through faith in Christ, and a number of backsliders who came to the altar, were reclaimed—say twenty or twenty-five—some Methodists and some Baptists. Bless the Lord! His power was there to heal the disconsolate. Twenty-five whites and three colored persons joined the Church, and others, it is thought, will join in this meeting.

I was assisted by the very efficient labors of our beloved brother, O. R. Blue, nearly all the time. At the commencement, our hands were strengthened by the labors of Bros. J. Glover and H. Freeman, L. E. Bro. McCade rendered us good help at the close. The local preachers, Bros. Simes, Thompson and Sykes, rendered good service.

Our third quarterly meeting came off on the 21st inst.; the members for the most part present; and our beloved Presiding Elder, T. J. Koger, in the Chair. The business of the meeting passed through in harmony. In consequence of much rain, we did not have the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper on Sabbath.

On Monday, Bro. Koger preached and administered the Sacrament to a large number of communicants, in the presence of a large congregation, and the Lord was there to own and crown the services. Bro. R. S. Finley, from Macon, preached for us at 3 P. M. He is still with us helping, and the meeting is going on. The P. Elder staid until yesterday morning, when he was compelled to leave; but the blessings of many hearts go with him. Long may he live to bless the Church. Some twenty or twenty-five have professed the blessing of justification through faith; eighteen have joined on probation. We are looking for greater things. Yours, in love,

E. McMeans.

Crystal Springs Circuit, Miss. Conf.

Bro. McTyeire: Permit me to say to your readers the Lord has revived his work at Crystal Springs recently. We began a two days' meeting here the 7th of August, which was continued seven days. Up to that time some fifteen or sixteen had been converted and reclaimed, and nine whites and some ten or twelve blacks joined the Church. I have not been in a better meeting for years. The Church was greatly benefited. The members got on the harness and acquitted themselves well. In a little prayer meeting held during an intermission between a morning and evening service, by a good sister, with her female friends in the grove, five obtained the blessing of pardon.

After an interval of one day, the meeting was again resumed by two local preachers—Bros. Scott and Hennington—and continued three days. A number more were converted, and in both the meetings over thirty whites and blacks joined the church. Last Saturday, the 28th, we began a two days' meeting there again. The first day five obtained the blessing of sanctification. To God be all the glory. I hope to have further good news to communicate soon. Affectionately yours,

L. Ercanbrack.

Shieldsboro', Miss. Conf.

Dear Brother: Our circuit has risen above her former character, and our preachers have something of a pleasant work. They are welcomed by the people and are paid for their labor.

This place, Shieldsboro', has never been, until recently, properly included in the circuit; and the circuit preachers have not been able to get a footing and exert an influence. There are all imaginable kinds of difficulty and opposition to be combatted and overcome by a Protestant minister.

Last winter I came here purposely to establish a school and plant a church. The Good One has given me power to satisfy the patrons of my school, and to gather quite an interesting and intelligent congregation. We have a resident population of 2500, and in summer we count 5000. Is it not expecting reasonably to ask the Conference, the Church, the Christian public, to pray for us and help us to break up this field with the Gospel plow, and render it fruitful to the honor and glory of God!

Our third quarterly meeting Conference was held here last Saturday. We had a pleasant meeting. We paid the amount apportioned us by the stewards, without a public collection. Yours, affectionately,

E. D. Pitts.

Rev. P. E. Green, pastor, writes, under date of August 31:

"We have just closed a four days' meeting, which resulted in the conversion of some deathless spirits, and the accession of twelve whites to the Church. O, it was a good time. Our prayer is still 'O Lord, revive thy work.'"

Meeting of Conferences.—Some time ago, being in doubt as to the precise date of the Conferences below, inasmuch as several changes had been made, we requested of Bp. Paine the information given below:

Aberdeen, Miss., Sept. 2.

My Dear Brother: I have lately been so much absent from home, and so fully taken up with several protracted meetings, that I have neglected my correspondents—you among the rest. Our meetings were very profitable, a goodly number having professed religion. I love these "revivals." May God spread them over the whole land, and make ours a revival Church to the end os time!

Now to your inquiries.

MORNING PRAYER MEETINGS.

Brother McTyeire: I have just come in from a morning prayer meeting, held in Trinity Church, to implore the Divine blessing upon the pastor's labors, and upon our souls individually. Having reached the first point of evidence usually seen in a real revival of religion—that is, a sense of spiritual deficiency—to whatever extent this sense is practically felt, and its natural indications followed, to that same extent, it may be safely said, the spiritual evidence of revival is seen and felt.

Here in my charge, where we have five hundred white members, we may perhaps get out one hundred, upon the proposition that the church members shall meet at the common altar of prayer, and spend one hour in Christian communion and earnest prayer for holiness of heart; and that we will do this for six days, the days between two Sabbaths, and the coming Sabbath the regular communion season. What does it all amount to, as a matter of time? Why, doubtless to this—that those who religiously engage in the meeting will have taken, by the force of religious volition, six hours which might have been given to the business of gain or pleasure, and made a free will offering of them to God. This is, in part, presenting the body as a living sacrifice to God. It is not the result of a mere Sabbatic dispensation from the obligations of secular duties, which might, under the influence of a careless religion, be the use of the Lord's time for the worshiper's gratification.

But these morning prayer meetings are peculiarly blessed of God to the Church, because they ask and get a moiety of our time cheerfully taken and devoted to God.

There is in them the spirit of self-denial, and actual, costly sacrifice. Things meanly abstracted from the just claims of God upon us, and which abstraction often leaves a deluded victim of self-indulgence in the Church, judging himself by delusive rules, can never suffice. For instance: I am often called upon, in my familiarity with the Church, to observe things of most fearful betrayal to my mind, which things, however, have been so managed by the spell-bound member, that he is drawing comforts from the very item in life from which I deduce the want of reliable evidence of his piety.

Here is an example in case. A. is a very respectable mechanic—a thrifty, popular member of the Church; but he can't be induced to hold any office, or attend any meeting between Sabbaths, whether it be prayer meeting, class meeting, Bible class, or any thing else that is going to make him use his time, for business or pleasure, in the simple, voluntary worship of God. God's absolute demand of time is all He can get, and even that with fearful infringement. This Christian brother is up early, breakfasts early, is at his business early; perhaps not a minute earlier than he ought, if he has devoutly read and prayed. But here lies the fearful development—he never gives God any of his time; but when Sunday comes, and he dares not openly to appropriate his Maker's time to his own gain, he uses large portions of it for his own ease. He gets up late, breakfasts late. He has a part in the Sabbath school: but his working in it and staying in it both depend upon his being allowed to take his ease on Sunday morning. If it is needful to bring on work and service at an hour so early as to require the sacrifice of this morning indulgence, he dont go into it.

It is terrifying to the living soul to see many of these business Methodists in our cities. How tenaciously and avariciously they use up every hour of the six business days of each week—up by times, and at it. If tired nature ever repines at the necessity, it knows better than to decline the service. These men, and women too, often tell you that when Sunday comes they are worn out. Yes, brother, and you would be just as much worn out Friday morning, if you had to get up under the restrictions of a Sabbatical law. You will notice, brother, that you always make out to overcome those teazings of self-indulgence, only when you can gratify them out of the Lord's time. My brethren, before the Lord I warn you of this licensed thief of God's holy day. My heart trembles at the fearful encroachments of our Church, upon the solemn sanctions of the Sabbath. The evil I have designated is one of wide growth and of degenerate tendency among our business members in cities. If it is not overcome by the timely and spirited application of all those principles of duty and sacrifices of ease and self-indulgence, now so common, by the rigid and voluntary appliances of every antagonizing virtue and duty, we must, we will fall into the same category alluded to and described by God's prophet, when, in the thunder of Jehovah's curse he said, "Wo to them that are at ease in Zion."

The sum and substance of my remarks are, that there is no reliable spirit of godliness but that which will do sacrifice to God. And I earnestly beg all who wish to get to heaven to try themselves by this rule. Be not deceived, for God is not mocked.

You will ask me, no doubt, who are they that attend your morning prayer meetings? Well, they are the same, generally, that attend all the meetings of our Church, proving to my mind, very clearly, that only such as feel a sacrifice of self to be a duty of religion, will attend a series of morning prayer meetings, to pray for the peace and prosperity of Zion.

I offer these reflections for the prayerful consideration of the Church; and if our papers think them worth transferring, with their endorsement, I will write again. If not, I will cease to trouble those whose consciences will let them use all the week in their shops while a few are at the church praying, and as much of Sunday as self may plead for, while the Sunday school languishes for want of teachers, but must appeal the case to heaven, for either they or I am deceived.

GERMAN MISSION CHURCH.

Russell County, Sept. 2, 1852.

Rev. H. N. McTyeire:

My Dear Brother—Whereas my beloved P. Elder, J. C. Keener, took the liberty to publish the letter in the N. O. Christian Advocate I wrote to him privately, I take the liberty now of correcting some sentences in that letter which are calculated to misrepresent some of my dear friends. I did not mean to say that the people on Warrior Stand camp meeting were unfriendly to me and my cause, and that from their being unfriendly arose my heaviness of heart—not at all. But I should have added, that being a stranger among them I felt rather lost amid the throng of people, and being naturally of a timid, backward make, my heart felt heavy. Being called on to preach, during the exercise of preaching I unburthened my heart, and those that did not know me before, seeing and hearing my German English, began to sympathize with me when they learned the object of my visit among them.

Nor did I intend to say that Bro. Miller opposed me in presenting my cause—far from it; but under the peculiar circumstances they were in, he thought it would not be advisable to make another missionary effort, as they had already held their missionary meetings, and taken up collections and subscriptions on the whole circuit, for that purpose; also, at a previous quarterly meeting Conference the brethren resolved not to take up any more missionary collections at their camp meeting. But Bro. Garrett, the P. Elder, advised, (not insisted) after explaining my mission and the object of my visit, that I should present my cause before the congregation, to which preachers and the brethren heartily consented. I have found in Brother Miller a warm friend, a beloved brother in Christ, and a zealous advocate for the missionary cause; as also in his colleague, Bro. Freeman. I have made the acquaintance, at that place, with many warm-hearted and zealous friends to the missionary cause, and among them especially that of Rev. Dr. Ellison. He is a warm friend of the German missions, and advocates that cause admirably.

From Tuskegee, of which place I wrote you last, I went to Auburn camp meeting—started on Saturday morning, August 28, in company with Bro. Bilbro, whose house I have made my home when in the place. We reached the ground about 12 o'clock, in time to hear the concluding part of the first sermon. The meeting was to have commenced on Friday, but on account of the heavy rain the people could not gather in till Saturday. Here, also, I made acquaintance with many of the servants of God in the ministry.

On Sunday an opportunity was afforded me to present my cause. After having made a speech, and Bro. Hughes having, with warm and pathetic appeals closed, a collection and subscriptions were taken up, to the amount of $195 65; but the brethren promised, before I left the camp ground, that they would make out the $200. Thus you see that kind and warm hearted friends are making me prosperous on my tour.

Some of the brethren convoy me from place to place, so that I can save considerable traveling expenses. May God bless them for their love and friendship, which I have received at all places I have visited.

We had a glorious time at Auburn camp meeting—good and powerful preaching, full of the gospel marrow. The evening previous to my leaving, there were about thirty or forty mourners at the altar. A number found peace in believing; the shout of Israel's king was in the camp.

But now I have to take leave of my leader and guide, Bro. Garrett. I feel warmly attached to him. May God bless him.

John M. Hofer.

P. S. I have received the following note from a steward of Olivet Church:

Rev. John M. Hofer: Our missionary meeting came off yesterday, and found me in bed with a broken rib. I have addressed a note to the Secretary, to find out how much was appropriated to the German mission. You may expect $75 from Olivet. The collection was much larger than this. I shall go round as soon as opportunity offers, get the names and amount, and send it wherever you may direct. Hoping you may have abundant success, I remain your brother in Christ,

Joel Hunt.

Washington National Monument.—The Washington papers publish the following communication from the Secretary of the Washington National Monument Association, with the request that the press throughout the country will copy it. We gladly give it a place in our columns:

"As several communications from various parts of the United States have been made to the Board of Managers of the Washington Monument Society, suggesting the propriety and expediency of having boxes placed at the different polls during the approaching Presidential election, to receive contributions for the National Monument, now in the course of erection in this city, the Board, in accordance with these suggestions, respectfully request the judges or commissioners of election, the postmasters of the respective localities where the elections are held, or any other patriotic and public spirited citizens, to undertake this duty by having boxes fitted up at the polls, with the label, 'Contributions to the Washington National Monument,' etc., and collecting and transmitting the amounts so deposited to the Treasurer of the Society, J. B. H. Smith, Esq. Any expense which may attend these collections will be paid, and the service thankfully acknowledged by the Board of Managers

A VINDICATION.

Mr. Editor: "Is there sin attached to the $25,000 collection of the Alabama Conference, and is the great shame of America her penurious support of the clergy?

The affirmative of the above questions was assumed and stated by an Alabama itinerant in the town of D——, a short time since. It has so happened that he is not dependent on the Church for his support this year, as he stated "he is supported by gentlemen, and these gentlemen supported him like a gentleman."

But it was not enough that he praise the bridge that carried him safe, he must make a thrust at the American Protestants generally, and the Methodists in particular, on account of their care for the pecuniary wants of their ministers—"The amount allowed was insufficient, was given reluctantly, which was very embarrassing to him; he never felt otherwise than trammeled when dependent on the Church for his support." Now it occurs to some of us, that however true all this may be in some cases, or with a majority of cases, it should not be so in this good brother's case. It would only be necessary to name his appointments since he has been in Alabama, to satisfy every gentleman and Methodist in the State that he has been well cared for.

As to the subject in general, all that is necessary to remark is, that the disciplinary provisions for the support of our ministers has been regarded by them sufficient, if not liberal; and we never hear complaint when those claims are met; and they are generally met when the minister acts the part of one called of God to the work of the ministry.

It may be, times are to be better, as "gentlemen" are coming forward and setting the Church an example of liberality. Dont be too sanguine, ye saddle-bags men; I fear it requires that you rank among "the Patrick Henrys of the Southwest" to receive the support of those gentlemen. If so, alas for you; you had better stick to the Cross and the Church. May be "your bread and water will be sure."

And lest some might attempt to excuse the Church for this neglect of her ministry, from the liberal missionary collections of last year, particularly Alabama's $25,000, he forestalls that by stating that unholy means had been resorted to to get that money. "It was laughed out of the people; it was jeered out of them and auctioneered out of them, and no good would come of it; the curse of God would rest upon it." And to prove this position good, he referred to the failure of the Flathead Indian mission, the means to support which was raised in a similar way.

Now it was not ours to be personally connected with those remarkable collections of last year, but of the brethren who were the principal actors at those missionary meetings we have some knowledge, and know them to be men of faith and the Holy Ghost; men incapable of stooping to unlawful means to swell the collections of the Church; and then it is known to all who paid attention to the Advocate's reports of those meetings, (and these reports ought not to have escaped the notice of our good brother) that the great Head of the Church gave his sanction to those efforts, both by opening the hearts of the people to give their money, and then by richly rewarding them with the outpouring of his good Spirit; so that his work was revived, and many souls saved from death. And shall God give the seal of his approbation to the effort to raise means for the furtherance of his cause, and then after the means are raised and in the hands of his servants, as they occupy the different fields of the missionary work, stamp it with his curse? Never, never! The thought is the suggestion of the enemy, or the phantom of the orator. No, brethren at home and brethren abroad, let the success hitherto given be but the pledge that God intends to sustain the Church in her efforts to spread light and truth through all lands.

MR. ROSSER'S APPEAL.

Mr. Editor: I have read with much interest the appeal which the Rev. L. Rosser has addressed to the Southern Church, in behalf of a church in the city of Washington, D. C. I sincerely hope this appeal will be promptly and nobly heeded and responded to by Southern Methodists. While in Washington, a few weeks since, I had a conversation with an intelligent member of our Church residing there, and learned, to my surprise, that the hostility of the ministers of the Baltimore Conference towards our cause was extreme, and that no efforts were spared to obstruct its progress. As a specimen of this spirit, I will mention a single fact related to me. A member of the Baltimore Conference declared to my informant, that he would sooner go the circus than to the Southern Church in that city! Yet our friends and cause there are prospering. They have the best Methodist Church in the city, bought for the small sum of $4000. The balance due on it can be easily made up by the thousands of moneyed men among us. Brethren, we owe it to ourselves and these struggling brethren to do this.

If we do not stand by and aid our friends who espouse our cause under such circumstances as these, others will have little encouragement to do so. I am sorry to say, that if I am rightly informed, these brethren have not received the sympathy and co-operation from all Southern Methodists which they deserved. It was stated to me that a "great Methodist"—by profession—from Mississippi, who spent most of the past year in Washington, as a reporter for a paper in his State, never visited the Southern Church, but occupied a prominent seat in a Northern Methodist Church, and paid liberally for its support! Over this fact the opponents of our cause boasted not a little. Such conduct ought to be known to the community in which he lived. While such professed friends of the Church desert and betray her interests, let its real friends come forward and show our brethren at the capital that we appreciate them and the cause. Let us send on our fives, tens and twenties, and our larger sums, for in aiding this struggling church we shall do permanent good.

CONVICTION OF THE STOCKPORT RIOTERS.—It will be remembered that a serious riot occurred some time since at Stockport, England, growing out of an attempt to prevent a Catholic Sunday School procession. The trial of the rioters commenced at Chester a few weeks ago, and on the 13th ult. the jury returned the following verdict against the Irish Catholics:

Guilty against all the prisoners for a riot on the first and second counts. On the third and fourth counts, Murphy alone was found guilty of feloniously wounding the witness Pickon. On the fifth count, Naughton, guilty of an assault on Thomas Pearson. On the sixth count, Roger Mellermot, not guilty on the charge of feloniously wounding James Swindles.

Sentence was deferred, and on the following morning the court took up the charges against the "English Protestants," against whom there are no less than seven indictments for bloody, including the charges of demolishing the two Roman Catholic chapels, and the house of the priests.

STEAM RACING.—A correspondent of the N. Y. Mirror who was a passenger in the steamship Pacific on her late voyage, accuses Capt. Nye of racing against time and thus endangering the lives of his passengers. He says:

In order to make the shortest passage that was ever made on the "great circle," Capt. Nya took the northern route and ran as far north as 53 degrees; he relaxed nothing in his speed when enveloped in those fogs off Newfoundland, which must be seen to be appreciated—they are like the thick black smoke of a furnace; he run so close to Cape Broyle that he brushed to pieces with his wheels a boat and his crew who were fishing in fancied security; and just as he was going "hows on" to those rocks, hundreds of feet in height and thirty fathoms of water at their base, a sudden cry of "stop the engine—starboard your helm—hard a starboard!" was all that saved the Pacific and her passengers from instantaneous contact with a rock five hundred feet in height; and when the helm was put a-starboard, and the bows cleared the fearful barrier by a sudden sheer, the hull of that immense ship swept with a power that made one giddy, within ten feet of the precipitous rock—and the most timid, as well as the boldest, held his breath for a time.

COMPLIMENTARY.—The citizens of Mobile tendered a complimentary dinner to Capt. Shufeldt, of the steamer Black Warrior, and L. Mead, Esq., which from circumstance they felt compelled to decline.

INCIDENTS OF THE LAKE ERIE DISASTER.—The Milwaukee Sentinel gives the following incidents connected with the destruction of the Atlantis on Lake Erie:

An interesting exhibition was given of "The Faith the Skyath.

Hope that every trial bravoth," in the case of an aged couple, over seventy, who were drawn on the hurricane deck. The man was frantic with despair, but his wife, in the most beautiful expression of a heavenly trust, brought him to composure and submission.

A young married couple stood together calculating the chances of the wreck sinking before the propeller reached it. "If it does James," said the young wife, unconscious of any other fear, "be sure to keep fast hold of me, so that we shall go down together."

One lady was seen by Mr. Walbridge to throw her infant into the water, and then to leap after it. When the bow went down, the forward cabin broke away from the boat, and floated off with those that were on it, and they were rescued. It is possible that some who were struggling in the water, near the wreck, might have been helped on to it by those who could swim, but there were two considerations to hinder these efforts; the almost certainty of being drawn under by those clutching wildly at every thing, and the expectation that they should all go down together, before help arrived. When the propeller actually neared the wreck, and deliverance seemed probable, the ascriptions of praise and thanks to God went up in loud shouts from sincere hearts on bended knees and hands raised to Heaven. The propeller came up and the Captain seeing that they were about to rush, backed off, and said—"Now, if you do not preserve order, and keep calm, I will paddle off, and leave you!" The effect was instantaneous; silence was obtained; Mr. Osborne, in a loud voice, directed the men to let the women pass off first—to preserve order and silence; the propeller came alongside—the women and children were handed up first—and every one of that large number were taken on board without one falling into the water. The scenes on the propeller were heart-rending. Danger over, dreadful realities forced themselves on the mind, and the strongest sat down and wept. One young man was disconsolate in his agony of grief. "I have lost my two sisters," said he, in the most touching accents; "I could not find them in the dark!"

MORE OF THE LATE STORM AT THE EAST.—We learn from the Boston papers that in all the towns the effects of the storm have been felt severely. In Roxbury much rare and choice fruit was destroyed. In Charlestown, Somerville, Medford, and Cambridge, many valuable fruit trees, which have long since hung laden with beautiful fruit, are now stripped, large branches broken, and fruit and foliage scattered upon the ground. In Somerville a whole field of corn was leveled to the ground, and in Medford and Woburn, peach, apricot, and plum trees were stripped of fruit, broken and destroyed.

The Bangor papers state that a very heavy three days rain came to a conclusion on Saturday afternoon. A large quantity of rain fell, which was much needed.

At Newburyport, the quantity of rain which fell from Saturday night to Monday morning, at five o'clock, was 3 inches and 65-100ths.

At Salem much fruit has been blown down and overloaded trees in exposed situations have been injured.

The plums which were beginning to ripen before the storm have been very generally blown off. The sudden accession of moisture, too, swelled them so that they cracked open. Bushels now lie upon the ground in the fruit gardens of the vicinity of Boston completely ruined and few remain upon the trees.

A CLERICAL STRIKE.—The clergymen of Connecticut are complaining of their salaries as altogether inadequate to the comfortable support of themselves and families. A pamphlet has been issued by the clergymen of the Episcopal Church, setting forth the grievance. It states that the average salary of the clergy is not over $450.

POSTAGE UNDER THE NEW LAW.—The law recently passed by Congress, provides that each newspaper, periodical, unsealed circular, or other article of printed matter, not exceeding three ounces in weight, shall be sent to any part of the United States for one cent; and for every additional ounce or fraction of an ounce, one cent additional shall be charged. Newspapers and periodicals not weighing over one ounce and a half, when circulated in the State where published, shall be charged one-half of the rates before mentioned. The postage on all transient matter to be pre-paid, or shall be charged double the rates above mentioned.

Books not weighing over half pounds shall be charged one cent an ounce for all distances under three thousand miles.

CATHOLIC AND HOSPITAL FOR BRITISH EMIGRANTS.—Mr. Bunch, the British vice consul at NewYork, has returned from his visit to England, having been highly successful in obtaining subscriptions there for the purpose of erecting a church and a hospital in NewYork city for the benefit of British seamen and emigrants.

ARKANSAS RIVER.—The little Rock (Ark.) Whig of the 21st says the river was falling slowly at that point, with about three feet six inches water in the channel.

CROPS.—The Eufaw (Ala.) True Democrat gives an unfavorable account of the cotton crop in that vicinity and in the adjoining counties. The worm is said to be doing much damage.

FRESH BUTTER.—The Washington Telegraph says a patent right has been recently granted to a citizen of Ohio for the preservation of fresh butter, by a chemical process, to stand any climate for any time.

DEATH OF PROF. KINGSLEY.—The telegraph reports that Prof. James L. Kingsley, so long identified with Yale College, died on Tuesday, the 1st inst., after a few days illness, at his residence in New Haven, Conn.

RAILROAD ACCIDENT.—As the train of cars was going from Lynchburg to Liberty, Va., on Saturday, the 28th ult., and just as it entered one of the deep cuts, a large rock weighing ten or a dozen tons, fell from the overhanging bank on the track—being about five seconds in advance. It was loosened by the torrents of rain that had fallen the night before. The engine was smashed and one of the firemen slightly bruised.

The Knickerbocker for September has its usual variety of agreeable articles from old and new contributors. From the "Editor's Table" we copy the following story:

"Mr. Packenham, late British Minister at Washington, was one day dining at the residence of Hon. Senator Barrow, of Louisiana. Before dinner, and in the temporary absence of his host from the room, her Majesty's Embassador was accosted by an old colored man, who was in the room putting things to rights, with, 'Massa, is your name Packinham?' 'Yes,' said the Minister. 'Was dat your brudder dat was killed at Orleans, at de grent battle dar?' 'He was,' replied the Embassador. 'Well, dere, somehow or udder I feels sot. I was dere myself. I seed him popped ober wid my own eyes. Great tight dey, Massa!'' While at dinner, Mr. Packenham said to Mr. Barrow, "Your man tells me, sir, that he was at the battle of NewOrleans." "He was," said Mr. Barrow, "and acquitted himself manfully at that engagement," but at the same time he looked daggers at the old senesehal for having brought such a subject in presence of his guest. "He tells me, too," continued Mr. Packenham, "that he saw my brother fall." The frown upon the host's face grew darker, and the subject was adroitly changed. The next day Sam came in to Mr. Barrow with a note. "Massa, dero's a note, and dey say it's for me. Eyah! eyah! And sure enough, it was for him. Moreover, it was an invitation to dine the next day with Mr. Packenham, which he did, and was listened to with intense interest while he related the events of the great battle, all of which he saw, and part of which he was.

HOW BARNUM PURCHASED THE MUSEUM.—In an essay which Mr. P. T. Barnum contributed to Freedly's Treatise on Business, he thus alludes to the purchase of the Museum:

"In 1841 I purchased the American Museum in NewYork without a dollar, for I was not worth a dollar in the world. But I was never disheartened; I always felt that I could make money fast enough, if I only set my mind to it. I remember meeting a friend in Broadway a few weeks before I came in possession of the Museum. 'Well,' said I, 'Mr. A, I am going to buy the American Museum.' 'Buy it,' said he, for he knew I had no property; 'what do you intend buying it with?' 'Brass,' I replied, 'for silver and gold I have none.'

"It was even so. Everybody who had any connection with theatrical circus, or exhibition business, from Edmund Simpson, manager of the Park Theatre, or Wm. Niblo, down to the most humble puppet-showman of the day, know me perfectly well. Mr. Francis Olmstead, the owner of the museum building, (now deceased,) a noble, whole-souled man as one often meets with, having consulted my references, who all concurred in telling him that I was a 'good showman, and would do as I agreed,' accepted my proposition to give security for me in the purchase of the Museum collection, he appointing a money-taker at the door, and crediting me toward the purchase, all the money received after paying expences, allowing me fifty dollars per month, on which to support my family, consisting of a wife and three children. This was my own proposition, for I was determined so to live, that six hundred dollars per annum should defray all the expenses of my family until I had paid for the Museum; and my treasure of a wife (and such a wife is a 'treasure') gladly assented to the arrangement, and expressed her willingness to cut the expenses down to $400 per annum, if necessary.

"One day, some six months after I had purchased the Musem, my friend Mr. Olmstead happened in at my ticket office about 12 o'clock, and found me alone, eating my dinner, which consisted of a few slices of corn beef and bread that I had brought from home in the morning. 'Is this the way you eat your dinner?' he inquired. 'I have not eaten a warm dinner since I bought the Museum, except on the Sabbath,' I replied, 'and I intend never to eat another on a week day until I get out of debt.' 'Ah! you are safe, and will pay for the Museum before the year is out,' he replied, slapping me familiarly on the shoulders; 'and he was right, for in less than one year from that period I was in full possession of the Museum as my own property; every cent paid out of the profit of the establishment. Had I been less economical, and less determined, my expenses would have kept pace with my income; I should have lost much valuable time in going home every day to my dinner; and my present situation would probably have been very different from what it is."

Lake Pontchartrain and the Railroad.

NUMBER IV.

FORM SUGGESTED FOR A TRACK ON PILES.

1. Let the piles be of red cypress, or good heart pine, fourteen by fourteen inches. Let them be driven ten feet in the ground in blue clay, and this will secure their full strength. If the bottom be less firm then this clay, a greater depth may be requisite.

2. Let there be two lines of piles, called track supporters, driven vertically five feet from centre to centre, transverse to the line, and ten feet from centre to centre, in line.

3. Let there be two additional lines, called bracers, driven, one on each side of, and transversely in line with, the track supporters. Let them incline inwardly ten or twelve degrees, and at their upper ends be two and a half feet from the supporters.

4. Let the piles be cut half off at five feet above the mean level of the Lake, to form a shoulder transverse to the line, for the reception of the main ties, which are in like manner to be cut half in twain.

5. Let the main ties, or cops, be ten by fourteen inches, pine lumber, (clear of sap, like all other timbers used,) sixteen feet long, projecting three feet from the outside of the brace piles.

6. Let both the supporters and bracers be cut off at the surface of the cops.

7. Let the stringers by ten by fourteen inches, set on side, upon the supporters, and spiked securely to both cop and pile, by an oblique bolt passing through all three, and clinching.

8. Let the rails (a flat or U rail being preferable) be laid on the stringers, without ties, near to their outer edge, and inside of them, at three inches distance, six by six inch scantlings, be securely bolted to the stringers, to act as fenders, and prevent the possibility of the cars running off the track.

9. Let the whole be perfectly floored with four inch scantling, both inside and outside of the track.

10. Let there be a second wood railing four feet high on each outside of the plank road thus made.

11. Wherever the water is more than fifteen feet deep, let the piles be braced to each other on their inside by scantling, such as is used for flooring, placed at extreme low water mark. Or let there be a tie made of two scantlings, bolted on opposite sides of blocks as wide as the piles, the blocks placed one at each end of the scantling, and the tie thus made be dropped over the line of transverse piles, and sunk to the desired depth, upon cleats fastened to the piles before driving. Let oblique braces be set upon these at one bracer, and reach up to the base of the cap on the opposite bracer. Both these bracings, or their equivalents, may be necessary.

12. Let there be three draw-bridges, with proper jetties for the convenient admission and transit of vessels—one placed near the middle, and one near each side in water ten feet deep. Let each draw have forty feet span.

13. The commerce of the Lake has reference almost wholly to NewOrleans, and therefore runs in lines parallel to the proposed road; and hence the inconvenience occasioned would be very slight. Vessels on either side of the track would cross on that side, and therefore not pass the draw until reaching the opposite side. Still, a draw and a railroad turnout would probably both be needed in the centre, for the convenience of any vessels bound from the pass out to sea, and for the passing of cars bound in opposite directions. The central work would be somewhat expensive; and I have made an estimate of $40,000 for it. Each of the other draws I have estimated at $25,000, being constructed in shallower water, and without a turnout, or any expensive feature.

14. The distance across Lake Pontchartrain, from any point on its shore within the city limits, is twenty-five miles, and the mean depth, as shown in No. 1, (August 25,) is sixteen feet.

15. I have made an estimate of the cost of constructing a mile of railroad as specified above, based upon the best data I can obtain, and at prices of materials and labor such as have been usual for several past years. These have been examined by several competent engineers and contractors; and are submitted with confidence that they are not wide of the truth.

16. The leading prices of material are: Piles, stringers and cops, ten cents per running foot; pine scantling, ten dollars per thousand; railroad iron, including chairs and spikes, five thousand dollars per mile; driving piles, three dollars and fifty cents each, or, eight thousand and ninety-two dollars per mile; laying wood-work of track, two thousand four hundred dollars, and iron rails, five hundred dollars per mile. The cost per mile by these estimates, is thirty-six thousand six hundred and fifty-four dollars, and the whole cost, including the draw-bridges, is one million six thousand three hundred and fifty dollars.

17. No estimates are made for the railing, because it may be made to cost much or little, at pleasure. A wood rail, set on posts, firmly screwed to the projecting ends of the caps, and braced to each other diagonally with like rails, would suffice, and cost very little. It would be erected chiefly for the safety of persons on foot, and to give a feeling of security to passengers on the cars. The plan of the track and fenders is such as to give absolute security from running off the track.

18. It would probably be necessary to protect the piles from rotting, by a coat of mineral paint down to the lowest water mark. No estimate has been made for this. These two expenditures, if both made, would probably raise the estimate per mile to thirty-seven thousand five hundred dollars, and the whole estimated cost of the road through the Lake to one million twenty-five thousand five hundred dollars.

19. Should the railroad from NewOrleans to Jackson, Mississippi, be constructed on this route, its distance would be shortened by about twenty miles; and from all I have been able to learn, the difficulties and the expense of constructing and maintaining it would be diminished rather than increased; and if this be true, it is manifest that in a very few years a rival road would be built on the shorter line, and thus render almost worthless the investment of a million of dollars obtained by taxation upon city property. It would be easy to make the experiment, by boring or driving a few piles, at intervals, through the lake, whether my inference as to the soundness of the bottom be correct. Without some such test I do not perceive how so great a deviation from the right line can be justified. The test might show that I am wholly in error, and if so, no one will more promptly abandon the scheme.

It will not be forgotten that twenty miles additional length of line, on such ground as is found around Lake Pontchartrain, involves the expenditure, in repairs, wear and tear, of not less than $20,000, or the interest on $400,000, which might be wholly saved, if the Lake line cost no more per mile for repairs, etc., and I believe it will not. The difference in distance, viewed as time, I shall not attempt to estimate in dollars.

Without any other interest than that of a citizen, paying, as I cheerfully do, my share of the contribution for railroad purposes—wholly unprompted and unremunerated by any person or association for the interest I have taken in this investigation, I submit these suggestions to a discriminating public; satisfied that if they are well founded they will not be long neglected, and content, if not well founded, with having done what appeared to be my duty.

PROGRESS OF MORMONISM.—It is astonishing how this queer and despised doctrine goes ahead in all countries. The mission in India seems to be stealing a march on the Christian missions there. The Latter Day Saints in and within forty miles of Calcutta are 592, of whom 170 are ryots or native husbandmen. Nearly all of them were professing Christians before becoming Mormons. There are also many others who desire to become Saints, and are only waiting to be baptised by Elder Willis. At Bombay, Elder Findley is also sowing the seed of a future rich harvest to the church. Elder Willis has ordained two other Elders, J. P. Melk and M. Cuue. He says the coldness and divisions among the sects there are favorable to the cause of Mormon truth. The Elders have been blessed with the gift of healing. The Saints in Hindostan, with one heart, sustain the authorities of the church, President Young, Kimball and Richards, the Twelve, the Seventies, the High Council, and all the organization of the Church in Deseret, and elsewhere, and pray that Heaven's blessings may continue to be poured out on them.

TREASURES OF THE DEEP.—The Boston Courier says that within a few weeks a new effort has been made to explore the wreck of the British frigate Plumper, which was sunk near Dipper Harbor, about half way between Eastport and St. John, New Brunswick, with some seventy-five lives and from 50,000 to $100,000 in specie, in 1815. The wreck lies forty-two feet below the surface of the water; is of course much decayed, and the adventurous explorers had to overturn the washings of sands, etc., which covers her some six feet below the bottom. They have brought up about $220 in Spanish silver, mostly whole and halves, the action of the sea having made them lighter than the original weight, and they were blackened as if by powder, having evidently been taken from the magazine. Remnants of pistols, grape shot, etc., were also brought up, and, as a sad accompaniment, many human skulls. The party will continue its explorations for the present.

A FLYING SHIP.—Mr. Rufus Porter continues his labors at Washington on a machine with which he expects to be able to navigate the atmosphere. It appears that a joint stock company has been raised and the necessary funds subscribed. This shows confidence in the ability of Mr. Porter to affect the object in view. The machine now being constructed is calculated to carry forty passengers, and Mr. Porter intimates, that if the weather continues fair, he will be able to give a public exhibition in the course of a few weeks. From the skill and ability of Mr. Porter, it is expected that the experiment of navigating the air will be fairly and fully tried.

COINAGE AT THE PHILADELPHIA MINT.—Since the first of January, the sum of $32,049,035 in gold has been deposited at the Philadelphia mint, against $26,005,141 during the same period last year. There were coined during the past month 2,078,274 pieces of silver, including 1,436,000 three cent pieces, 70,000 half dimes, 422,800 dimes, 15,100 half dollars, and 1,100 dollars. The gold coinage of the month amounts to 492,974 pieces, and includes 176,279 double eagles, 18,768 eagles, 45,268 half eagles, 74,712 quarter eagles, and 178,952 gold dollars. Total coinage of gold and silver, during August, $4,346,899.

... "Who's there?" asked Mary, trembling as ... she looked forth.

... The storm was over, and the moon was up;
... it shone upon broken clouds above, and below
... upon houses black with moisture, and upon little
... lakes of the fallen rains curling into silver be-
... neath the quick enchantment of a breeze. A ... young man in a sailor's dress, wet as if he had

... under the window. Mary recognized him as one
... whose livelihood was gained by short voyages
... along the coast; nor did she forgot, that, prov-
... ous to her marriage, he had been an unsucces-
... ful wooer of her own.

... "What do you seek here, Stephen?" said she.

... "Cheer up, Mary, for I seek to comfort you," answered the rejected lover. "You must know I got home not ten minutes ago, and the first thing my good mother told me was the news about your husband. So without saying a word to the old woman, I clapt on my hat, and ran out of the house. I couldn't have slept a wink before speaking to you, Mary, for the sake of old times."

... "Stephen, I thought better of you!" exclaimed the widow, with gushing tears, and preparing to close the lattice; for she was no whit inclined to imitate the first wife of Zadig.

... "But stop and hear my story ont," cried the young sailor; "I tell you we spoke a brig yes-terday afternoon, bound in from Old England. And who do you think I saw standing on deck, well and hearty, only a bit thinner than he was five months ago?"

... Mary leaned from the window but could not speak.

... "Why, it was your husband himself," con-tinued the generous seaman. "He and three others saved themselves on a spar when the Blessing turned bottom upwards. The brig will beat into the bay by daylight, with this wind, and you'll see him there to-morrow. There's the comfort I bring you, Mary, and so good night."

... He hurried away, while Mary watched him with a doubt of waking reality, that seemed stronger or weaker as he alternately entered the shade of the houses or emerged into the broad streaks of moonlight. Gradually, how-ever, a blessed flood of conviction swelled into her heart, in strength enough to overwhelm her, and had its increase been more abrupt. Her first impulse was to rouse her sister-in-law, and com-municate the new-born gladness. She opened the chamber door, which had been closed in the course of the night, though not latched, and ad-vanced to the bedside, and was about to lay her hand upon the slumberer's shoulder. But then she remembered that Margaret would awake to thoughts of death and woe, rendered not the less bitter by their contrast with her own felicity. She sheltered the rays of the lamp to fall upon the unconscious form of the bereaved one. Mar-garet lay in unquiet sleep, and the drapery was displaced around her; her young cheek was rosy-tinted, and her lips half opened in a vivid smile; an expression of joy, debarred its pas-sage by her sealed eyelids, struggled forth like incense from the whole countenance.

... "My poor sister! you will waken too soon from that happy dream," thought Mary.

... Before retiring, she set down the lamp and endeavored to arrange the bed clothes so that the chill air might not do harm to the feverish slumberer. But her hand trembled against Margaret's neck, a tear also fell upon her cheek, and she suddenly awoke.

... Count D'Orsay.—The London Globe contains the fol-lowing notice of this distinguished individual, recently deceased:

... That Count D'Orsay was born at Paris precisely at the opening of the present century, would appear, from the fact of Lord Byron's expressing his astonishment at the precocity exhibited in a certain MS. diary from the Count's pen, perused by his Lordship at Genoa. (April 5, 1823). D'Orsay had hereditary pretensions to peculiar social amenities and tact; but to these reminiscences was su-peradded, in his person, the soldiership and chivalry of his father, General D'Orsay, an old campaigner of the

... [illegible] should have penetrated, not the fact, but the mystery of the English ennui, at twenty-two. I was about the same age when I made the same discovery, in almost precisely the same circles." In his twentieth year he had already relinquished the gayeties of London and entered the French service; for it was while quartered at Valence, on the Rhone, Novem-ber 15, 1822, that an occurrence took place which changed his whole destiny, and turned back his existence into the former channels of London life. The reader of Lady Blessington's "Idler in Italy" will look in vain for any notice of her first casual rencontre with Lieutenant D'Or-say at Valence, though she does remark that singular coincidence, "Napoleon, when Lieutenant, was quartered in this town." The regimental mess happened to be established in the hotel where Lord Blessington alighted on his way to Italy, down the Rhone, and a chance ac-quaintanceship, having ripened into intimacy, at his Lordship's invitation the Count joined them in their trip southwards. The regiment was just then under orders to march with the Duc D'Angoulame across the Pyrenees, and the young French officer had to expect the sarcasms of the uninitiated as to his motives for quitting the ser-vice at that particular juncture.

... The arrival of this strangely constituted traveling par-ty at Asti is thus chronicled by Byron: "Mitford Bless-ington and spouse, traveling with a very handsome com-panion in the shape of a French Count, who has all the air and graces of a Frenchman before the Revolution." Concerning the Earl of Blessington, his individuality may be well conferred, but we are not left to our surmises as to the sort of taste he must have been. Byron adds: "Mentality (for the gentlemen are the finest race in the famous Irish Viceroy of that title) seems very good natured, but is much tamed since I recollect him in all the glory of grass and snuff-boxes, and uniforms and theatricals, sitting to Sampling, the painter, to be depicted as one of the he-roes of Agincourt."

... It was finally arranged that D'Orsay was to be a fixture in the family, by becoming the husband of Hon. Harriet Gardiner, his Lordship's daughter, by his first wife. This young and beautiful person was summoned, accordingly, from school, and forthwith married to the Count, on the 16th of September, in obedience to her father's mandate. Celebration of the Battle of Bennington on the Battle-Ground.

The hills of Bennington battle-field on the 16th of August, 1852, were green with the summer's verdure and untrodden by the ruthless hands of war. But a host was there—none the less mighty in its numbers, and none the less glorious in its noble object, than the thousands who trod their woody sides on the 16th of August, 1777.

The sons and daughters, the grandsons and granddaughters of those who poured out their best blood like water on that eventful day, had, on this day, assembled to offer their mutual congratulations for the blessings secured to them and their descendents by that glorious conflict, and to foster in their breasts that flame of zealous patriotism which animated their heroic sires.

There were, it is said, five thousand people on the ground—many of them our most distinguish-ed citizens. The great hero of the day, how-ever, was William Stark, of New York, a grand-son of the old Revolutionary hero, and a cele-brated poet. People flocked to see him with an eagerness which showed how well they remem-bered his noble ancestor, and how proud they were, now as he was gone, to do honor to his descendent.

There was but one revolutionary soldier present—the only one who was able to be conveyed thither, and the meeting between the war-worn veteran and the descendant of his idolized general was the most inter-esting and affecting feature of the day. The old soldier fixed his eyes long and earnestly upon him, as if to recall some resemblance to his gen-eral, and then grasping his hand in both of his, he exclaimed, with the tears coursing down his furrowed cheeks—"God bless General Stark and all his posterity!" May they live forever." The tears shed by the old hero were not the only ones that fell on that occasion, for many a fairer cheek and brighter eye shone with a pearly dew-drop, forced from the currents of a sympathiz-ing heart.

The day was spent in feasting, in firing of cannon, in listening to strains of martial music, the ringing of bells, toast, sentiments, songs and speeches.

Among the speakers and guests were Hon. Geo. Gould, Hon. N. B. Olin, Maj. Gen. Wool, Maj. Gen. Davis, of Troy, N. Y.; Hon. J. D. Bigelow, Hon. Ira Harris, Albany, N. Y.; Maj. Gen. Lloyd, William Stark, Esq., Col. H. H. Day, Hon. J. B. Thayer, Hon. J. E. White, New York City; Gov. Williams, Gov. Sargent, of Vermont; and many other gentlemen of dis-tinction from all parts of the country.

There were two immense dinners given. One, a public one, at which one thousand people sat down; the other a private one, all at the ex-pense of O. H. Burnham, Esq., a wealthy gen-tleman of New York city, at which six hundred sat down.

The speeches were of the very highest order. Mr. Sturk's speech, in particular, was the finest thing of the kind I ever listened to. This gen-tleman is an orator as well as poet, and bids fair to earn as great a name in the arts of peace as did his illustrious forefather in the arts of war.

Upon the whole it was a glorious celebration—one which will show its effects for years, and render all those who were present, and every one who may come within the sphere of their in-fluence, more firmly devoted to the common good of our common country.

Earthquake in Cuba—Lose of Life—Vast Amount of Property Destroyed.

By the arrival at Mobile of the steamer Black Warrior, we have dates from Havana to the 33d ult., and accounts of a terrible earthquake at Santiago de Cuba. The shocks commenced on the 20th, and continued on the 21st and 22d. At last accounts the shocks still continued, and half the city was in ruins.

An extra from the Orden, a paper published at Santiago, of the 21st, says:

All the streets are blocked up with rubbish, cornices and ruins of edifices. All the houses have suffered, more or less, and a large number of them are not inhabitable.

The inhabitants have taken refuge in the estanzias and in the country houses of the vicinity—on board of the vessels, upon the public squares and promenades, flying from the houses which threaten to fall and crush them.

The city presents a heart-rending spectacle; husbands, wives, fathers, children, brothers and sisters, searching for each other, and only meeting to offer their prayers for their preservation. Sighs, tears and wailings are all that are heard and seen.

In the midst of this confusion we dare not relate all that we have seen and heard, for fear of error; nevertheless, we will not fail to observe that, notwithstanding the terrible calamity, thank heaven but few lives have been lost.

An extra of the 22d, from the office of the Redactor, also published at Santiago, adds:

When we took our pen on the day before yesterday, to give an account of terrific earthquakes which occurred on the morning of the 20th, we announced that the Divine visitation which had fallen upon us had not ceased. Since, the shocks have been repeated, more or less se-verely, and with great destruction of property. But the one which created the greatest alarm by its fearful vi-lence, occurred at thirty-five minutes past three in the morning, and which was repeated in two minutes, but with less force. Indeed, we may say that the earth on which we stand has been in continual motion; shocks, with a sound like the thunder of a battery, are felt and heard regularly at intervals of about half an hour. Such is the condition of our affrighted population, that at the noise of a cart, ar anything like it, at once cries of mercy and prayers to the Most High burst forth in fearful despera-tion.

Yesterday, when we hoped that our prayers had ap-peased the Divine wrath, another shock was felt, though less severe and distinctly heard by all the inhabitants of Cuba. It was repeated a few moments after, but with less severity.

The afternoon was calm, but the atmosphere had not brightened as we had hoped after so hard a rain, and at a quarter past nine, another severe shock was felt. This morning we have felt two slight oscillations, which makes us still fear that the penalty for our sins is not yet paid.

Our population is still encamped night and day in the streets and public places, and a large number of barracks and stores have been established in the country.

The shipping in the port is occupied by a crowd of per-sons, who took refuge on board for safety in the melan-choly state of affairs, and are treated with every kindness by the captains and crews, upon whose hospitality they have thrown themselves.

The shipping in the bay, whether Spanish or foreign, the steamer Cardenas included, rode out the storm bravely. The captain of the English vessels moored off Punte-de-Salas, hastened to come on our quay in their boats, and begged every body they saw to come off with them to their vessels. Per contra, we could hardly restrain our indigna-tion on witnessing the conduct of the captain of the American ship John Strond, who, although he saw a whole people in tears, flying towards the quay, ordered his crew to cast off the planks that afforded the means of reaching the vessel.

The writer indulges in some bitter reflections on the Yankees generally, and calls the Cubans fools to look to them for sympathy or aid. The Redactor adds:

"It is our painful duty to state that the demage done in the city will take one million and a half, or two mil-lions of dollars, to repair it. So far, we have nothing more exact than mere conjecture on the amount of the devasta-tion in the country.

"Letters just received from Sattadero, state that the same terrible disaster extended to that village.

"We presume that Baracoa shared the same late, as the steamer General Armero, from Havana, which was to have left Baracoa last Friday, has not yet arrived here, although due yesterday."

The Mobile Tribune, of Saturday, has the following from Havana:

"The authorities had at last ferreted out the place of publication of La Voz del Pueblo. Some four hundred per-sons, supposed to be concerned in its publication and dis-tribution, had, it was stated, been apprehended and thrown into prison. A clerk in the house of Drake, Bros. & Co. had been arrested, and a young man employed in another mercantile house, implicated in the matter, man-aged to escape on board of a vessel.

"A great deal of sickness prevailed in Havana—mostly yellow fever—and the mortality was unusually great. The accounts, however, taken out by the steamship Cres-cent City to New York were greatly exaggerated.

"Business was very dull, and the shipping in port much reduced."

Important Letter from Havana.

The Picayune has been permitted to publish the follow-ing interesting letter from a gentleman in Havana to a friend in this city. It is said that the position of the gen-tleman is such as to enable him to obtain the most correct information relative to political events:

HAVANA, August 31, 1852.

My Dear Friend—You ask me what faith is to be placed in the rumors which have reached your city as to the ex-tended conspiracy said to have been discovered to exist among the native inhabitants to overthrow the actual Government of this Island. And as it is not mere idle cu-riosity which has induced this question, I will give you such facts respecting the matter as have come to my knowledge, in order that you may draw your own conclu-sions upon the subject.

The discontent which has for a long time past existed among the Creoles of Cuba against their Spanish rulers, arrived at length to such a pitch that a few of the more daring at Puerto Principe and Trinidad, in the month of July, 1851, openly showed themselves in rebellion against the authorities, by whom they were speedily captured and shot. The examples than made, instead of having the effect of overawing and deterring others from like at-tempts, appears to have had a contrary effect—the dis-affection to the Government being now greater than ever.

Some two months ago a paper, of small dimensions, called the Voz del Pueblo, or the Organ of Cuban Inde-pendence, made its appearance simultaneously, advocating the principles indicated by its title. This, of course, re-quires very great secrecy in its management, and the par-ties engaged in the press contrived to baffle all the en-deavors of the police to discover their whereabouts. They had issued three numbers, and were, in the act of throw-ing off the proofs of the fourth semi-monthly number, to have been distributed on the anniversary of Gen. Lopez's execution, when seven of them were surprised by the po-lice, headed by the Political Secretary, Mr. Galiano, at a house in the Calle de Obispo, about eight o'clock on the morning of the 23d inst. The names of these individual, you will receive time enough to learn that an English mu-latto of the name of Johnston, having accidentally be-come aware of the place in which these men were em-ployed upon the press, has, in the hope of reward, given in-formation of the circumstance to Mr. Galiano, which re-sulted in the capture of the parties in the very act of throwing off the proofs. Most of the persons concerned in this affair are men of respectability, well known in this city. Mr. Zenea is a celebrated Cuban poet, Mr. Delgado is the wealthy contractor for the nieces at the Cham-pe Santo. I understand that four of the seven are in a few days to suffer death by the garrote.

There are so many rumors floating about the city as to the extent of the pretended conspiracy, that it is really a difficult matter to arrive at anything like the truth; and were it not for the unmeaning lies of the daily editorials published in the journals, but which I am assured are written in the Palace, I should hesitate in giving them any credence at all.

But I cannot imagine that the Government would put forth such threats as you have observed in the papers from this place, unless they had good cause for so doing. The reason is this: While searching for the secret press, a short time ago, the police unexpectedly discovered, in a house in the Calzada de St. Lazaro, an immense quantity of ball cartridges and powder. This led to further investi-gation; more cartridges, etc., were found in other places, and upon the information of a Frenchman named Francisco Pagnoth y Pedin, who, it is said, has been largely rewarded, a considerable force of cavalry was se-cretly despatched by the Government to an estate belong-ing to the Jesuits, in the neighborhood of San Cristoval in the Vuelta de Abajo, which resulted in the capture of one hundred and forty men, seven cases of muskets, con-taining eight muskets each, two small cannon, and other ammunition of war. Eighteen of the chiefs have been brought to Havana, and upwards of nine hundred prisoners are on their way here.

The ex-Governor of San Cristoval and the Assessor of Pinc del Rio, are, I understand, also on their way under arrest on suspicion of connivance.

It appears that the Government have just learned that about six weeks ago an American schooner arrived at Cayo Felipe, on the South coast of this Island, and put on board a small Cuban schooner a great number of cases, supposed to contain muskets, which were disembarked at a given point on the main land, where they were received by a man named Crucco, who had them conveyed on ox carts to an estate which he told the drivers belonged to Mr. Dia Alvarez. The carmen were of course ignorant of the contents of the boxes, but most of them having since been apprehended, acknowledged that about the time stated they had been employed to cart a considera-ble number of boxes, the contents being to them unknown. Crucco, it appears, has falsely told them that the property where they had left the boxes belonged to Alvarez, be-cause in their examinations they described the place as low level land, whilst the estate of Mr. Alvarez is very hil-ly and altogether in another direction. It was quite evi-dent that the men had purposely been misinformed, and the Government now fear that so much time having elapsed, the arms in question have been distributed among the natives. Although nothing was discovered on the property of Mr. Alvarez, he is under arrest in the Moro. Crucco has as yet evaded the vigilance of the police.

The forts are full of prisoners, and the state of insecurity is such that no man retires for the night certain that before daylight he may not be carried from his house and lodged in one of the forts. The excitement here is intense; but so great is the fear of these unhappy people, as a sin-gle word of theirs may occasion their arrest and punish-ment, that it is only to tried friends they venture to express their hopes that the disaffection begun at San Cristoval may result in their favor. It is the opinion of a gentleman who has resided sometime on the island, and who has had frequent opportunities of mixing freely with them, that the Creole, driven to desperation by the tyran-ny exercised over them by their Spanish rulers, will rather than longer submit to the sway of a people hated with an hatred so bitter as that they have towards the Spaniards, invite the colored people to join them, if not the very slaves themselves. I shudder when I think what could be the result of such an act if carried into effect; but I doubt not that the natives of Cuba, failing to obtain in-dependence of themselves, or by assistance from abroad, will resort to that desperate extreme. I cannot help thinking that (knowing the dissatisfaction which exists throughout the Island to Spanish rule) had the last expe-dition not been so unfortunate as to lose, at the very onset of their disembarkation here, (through the mistaken plan which separated Crittenden's command, fifty of Lopez's best men,) a different result might have been expected; because the same tactics which conveyed the news of the arrival of Gen. Lopez on the Island to the people of the interior, likewise conveyed the fatal intelligence of the capture of Crittenden's force attempting to escape, as the Government took care should be generally known, and their heavy execution. The natives, knowing this for a fact, could not but believe that the expedition had been routed from the moment of its landing, and consequently no efforts of theirs, without arms, could be available under the circumstances.

Several women, said to be implicated in these schemes, are also under arrest. Of these, a Senorita Guerra, a young lady eighteen years of age, of surpassing beauty, was brought here recently from Puerto Principe. It is said it was discovered that she was in correspondence with some expatriated relatives in the North, and at the time of her arrest was found embroidering the lone star flag of Cuba, besides having been overheard to indulge rather too freely in her opinions of the Spanish authorities. The conduct of this girl, since her confinement here, has created a general feeling of admiration, even among the detested Catalans, from her indomitable courage and independence. When asked if she was not sorry for what she had done, and if she would be willing to abandon the pernicious ideas which she had been disseminating at Principe, she replied that her own conscience exonerated her for anything she had done in venturing openly to express her opinions in regard to her country's oppressors, and that those opinions would never change. Belonging to a respectable family, and the cell in which she was placed in solitary confinement being without any kind of furniture, the governor of the jail, a very humane sort of person, felt some consideration for her, and offered to make the place more comfortable. "You may," said she, "if you choose, send me a table, a wash-ing, looking-glass and a bottle of pomatum." "Would you not also like to have a cot to lay down upon?"—(there being only a raised stone bench for the prisoners to sleep upon.) "Just as you think proper, governor," she replied. "I would undergo greater hardships than this; sleeping on cold stones would cause me no inconvenience if my poor services could in any way conduce to the liberty and inde-pendence of my adored country." Two or three other females were brought from Principe about the same time, charged with similar offences.

Col. Iturea, the Lieutenant Governor of Quines, late of Mariel, arrived in town last week [illegible] sixty charges of tyrannical and oppressive [illegible] people of Quines. Col. Herrera Bovila, an aide-de-camp of Gen. Ta-con, has been sent to reign at Quines in his stead. The Lieutenant Governor of Santiago, a small town near Guines, has likewise been recalled under similar circum-stances.

To sum up, domiciliary visits at all hours of the night and day, arrests innumerable of hourly occurrence, the discoveries continually made of immense depots of arms and ammunition, coupled with the measures launched forth in the Diarios, under the orders of the Government, can not fail to attract your attention, and induces the belief that there is some reason for declaring that the political aspect of affairs in this Island appear to be in estate any-thing but tranquil.

The following is a list of the individuals denounced by the English mulatto Johnson, seven of whom were appre-hended on the night of the 23d inst., secretly engaged in throwing off the proofs of the fourth number of the jour-nal Voz del Pueblo, advocating the principles of Cuban in-dependence:

Don Francisco Faciolo, proprietor of the press; Ilde-fonso Estrada y Zenea, a poet of celebrity; Edwardo Sa-rrol, Felix Canal Florentino Torres, Juan Antonio Granados, Antonio Rubio, Ladislas Urquio; Francisco Delgado, com-mer, brother of one of the editors of the Diario de la Mari-na, and to others.

The boldness of the Creoles must indeed have under-gone a change, when, in spite of the menaces of the Gov-ernment, and the certain fate which the Spaniards do not hesitate to say awaits those who were found engaged in the Voz del Pueblo, they should have, notwithstanding all this, venture to publish another clandestine paper, which has just been issued, detailing exactly how the par-ties concerned in the Voz were captured through the in-strumentality of the wretch Johnston, (who is threatened with the consequences of his treachery,) and laughing to scorn the idea of the Government supposing that the press from which emanated the Voz del Pueblo was the only one which existed in the Island. It is rumored that thirteen of these secret presses are at work all over the Island. Another, it is said, was captured yesterday at a small town in the interior, called Santiago de los Banoe, together with a few muskets, some powder and lead.

I am promised a copy of this new seditious paper, which, if I receive in time, I will transmit to you by this oppor-tunity. In the meantime, I think you will be better able to judge of the state of affairs here by a careful perusal of the accompanying slips, taken from the Government jour-nals, which speak volumes as to the alarm experienced by the Government; or else it is difficult to understand what necessity there could be for the publication of such me-nsces, if the Island was in the happy state of tranquility which the Government strive by every means in their power to induce us to believe is the fact. Unhappily the latter is not the case, and although up till this moment the authorities have not resorted to any extreme mea-sures in putting any of their victims to death, I will ven-ture to predict that after the departure of the present steamers for the South, the horrid spectacles will com-mence. I hope most sincerely that I may be wrong in my supposition, but I very much doubt whether the blood-thirsty character of the Spaniards will, upon this occa-sion, be appeased by mere imprisonment.

P. S. The mails from the interior arrived last night, bringing the disastrous intelligence of the almost total de-struction by earthquake of the city of Santiago de Cuba, the next city at importance to Havana.

It appears all the towns in the eastern division of the Island have more or less suffered. I send you a slip taken from the Diario de la Marina, detailing at some length the particulars of this terrible catastrophe. I almost pity these poor authorities, for assuredly they have sufficient to occupy their attention, without the elements also join-ing in the strife against them.

HAVANA, August 31, 1852—10:15.

I have this moment been positively assured that the capture by the police, a few evenings ago, of the supposed Voz del Pueblo, was not the real "simon pure," but another affair altogether, got up by the parties apprehended at the time, who, becoming impatient at the non-appearance of the fourth number of the "Voz," determined to strike one off themselves, and were emboldened in the act. This is all described in the fourth number of the true Voz del Pueblo, which has made its appearance, much to the mor-tification of the Government, got up exactly in the same style as the three previous numbers—same type, size and form!

N. B. The steamer Black Warrior is on the point of de-parture, and my friend has not yet brought me the Voz del Pueblo, which I am assured exists. If he brings it in time, you shall have it; if not, I will send it by the Cres-cent City, on the 3d of September.

BAYOU PLAQUEMINE.—The last number of the Iberville Sentinel says, under the above caption:

The bottom of this bayou is again dry, and the scien-tific and philosophic mind would find much to create in-terest by examining it in its present condition. The bottom seems to be one solid mass of iron ore, judging from its color, weight and hardness; indeed, large lumps of this ore in its pure state can be found in large quantities; the strata, however, is very thin—large and deep holes, now filled with water, having been cut through by the action of the current in several places, finding a depth perhaps on a level with that of the bed of the river. There is a distance of about thirty feet from the bottom of the bayou to the top of the bank, and yet all over the bottom there are stumps of cypress trees, which have been cut down by the axe. Now, in this section of the State we are well aware that all ravines were once water courses. The conclusion then is, that this bayou was at one time (but at what distant epoch the mind staggers in deter-mining) an original outlet of the Mississippi; that in subsequently closed, when young cypresses sprang up, grew to be full trees from four to six feet in thickness—were then felled by the axe of the early settlers, when the water from the river began again to flow in that direction.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE.—The flourishing town of Parkville, in Platte county, Mo., was almost entirely destroyed by fire on the night of the 25th ult. The loss is estimated at $40,000.

PERSECUTION OF THE JEWS BY RUSSIA.—A letter in the New York Express, dated Warsaw, Poland, August 1, after stating that the Cholera was raging there, and that ninety persons died, adds the following in relation to the perse-cution of the unfortunate Jews by Russia:

An imperial ukase is printed, which commands all men under the age of 60, who desire to raise beards, to notify the local authorities of their wish. Upon the payment of a heavy fee, the magistrate will give a permit to the citi-zen to wear a beard. The permit and fee are to be re-newed semi-annually. He who fails to notify the authori-ties, or neglects to procure the permit and honor tax, yet wears a beard in defiance of the ukase, makes himself liable to a heavy fine and to a severe bodily chastisement with the knout. This is a rather severe and tyrannical law, es-pecially to the poor Jews, who reside in this country in great numbers, ontnumbering, in some places, the Chris-tian and Gentile population. Those religious tenets, (the law of Moses,) you know, do not allow them to shave the beard or cut the hair off the head, and many of them are too poor to pay for the permit. These Jews, therefore, are exposed to great cruelty and persecution on the part of the Russian minions—low, ignorant and brutal officials, the most of them, whose hardened hearts delight in the cruel and unmerciful whippings inflicted upon the de-spised and hated descendants of Abraham. Russian and Polish prejudice prompts the official executioner to add stroke to stroke even above the prescribed lawful standard, until several victims of this species of cruelty, a few days since, actually died under the knout. But there is none that dares raise his voice against such wanton, wilful murder.

A STARTLING INCIDENT.—The Boston Journal states that during divine service two Sundays since, in the First Congregational Church, at North Chelsea, a rabid dog of enormous size rushed up a side aisle, and commenced an attack on a pew in which a family were seated. Failing to get into the pew, he made a rush at the pulpit, beating his head against the railing, and finally falling exhausted. He was then dragged out and killed.

The Prin-cipal, with the aid of female teachers, who also live in the Seminary, diligently guard and form the morals, manners and habits.

There is but one session of ten months. The ensuing school year will commence on Thursday the 23d of Sep-tember, 1852. Pupils can enter at any time during the year, chargeable from the time of entrance. No deduc-tion will be made but by special arrangement with, or at the discretion of the Principal.

LETTER FROM ENGLAND.

WESLEYAN CONFERENCE.

The Conference of 1849 was momentous and memorable because of the expulsion of Everett, Dunn and Griffith, and of the determination evinced by the Conference to go to the bottom, if possible, of the "Fly Sheet" business. Then commenced the terrible agitation which the materials had been in preparation for years, and of which the effect is not spent. The Conference of 1850 was the starting point of the agitation. Then Dr. Beaumley, after many years of singular forbearance, and after a year of agitation rendered more and more aggravated, in spite of his distinct and unequivocate pledges given to the previous Conference, was put away from the Conference in which it was impossible for him any longer to remain. Immediately after that Conference—indeed, I believe, before the conclusion of its sitting—the agitators in connection assembled, resolved collectively, and published their resolution, to do, what many indeed had previously done, and the organ of the agitators had urged all to do, but what all had not agreed to do, and even of the agitators had opposed being done, until then—that is, immediately to stop all supplies both to circuit and connectional funds, and to persist in this course until the Conference should have yielded to their demands. The Conference of 1850 published a formal reply to the constitutional memorials received from the circuits, in which, while reaffirming its great principles, and declining, for the present, to consider any changes in minor matters which might in themselves be desirable, the Conference yet avowed its willingness, at a future and suitable time, to take into consideration alterations in non-essential particulars which might be brought under its attention in a constitutional way. The agitation, which was at its height at this period, continued its desolating course, with but little abatement, during the following year. Yet the Conference of 1851 it was plain that the original agitation had gone its length and done its worst. At that Conference, however, after a careful examination, classification and analysis of the large number of memorials sent up from circuits and from individual officers or members of the Society, a grave and earnest discussion of the whole subject as to the main principles involved, a large and influential committee—a committee of fifty—was appointed to meet during the ensuing year, and take into consideration not only the requests of the memorialists, but the whole subject of Methodist polity. Of the proceedings of that committee you are already informed.

A little before the time appointed for the assembling of the Memorial Committee in London, there was a gathering at the centre town of Birmingham, of gentlemen who had styled themselves the name of 'Moderates,' and who undertook to do in their own way, and on their own authority, what the committee in London was charged to do—to prepare a scheme of amendment, where it might be needed and possible, in reference to debatable points and to imperfect matters of our economy. These gentlemen separated themselves expressly and carefully from the cause of the expelled ministers, and disclaimed the principle of "stopping the supplies" or of pursuing circuit agitation. But their principles are embodied in the "Birmingham Declaration," and certain following resolutions, identical with the main principles of the spirit of agitation, and indeed quite as pronounced and advanced as those professed by the most resolute agitators during the first few months after the Conference of 1849. They bring forward, also, the same charges, though not so offensively expressed, of covert and absolute fraud and tyranny in the course of connectional legislation and government, and the ultraright agitators have been necessitated to allege. The whole movement, indeed, is but the old agitation with a new and considerably decent coat on. And not a few of those who have taken the lead in it, or acceded to it, are persons who have previously distinguished themselves, to the fullest extent, in the original agitation. One distinctive principle of this agitation is the express denial of ministerial rights. It is maintained that all local preachers and leaders are in a sense equal to the regular ministers as expounders and rulers of the churches, and in all respects it is believed that not a few of them are entitled to superior deference, because of their gratuitous services. Local preachers, it is held, have every right to administer the sacraments, no less than the separated ministers. I am not aware that this is openly claimed (expressly) as the ordinary right and prerogative of the leader's office. But this is implied in all the reasonings of the party in question. Hitherto these persons have not gone to the length of saying that the members of each class ought directly to choose their own leaders. Nor do I think that, as a separate party, they will come to this. Indeed the peculiarity of the 'Moderate' party, as a party, has hitherto been this; that they have consisted almost exclusively of officers. They are by no means favorable (with a very few exceptions) to real democracy, to the rule of the true people. Their strength is as lay officers, to get the power into both preachers and people entirely into their own hands. The ministers are to have no effective ministerial rights or prerogatives, and the people are to remain just where they are. The minister is to be merged and lost among those who call themselves his constituents; and Methodism is to be a republic, governed by a practically irresponsible official class. But just in proportion as this, the real end of the movement comes into view, its power will diminish. It will cease to be popular when it becomes apparent that, though against the ministers, it is not a movement in favor of the people. In a little time the adherents of the party must separate into two portions; the more advanced will join the 'Reformers,' so called: the others, many of whom have been deluded by the profession of 'Moderation,' and by specious phrases, will fall back into the ranks of Conference Methodism. At present the revolutionists, miscalled 'Reformers,' have advanced nearly as far as it is possible for men to advance in the way of independent extravagance and lawlessness. And scarcely any of them remain in any sort of connection with Methodism.

Now this introduction will prepare your readers for the information that there have been held, this year and at this session, in this town of Sheffield, two Conferences, besides our own. One of the two has been the Conference of the 'Moderates,' held during the former part of our sittings; the other that of the Reformers, held during the four last days of the Conference. Several, however, of the hybrids of importance have been connected with both these Conferences. Already a proposal has been put out—perhaps rather a feeler than a proposal—for the fusion of the 'Reform' and the 'Moderate' parties. And one of the Secretaries of the 'Moderates' presided, the other evening, at a 'Reform' meeting. Hitherto, however, it probably serves both parties best to keep up a nominal distinction and shadowy partition between them. But in a short time the veil will have melted away which disguises the features of 'Moderatism,' and it will be seen to be but the "double" of Reform.

With the 'Reform' party the Conference has terminated all controversy long ago, and has quietly refused to renew it, in any form, this Conference. It has, however, thought fit to publish a reply to an application of the 'Moderates' for a Conference with them, which reply you will find in a recent number of the Watchman, and which will repay the attentive perusal of your readers. It is an admirable statement of the main points in controversy, and manifesto of great principles.

Neither of these rival Conferences has made much impression either upon our Conference, in the town of Sheffield, or the Methodist public at large. The assembly of the 'Moderates' was a signal failure, and the violent and extreme agitation is almost worn out.

I think I told you that the present editor of the so-called Wesleyan Times is a renegade Wesleyan minister, who took hollow vows to Methodism, in an unnatural sense last Conference, who, within a few months afterwards resigned his place among us, having previously written for an independent review an elaborate attack on Methodism, and who is now an avowed Independent. Your readers will judge of the honesty of such a man editing a professed Wesleyan journal. His course, indeed, has been throughout most dishonorable, and such as amply to merit the sentence pronounced upon his case by the Conference, in accepting his resignation and which I subjoin in a note.*

Several ministers who have during the year joined the agitators, and hired themselves for the injury of Methodism, have been this Conference expelled. None of them, however, is of any note or influence.

This Conference has been remarkable beyond all that have preceded for freedom of discussion and independent unanimity of conclusion. Never was there so little predominance of any one mind. Never had even Dr. Bunting so little share in the determinations of the Conference. His physical energy fails, and on the suggestions of the Memorial Committee, he unfortunately supported in the main the high conservative section of the Conference. It is easy to account for this. The feebleness of his health had prevented him from taking part in the deliberations and discussions of the Memorial Committee at that time. The alterations proposed by that Committee were undoubtedly considerable, and such as were likely a little to surprise those who had not thoroughly gone into the whole matter. Besides, old age is cautious, often, indeed, timorous. Moreover, those who for many years have been accustomed themselves to take the lead in developing and maturing every scheme and managing every business, are very apt to fear lest, when they are compelled to relinquish their own immediate oversight of affairs, those affairs should not be managed with perfect safety or precision. Dr. Bunting, in his younger days, was the greatest innovator and reformer in Methodism. As such he was indeed reproached by not a few of his senior and most eminent brethren. He was even denounced as a "Kilhamite in heart." And now, in turn, some of the men younger than himself, and scarcely less able, who of late years have perhaps been more practically acquainted with the present working and needs of Methodism than he, I refer to such men as our President of the year, Dr. Beecher, and Mr. Lomas, are looked upon by himself, not indeed with an eye of unkindness or of suspicion, but with a fatherly fear lest they should innovate too much and become too "New Connectional" in their sentiments and arrangements.

The suggestions of the Memorial Committee have indeed encountered more opposition in the Conference than I had anticipated. Mr. W. M. Bunting, a man of a noble heart and intellect, but yet of a very singularly constituted mind, led off the opposition, in a formal and rather lengthy speech. He was supported, in the main, not only by his venerable father, but by a band of younger ministers, highly respectable for their ability and piety. From various causes these ministers had contracted an undue jealousy (as I think) of anything like an increase of popular influence. In some instances this arose from the painful practical experience which they had had of popular tumults. But, from whatever causes arising, such was the fact, as I have described. And most thoroughly and resolutely did they debate every debateable point of the Committee's suggestions. The result, however, was a signal triumph to the Committee. Notwithstanding the influence of Dr. Bunting, and the talents and character of the opposition, the first proposition of the Committee was carried by an overwhelming majority, only nine hands being held up against it. The second was carried with only four dissentients: and the others, with a few immaterial alterations, passed unanimously.

Further details, with some reflections on the present aspect of affairs, I must give you next week. The pressure of business and the necessities of travel leave me no time to complete my intelligence now. Next week I shall be for a time again in blessed retirement.

Sheffield, August 17, 1852.

*It was in effect as follows:

"1. That the Conference receives the resignation of Mr. W. L. Horton, and no longer recognizes him as a Wesleyan Methodist minister.

"2. That, had this resignation appeared simply as the result of a change, however sudden, in Mr. Horton's conscientious views of Church order, developed in a peaceful and Catholic spirit, and attended by no circumstances suggestive of a want of previous sincerity and good faith,—it would have been accepted by the Conference without question or comment, and with a willing deference to the high claims of conviction and a sense of duty.

"3. But that, considering, first, within how short a period before his abjuring all the distinctive principles of Wesleyan Methodism, Mr. Horton, after a long-headed course of study and instruction, comprising the very questions which those principles involve,—had publicly declared his adherence to them, and had solemnly engaged to observe and maintain them; and considering, secondly, how actively he has employed the interval between his resignation and the annual assembling of his fathers and brethren, by whom alone that resignation could be formally received, in pouring open derision upon them, and upon the system they have conscientiously deduced from the Holy Scripture—not scrupling to represent that system by whose instrumentality he has professed to have been made a partaker of Christ, as 'essential Popery,' and laboring to turn the hearts of Christian people against it—the Conference is deeply grieved to recognise in Mr. Horton's whole procedure during the year, the evidences of duplicity, ingratitude, and great unfaithfulness. And this judgment it deems it right to record."

"LIZZIE NEWTON."

Several weeks since we noticed, in few words, the death of Mrs. LAURA A. L. GOODWYN. We now recur to the subject with mournful pleasure.

She was a native of Georgia, but lived for the greater part of her life in Alabama, and was about twenty-three years of age when she died.

She lost her mother when quite young, which seems to have tinged with sadness all her thoughts afterwards. Her grand-mother supplied a mother's place. Amongst her papers there is a half-finished portrait of the venerable matron—"To-night I have been wandering amid the scenes of my childhood, looking on the dear faces and listening to the loved voices of those who were my ministering angels; and among them rises up in more than earthly beauty the image of my grandmother. Once more I see her calm, placid countenance; and as the memory of her godly life comes up, earnest aspirations arise for grace to follow in her footsteps. She is one of the first whom I remember, and her instructions were the first I received. I used to hear her tell of Indian cruelties, of being summoned to the 'Fort,' where a darling child lay dying in her arms, of a noble boy cut off just at manhood, and of a husband called home when laboring in his Master's vineyard, far from his wife and little ones. I can remember it all scarcely more than enough to know that she was acquainted with grief.

"The Bible was her constant companion and her guide through life; she may have read other books, but I can not remember it; and when I look back to those days I rarely think of her except with her knitting and her Testament."

It would seem, from her papers, that she was deprived, too, of this noble guide when in tender years. But the elements of her character are easily traced to these first impressions. Her grand-mother was doubtless trained to firmness by the dangers of a frontier life; while her husband was out, an itinerant preacher, she performed the more difficult part of taking care of the family, and looking out for Indians. This devotion to the cause of God and firmness of character, became the prominent traits of her little grand-daughter. Even the impression of the grand-parent's grief, as she told of the unexpected loss of a husband and a son in the hey-day of promise, was ineffaceable.

She was educated at Summerfield, Ala., under Dr. Mitchell, and while there, in the 19th year of her age, was converted. Of this last event, which was the beginning of life to her, she says, in the following note in her "journal." "May 10—This very day it is two years since I found the 'more excellent way;' since I began to reckon myself dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord; and it is with praise and gratitude I would record it. Oh, God is very good, and as the memory of the past crowds upon me, my soul cries out, 'What shall I render unto the Lord for all benefits!' Two years ago! 'Bless the Lord, O my soul, and all that is within me bless his holy name'—words are too weak to praise Him. What a blessed time was that! How vividly does the past come before me; that little band of youthful disciples I again see wending their way to the silent grove, and again hear the tones of prayer which ascended from their hearts. Oh, that was a blessed season, the beginning of glorious things; and with humble gratitude I can say I am nearer Heaven now than then, and more wholly given to the service of my heavenly Father."

Shortly after graduating, she left her home in Alabama to engage in the business of teaching. This brought her to Chapel Hill, in this State. She seems to have left the comforts of her father's house in obedience to what she believed to be her duty. She felt called of God to do good. The field which opened before her was the one she occupied. Accordingly we find her presently engaged with all her powers in the arduous task of teaching children. At this period, and indeed always, she seems to have been slender in health; and it was often with no little difficulty that she dragged her feeble body to the duties of her office.

Yet she delighted in trying to be useful. At Chapel Hill she writes: "As a teacher I am happy; I have but few idle scholars, and the others are a source of unfailing pleasure. I sometimes look around upon the childish faces about me, and none but a teacher of little girls can imagine my feelings; smiles play on every brow, and perfect trust and confidence beam in their eyes. Why can I not be perfectly happy here, since every countenance reflects the feelings pictured on mine—since every step bounds to do my bidding, and every heart throbs with joy or sorrow at my praise or blame! Here am I truly the 'presiding genius,' and here is an extended usefulness in which to exercise the talents God has given me."

Nor were her prayers in vain. She had the pleasure to see the work prospering in her hands. Shortly after she writes, "God has been mindful of us; the blessing given me is too great. I have seen Sally, Martha, Virginia, Julia, Betty, and Betty Bray come home to God, and of my school of sixteen all but three have joined the Church. Oh, shall I not henceforth be more devoted to my blessed Redeemer, more wholly given up to his service? By the grace of God, I will."
